BROWN v. SHORTLIDGE. (Civ. 6374.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 18, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 18, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 17, 1929.

Physicians and surgeons 🔑18(6)—Presumption of surgeon's negligence arose from child's loss of tooth following surgeon's insertion of gag preliminary to operation to remove tonsils.

Presumption of surgeon's negligence held to arise from child's loss of tooth after surgeon's introduction and adjustment of gag in child's mouth after administration of anesthetic, preliminary to surgical operation for removal of tonsils.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Irene K. Brown against Edmund Shortlidge. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Perry Evans, of San Francisco, and Harold L. Brown, of Burlingame, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant, a physician and surgeon, from a judgment entered against him in an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff as a result of carelessness and negligence of the defendant in and about the performance of a minor surgical operation. Plaintiff at the time of the operation was a child of the age of six years. Defendant, as a surgeon, had advised the necessity of the removal of the child's tonsils and adenoids, and pursuant to that advice the child was taken to a hospital for the operation. There is evidence that at the time appointed for the operation the surgeon was not present, but that shortly thereafter he came in, evidently in haste and at once began preparations for the work in hand. The child was removed to the operating room of the hospital, in which room were present the defendant, an anesthetist and two nurses. A general anesthetic was administered, and upon the child relaxing a contrivance referred to as a gag was inserted in the mouth, the purpose of which was to hold the mouth open and control the tongue during the operation. About a minute or two after the gag was inserted the surgeon noticed blood on the lips of the child patient and upon examination he discovered a tooth lying loose in the mouth, completely free. It was disclosed upon subsequent examination that the bone in which the base of the tooth was set was fractured, which bone was described as being the bone in the superior maxillary. It was for the loss of the tooth that the trial court awarded plaintiff a money judgment. In passing it is noted that no complaint is made on the question of the amount of damages.

The finding of the trial court is as follows: "Defendant did not use ordinary or reasonable care in his attention to the treatment of plaintiff in respect to the operation and the preparation of plaintiff therefor on said day, but then and there attended upon plaintiff and performed the said operation in a careless and negligent manner, in that defendant neglected and failed to apply or manipulate, or to cause to be applied or manipulated, in a reasonable, careful, or reasonably skillful manner, a certain gag placed by defendant in plaintiff's mouth as an instrument for facilitating said operation; and by reason of defendant's omission to use ordinary or reasonable care in the premises, one of plaintiff's upper central front teeth, commonly known as an incisor, was forced out of its place in plaintiff's mouth." There is the further finding of the trial court as follows: The defendant's treatment of and attention given to plaintiff on the occasion and at the time of said operation was not standard or approved treatment or attention given by physicians and surgeons in the vicinity of San Francisco in such operations or in the preparation of the patient therefor; and the treatment and attention then and there given to plaintiff was not the best of defendant's ability or in the exercise of ordinarily or reasonably good judgment or without carlessness or negligence. If the evidence supports these findings the judgment must be affirmed. Supplementing the general statement of facts as hereinbefore, there is ample evidence to warrant the following state of facts: Defendant was a practicing physician and surgeon of the city of San Francisco, specializing in throat affection and oral surgery, and the operation was performed in San Francisco. The child entered the operating room with the tooth in question perfectly sound and of normal placement and fixture. The tooth was a second tooth and firmly imbedded in the bone structure. A gag was inserted in the child's mouth, but prior to the insertions of the gag the patient had completely relaxed and was fully under the anesthetic. The defendant had been delayed in his arrival at the hospital, and the operation was rushed along in a hurried manner. While some part of the introduction of the gag was done or performed by the anesthetist assisting, the defendant directed the proceeding and himself introduced and adjusted the gag. After the defendant had introduced the gag he assured himself that the adjustment was proper to protect the lips and that the upper teeth were free and, as defendant states, "absolutely all right." The defendant then busied himself fixing the light and other paraphernalia incident to the operation, and when he looked down he observed the blood on the patient's lips.

The defendant testifies: "It struck me in a flash that there must be something wrong with the teeth and then I looked down and saw the tooth lying there." There was evidence before the court that the tooth must have been either knocked out or extracted. There is not a word of testimony indicating that the anesthetist or any one other than defendant, excepting jointly with the latter, ever touched the patient or the gag. Likewise there is not a word of direct testimony as to how the tooth was loosened and removed. Summing it up, we find a child patient completely under anesthetic in the hands of a skilled physician preparatory to an operation for the removal of tonsils. For no apparent reason and justified by no explanation the bone in the superior maxillary is fractured in front and a tooth is pulled or forced from the socket. The only attempt at explanation is the statement of a dental expert to the effect that in similar operations where a gag is used a surgeon would be lucky if at some time something of that kind would not occur, and in explanation of the statement he cites conditions, essentially different from the case at bar, under which such a casualty might occur. Defendant contends that, the burden of proof being on the plaintiff, it was necessary for him to affirmatively show some positive act of actionable negligence. It is his contention that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur can have no application. The case of Vergeldt v. Hartzell (C. C. A.) 1 F.(2d) 635, is illuminating on the subject here involved. Therein it is said, quoting from Evans v. Roberts, 172 Iowa, 653, 154 N. W. 923:

"It is the appellant's contention that there is no evidence in the record to support a finding that he was negligent. With this we are unable to agree. Assuming, for the purposes of this case, the soundness of the argument that, in performing an operation, a surgeon is not held to guarantee results, and that, if he possesses the measure of skill which the law requires, a mere failure of judgment in his choice of methods and means is not actionable negligence, such concession is insufficient for the disposition of the issue of negligence in this case as a matter of law. This is not the ordinary case where a practitioner is sought to be charged with liability for alleged improper treatment of some bodily ailment or infirmity. He was employed to remove the adenoids from the plaintiff's throat, and there is neither claim nor proof that he did not successfully remove them. His negligence, if any, was in failing to take due care to avoid injury to the undiseased parts in the vicinity of which the operation was performed; and while it may be true that, had the operation upon the adenoids been unsuccessful and disappointing, no inference of negligence or want of skill would arise therefrom, it does not follow that this rule applies with the same force to an injury done by him to sound and undiseased parts of the plaintiff's person, which he was not called upon to treat and did not pretend to treat. If a surgeon, undertaking to remove a tumor from a person's scalp, lets his knife slip and cuts off his patient's ear, or if he undertakes to stitch a wound on the patient's cheek, and by an awkward move thrusts his needle into the patient's eye, or if a dentist, in his haste, leaves a decayed tooth in the jaw of his patient and removes one which is perfectly sound and serviceable, the charitable presumptions, which ordinarily protect the practitioner against legal blame where his treatment is unsuccessful, are not here available. 'It is a matter of common knowledge and observation that such things do not ordinarily attend the service of one possessing ordinary skill and experience in the delicate work of surgery. It does not need scientific knowledge or training to understand that, ordinarily speaking, such results are unnecessary and are not to be anticipated, if reasonable care be exercised by the operator.'"

In Wharton v. Warner, 75 Wash. 470, 135 P. 235, the Supreme Court of Washington says: "It is argued * * * that whether a surgical operation was unskillfully performed is a question of science" to "be determined by the opinion evidence of surgeons; and * * * that a bad result standing alone is no evidence of unskillful surgery. * * * Both propositions are sound when soundly applied. The reason is that in most cases a layman can have no knowledge whether the proper medicine was administered or the proper surgical treatment given. Whether a surgical operation was unskillfully * * * performed is a scientific question. If, however, a surgeon should lose the instrument with which he operates in the incision which he makes in his patient, it would seem as a matter of common sense that scientific opinion could throw little light on the subject." In the case of Dimock v. Miller, 202 Cal. 668, 262 P. 311, the full membership of the Supreme Court, as now constituted, speaking through Mr. Justice Langdon, says: "If * * * it is necessary to demonstrate conclusively and beyond the possibility of a doubt that the negligence resulted in the injury, it would never be possible to recover in a case of negligence in the practice of a profession which is not an exact science."

In Michener v. Hutton (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 238, it is said: "The courts of this state have long since adopted the rule as expressed in 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (6th Ed.) p. 132, viz.: 'Where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of proper care.'" In the very recent case of Ragin v. Zimmerman, decided March 25, 1929, and found in 276 P. 107, the Supreme Court strongly implies that when necessary the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur will be applied in cases of the kind. In that case the question involved the use of an X-ray machine, but the reasoning is equally applicable to the use of any mechanical equipment.

The court cites with approval the following language of Phœnix Co. v. Texas Co., 81 Cal. App. 61, 252 P. 1082, with reference to the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur: "We think this doctrine may be urged with more than plausibility. Everything in the present case which in any way contributed to the accident was under the management of the defendant; * * * and that in the ordinary course of things the accident would not have happened if those having the management had used proper care." The exact meaning of the term res ipsa loquitur follows its translation, namely, "the thing itself speaks," or as is the generally accepted reading, "the thing speaks for itself." The application of the doctrine has never been confined to any set formula of fact. If a patient should visit a surgeon for the purpose of having a mole removed from the right foot and awoke from an anesthetic minus his left arm, it is certain that some satisfactory explanation would be required to stop the fact itself from broadly proclaiming the negligence of the surgeon. The difference between such a case and the case at bar is one of degree only. If the surgeon in the case at bar could stand upon some imaginary rule of law to the effect that when one submits himself to surgical treatment he may expect anything to happen, so likewise could the surgeon in the supposed case. We think the true rule is expressed in the cited cases, and the distinction made plain between cases involving the merits of a diagnosis and scientific treatment and cases there during the performance of surgical or other skilled operations an ulterior act or omission occurs, the judgment of which does not require scientific opinion to throw light upon the subject.

Counsel for appellant is fearful lest the affirmance of the judgment herein may set aside all of the well-known rules protecting physicians and surgeons in the practice of their profession and place upon them the burden of at all times demonstrating to a lay judge or jury the correctness of diagnosis made and treatments administered or means employed, thus making them, in all cases, insurers of a successful outcome. These fears are groundless. The affirmance will serve only to confine the rule within the limits intended, and, while preserving to the surgeon all of the protection the law intended, will also give to a helpless unconscious patient an assurance of the laws solicited in his behalf.

Judgment affirmed.

TENNANT et ux. v. WILDE et al.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 23, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑204(3)—Objection that correspondence leading to agreement was inadmissible as tending to vary written contract, made for first time on appeal, held too late.

Objection that letters and telegrams between parties antedating agreement involved in litigation, and tending to clarify meaning of agreement and intention of those who executed it, was inadmissible as tending to vary terms of written contract, held too late, where made for first time on appeal, under rule that party cannot urge for first time on appeal objections which might have been obviated if made in court below.

2. Contracts 🔑10(1), 65(2)—Where there is consideration for any agreement in contract, contract as whole does not lack mutuality or consideration.

Where there is consideration for any of the agreements specified in contract, the contract as a whole cannot be said to lack mutuality or consideration, nor can any particular promise or agreement contained therein be singled out and termed inoperative because no special consideration appears to have been given or promised for it.

3. Contracts 🔑169—To ascertain intent of parties to ambiguous contract, relations between parties, work to be done, and correspondence leading to agreement may be considered (Civ. Code, §§ 1636, 1638, 1641, 1643, 1647; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1856, 1860).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1636, 1638, 1641, 1643, 1647, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1856, 1860, where written contract is ambiguous, it is proper to consider relations between parties, work to be done, and correspondence leading up to execution of agreement in order to give effect to mutual intention of parties.

4. Contracts 🔑175(3)—Evidence held to show that written contract for carpenter work was intended to make plaintiff responsible therefor, guaranteeing its maximum cost.

Written contract wherein plaintiff agreed to work as carpenter on certain building until it was fully completed according to general plans and specifications, and to guarantee that cost of all labor and material should not exceed $3,000, held, under the evidence, including practical construction thereof by parties, to make plaintiff responsible for the carpenter work, guaranteeing that its cost would not exceed amount specified, and it was not intended that plaintiff should merely be a journeyman carpenter.

5. Contracts 🔑170(1)—Practical construction of ambiguous contract by parties may be considered in determining its meaning.

Actions of parties to a contract subsequent to its execution and with relation thereto may be looked to as an aid to its construction when the language of the instrument itself is ambiguous.

6. Pleading 🔑36(1)—Pleader is bound by interpretation of ambiguous contract pleaded.

The pleader is bound by the interpretation of an ambiguous contract adopted by him and set forth in his pleading.

7. Contracts 🔑10(2), 54(1)—Contract to complete carpenter work at guaranteed maximum cost held not invalid for want of mutuality and consideration.

Written contract whereby plaintiff undertook to be responsible for carpenter work on defendants' building until completed according to general plans and specifications, supplemented by oral agreement as to details, and guaranteeing that cost of all labor and materials should not exceed $3,000, held not invalid for lack of mutuality and want of consideration on theory that it was a unilateral agreement by plaintiff not imposing any obligations on defendants because it afforded plaintiff no control over cost of material and labor and because defendant might have hired any number of workmen and purchased any amount of material at his own option.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by Clarence S. Tennant and wife against W. C. Wilde and another. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

O. E. Mark and W. C. Wilde, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Sloane & Sloane, of San Diego, for respondents.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem. Plaintiffs, by their amended complaint and an "amended amendment" thereto sought to recover a balance alleged to be due on a promissory note executed by defendants in the original sum of $3,000; and in a second cause of action set up the written instrument which is the bone of contention in this appeal and which is as follows:

"I hereby agree to work as a carpenter in the carpenter work to be done by W. C. Wilde on the 'Court Hotel' building now at No. 1451 State Street, San Diego, California, until all of the same has been fully completed as an 18-apartment building according to general plans and specifications thereof supplemented by oral agreement as to details, and hereby agree and guarantee that the cost of all labor and material necessary therefor shall not exceed three thousand dollars. That said work shall be proceeded with as rapidly as possible at all times, using and employing all labor that can be advantageously used and employed to the end that said work may be completed at the earliest possible date.

"All work to be done first-class and everything to be done in such way as to give the entire building a good and well finished and harmonious appearance, for improved and modern apartment house purposes, and any incidental matters necessary therefor shall be considered included.

"This agreement shall bind and inure to the benefit of the respective parties hereto, their heirs, executors, administrators, and to their assigns except as herein otherwise provided.

"Dated at San Diego, California, this 28th day of November, 1922.

"C. S. Tennant.

"Accepted: W. C. Wilde."

This count alleges that plaintiff Clarence S. Tennant thereby "undertook and agreed, for the sum of $3,000 to supply materials and labor for certain work on the Court Hotel building," and that the actual cost did not exceed $2,500, and asks judgment for the difference of $500.

Defendants' answer denied any indebtedness on the note and by way of counterclaim and set-off set up the same instrument, alleging that thereby said Tennant "agreed and guaranteed that the cost of all labor and materials necessary for the full completion of the carpenter work of the building therein mentioned, according to general plans and specifications thereof, supplemented by oral agreement as to details, shall not exceed $3,000," but that the cost upon completion exceeded $4,106.85, the difference between which figure and $3,000 they claimed as a set-off.

The trial was by jury, and both parties agree that the sole question involved on this appeal is whether the trial court erred in instructing the jury with respect to the above instrument. The instruction complained of by appellants is as follows: "As an offset to this claim, the defendant has set up, first, a counterclaim for some eleven hundred odd dollars, for an alleged agreement that the cost of a certain alteration of a building would not exceed $3,000. For the reason that this so-called contract lacks mutuality,—that is to say, for the reason that if the defendant had breached the contract and had failed to employ the plaintiff there could be no recovery by the plaintiff, the court holds that this contract has no validity and that there can be no recovery by the defendant on account of this contract."

The plaintiffs introduced no evidence upon the cause of action set up by their amendment to the amended complaint wherein said instrument was pleaded, and dismissed the same just before the case went to the jury.

Upon defendants' offer of the contract in evidence in support of their counterclaim the following proceedings took place:

"Mr. Harrison G. Sloane: Plaintiffs will object to such offer and to the admission of the contract as a basis for establishing a claim of surplus here on the ground that the contract makes no such provision. There is no construction of the contract which makes the plaintiffs in this case liable for an excess in the cost of construction.

"The Court: I do not know exactly what it is they guarantee; but they absolutely guarantee the cost of labor and material necessary therefor.

"Mr. Mark: May it please the Court, and counsel, I think that is an exhibit—the contract itself is an exhibit in the pleading denominated 'Amendment to complaint,' on the part of plaintiffs. The specifications are not, but the specifications are referred to and are necessary in the construction thereof. There is the guaranty to which your Honor has referred.

"The Court: The contract, of course, offered here is incomplete, because you would have to have the specifications here to see what it was he guaranteed would cost only $3,000.

"Mr. Mark: And that we wish to proceed to offer in evidence.

"Mr. W. A. Sloane: Our contention is that the word 'guarantee' there does not create the kind of obligation they are seeking to enforce here as against this defendant.

"The Court: If it means anything, that is what it means.

"Mr. W. A. Sloane: We claim that it does not mean anything, does not create any liability. It is not a guaranty, especially under the statutory definition of 'guaranty,' by which is meant to stand good for the debts or obligations of another.

"The Court: On the face of it, its ordinary meaning, they guarantee that is all it would cost him; but it would have to be offered in connection with the specifications.

"Mr. Mark: We offer the contract, with the specifications annexed.

"The Court: Where are the specifications?

"Mr. Mark: Annexed. May it be admitted, your Honor?

"The Court: Yes."

[1] The objection was to the admission of the contract. When it was offered in connection with the specifications, this objection was not renewed. Thereafter, and without objection on the part of plaintiffs, defendants introduced into evidence a number of letters and telegrams between the parties antedating the agreement in question, and which tend to throw considerable light upon the relation of the parties, the meaning of the agreement, and the intention of those who executed it. Respondents here for the first time make the point that this correspondence tended to vary the terms of the written contract. This objection comes too late. It is an almost elementary rule that a party cannot urge, for the first time on appeal, objections which might have been obviated if made in the court below. Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. California Development Co., 171 Cal. 227, 152 P. 564; Swayne & Hoyt v. Wells-Russell & Co., 169 Cal. 204, 146 P. 686; Milwaukee Mechanics'

Ins. Co. v. Warren, 150 Cal. 346, 89 P. 93; Campbell v. Genshlea, 180 Cal. 215, 180 P. 336; Timmons v. Joplin, 157 Cal. 15, 106 P. 228. We believe, however, that, even if objection had been made to this correspondence, it would have been properly admitted as an aid to the interpretation of an ambiguous document. Code Civ. Proc., §§ 1856, 1860.

The learned trial judge gave the instruction above quoted under the theory that the agreement of November 28, 1922, lacked mutuality, as is evident from the language of the instruction itself and from a statement by the court at the close of the evidence, as follows:

"The Court: * * * There is no contract at all because it is utterly indefinite. There is nothing definite as to time. If the defendant had not sought to continue it, there would have been no measure for damages. There is nothing he could allege or prove as to how long his employment was to last; no agreement that he would employ him for any particular length of time. Call in the jury."

It is upon this point that respondents argue for an affirmance of the judgment. They urge that the contract is severable, one part being a promise by plaintiff Clarence S. Tennant to work as a carpenter and the other, his alleged guaranty that cost of labor and material should not exceed $3,000, and that it is the guaranty which lacks mutuality.

[2] On this point it may be said that, where there is consideration for any of the agreements specified in a contract the contract as a whole cannot be said to lack mutuality or consideration, nor can any particular promise or agreement contained therein be singled out and deemed inoperative because no special or particular consideration appears to have been given or promised for it. Mr. Page in his "Law of Contracts" thus states the rule:

(At pages 861 and 862) "While a consideration is a necessary element of every contract, it is not necessary that each separate promise or covenant should have a distinct consideration. If there is but one consideration offered in return for several promises, and it is accepted for them together, it will support them. This principle is often invoked in question of mutuality of obligation. If A gives value for two or more promises from B, B cannot claim that one of such promises was not supported by consideration, though the parties have not apportioned the consideration to the separate promises. * * *"

(At page 863) "The purchase price is not only consideration for a sale, but also, if so agreed upon, for a warranty, * * * or to accept payment in notes of a third person and to indemnify the purchaser against liability on his indorsement of such notes."

(At page 866) "Rendition of services is a consideration for a covenant to pay both for such services and for services already rendered for which the promissor was not legally liable."

[3] It is contended on the one hand that the contract is merely one whereby Tennant agreed to perform carpenter work on a building being constructed for appellants, and, as such carpenter, could have no control over the cost of carpenter work or labor, and could not possibly guarantee the cost of either or both, and, on the other, that the parties understood and attempted to express the fact that Tennant was to be responsible for the carpenter work, whether physically done by himself, or by others in connection with him or under his direction. There is no question as to the ambiguity of the instrument itself. It starts off with the words "I hereby agree to work as a carpenter in the carpenter work to be done by W. C. Wilde on the 'Court Hotel Building,'" then follows an agreement and guaranty as to "the cost of all labor and material necessary therefor" and the statement "that said work shall be proceeded with as rapidly as possible at all times, using and employing all labor that can advantageously be used and employed to the end that said work may be completed at the earliest date." (Italics ours.) This in turn is followed by the statement, "All work to be done first class * * *." The first sentence, if it stood alone, would seem to indicate that the parties had in contemplation merely the hiring of Tennant as a journeyman carpenter, but the rest of the instrument clearly implies a much different class of employment. The provision that "the work shall be proceeded with as rapidly as possible and at all times using and employing all labor that can be advantageously used and employed" certainly implied that Tennant obligated himself to employ and direct sufficient labor to achieve speedy completion, while that requiring "all work to be done first class and everything to be done in such a way as to give the entire building a good and well finished and harmonious appearance" implied something more than mere labor as a journeyman carpenter on his part. To what end the requirement that the entire building should be given a well-finished and harmonious appearance, if Tennant was merely employed as one of the carpenters, without power or authority to direct and supervise the work of others? It is our duty to so interpret this contract "as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable." Civ. Code. § 1636. (Italics ours.) "The whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other." Civ. Code, § 1641. We must also give it "such an interpretation as will make it lawful, operative, definite, reasonable, and capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violating the intention of the parties." Civ. Code, §§ 1643. After all, the essential theory in construing any contract is to find out what the parties meant, and this must be done by an examination of the language used therein, provided the same is "clear and explicit." Civ. Code, § 1638. Where the language, as in the instrument under discussion, is neither clear nor explicit, resort may be had to "the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates." Civ. Code, § 1647; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1860, 1856. For this purpose it is proper to consider the relations between the parties, the work to be done and the correspondence leading up to the execution of the agreement. Williams v. Ashurst Oil Land & Development Co., 144 Cal. 619, 78 P. 28, Payne v. Neuval, 155 Cal. 46, 99 P. 476.

As was said in Balfour v. Fresno Canal Co., 109 Cal. 221, 41 P. 876:

"If, however, the language employed be fairly susceptible of either one of the two interpretations contended for, without doing violence to its usual and ordinary import, or some established rule of construction, then an ambiguity arises, which extrinsic evidence may be resorted to for the purpose of explaining. This is not allowing parol evidence for the purpose of varying or altering the contract, or of putting a different sense and construction upon its language from that which it would naturally bear, but for the purpose of showing the circumstances under which the language was used, and applying it according to the intention of the parties. 'The true interpretation of every instrument being manifestly that which will make the instrument speak the intention of the party at the time it was made, it has always been considered an exception, or perhaps a corollary, to the general rule above stated, that when any doubt arises upon the true sense and meaning of the words themselves, or any difficulty as to their application under the surrounding circumstances, the sense and meaning of the language may be investigated and ascertained by evidence dehors the instrument itself.' (Sandford v. Newark, etc., R. R. Co., 37 N. J. Law, 1, 3.) For the purpose of determining what the parties intended by the language used, it is competent to show not only the circumstances under which the contract was made, but also to prove that the parties intended and understood the language in the sense contended for; and for that purpose the conversation between and declarations of the parties during the negotiations at and before the time of the execution of the contract may be shown. (Code Civ. Proc., secs. 1860, 1861; Atlanta v. Schmeltzer, 83 Ga. 609 [10 S. E. 543]; Keller v. Webb, 125 Mass. 88, 28 Am. Rep. 209; Long v. Long, 44 Mo. App. 141; [Swett] v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 365, 3 Am. Rep. 471.)

"In our judgment, the contracts in question are so far ambiguous, in the particular under consideration, as to fall within the principles here announced; and we think that the excluded evidence was of a character admissible to explain and fix the intention of the parties in the employment of the language used. It may be that, standing alone, the contracts would receive the construction urged by defendant. * * * But, at the same time, it is likewise, we think, perfectly susceptible of the construction contended for by plaintiff, if such was the meaning intended by the parties, and that without doing violence to the ordinary sense or meaning of the language employed, or importing any new term into the contract. Nor does such construction make the contract appear so unreasonable or improbable as to preclude it. In determining the meaning of the parties in the particular clause, we will look at every part of the instrument. 'It is a true and important rule of construction that the sense and meaning of the parties to any particular instrument should be collected ex antecedentibus et consequentibus; that is to say, every part of it should be brought into action, in order to collect from the whole one uniform and consistent sense, if that may be done.' (Broome's Legal Maxims, 442.) Applying this rule, and regarding the different provisions of the contract in the light of the circumstances surrounding the parties, as disclosed by the evidence, the construction sought to be established by plaintiff is neither unreasonable nor necessarily inconsistent with the general purpose intended to be accomplished. * * *"

See, also, Brewster v. Lathrop, 15 Cal. 21; Preble v. Abrahams, 88 Cal. 245, 26 P. 99, 22 Am. St. Rep. 301.

[4] The evidence discloses that the parties had known each other for 16 or 17 years, and the tenor of the letters received in evidence indicates the most intimate and friendly relations between them. The Tennants, who at that time lived in Hollister, had visited the Wildes in San Diego during the summer of 1922, at which time they had expressed a desire to move to San Diego. A letter written October 12, 1922, by Mr. Wilde to the Tennants contained this language: "I might add that if Clarence (Mr. Tennant) would want to be sure of something when coming, that I have just bought and am having moved a forty room, 3 story, wooden hotel building, that we want to make up into housekeeping apartments, and I would be glad to have him undertake this if he cares to and can. * * * There ought to be carpenter work in about two weeks. This would give him an easy start here so he could get right to work and get his bearings, and there will probably be work for a month or so on this job; I would very much like to have him here to do it. Of course, I want you to be governed by your own wishes and best interests, but since the idea was suggested in your letter it occurred to me that this might be of some consequence to you as I must have some one anyway.

Then I have bid on some government buildings here that I may get also, and if I do there will a lot of carpenter work on them that could be gone ahead with as soon as the other is finished. And all of this work is mostly inside work that the weather would not interfere with. I have a nephew who just came this morning from Alabama that I expect to use for whatever he can do, altho he is not a carpenter or skilled in anything particularly, but he ought to work well with Clarence in whatever he could do. We will make it homelike for Clarence as best we can. If you think well and favorably of this I would be pleased to hear from you as soon as you can decide so that I may make my plans accordingly, although I do not want to hurry you or have you act other than with perfect freedom and deliberation and for what you consider to be your own best interests. Very sincerely, W. C. W." To this letter Mrs. Tennant replied on October 24. This letter is couched in the most friendly terms, and in it Mrs. Tennant states that she has been "so anxious for Clarence to go down there and do Will's work," but that she thinks "he hates to make the break," and that she is "more than sorry to say that he hasn't sense enough to accept," but that perhaps later on he might desire to go to San Diego. On October 31 Mrs. Tennant again wrote to Mr. Wilde, saying, "I wonder if we are too late or if the job is still open for Clarence." This letter refers to a friend of Mr. Tennant's, a man named Shade, stating that Mr. Tennant wanted to know if Mr. Wilde had had any one yet to do his work, that Mr. Shade was a "good finisher," and that Mr. Tennant wanted to know if Mr. Wilde could use both Shade and himself. The response to this letter was a telegram sent by Mr. Wilde to Mrs. Tennant, which is as follows: "All work I wrote you about is still open excepting hotel building foundation which I have contracted for and is now being installed. If Clarence can vouch for Shade he could come too. There ought to be over months work for both. Carpenters scale is eight dollars. Am writing. Wait. W. C. Wilde." The date of this telegram was November 2, 1922, and it was followed up by a letter written by Mr. Wilde to both Mr. and Mrs. Tennant on November 4, 1922. This letter is as follows:

"Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Tennant, 90 Hawkins St., Hollister, Calif. Dear Friends: Upon receipt of Mrs. Tennant's letter of the 31st ult. I sent Western Union night letter telegram, of which copy is enclosed. After our previous correspondence resulting in your decision not to come here at this time, I, of course, abandoned the idea and based my plans on other considerations, and when I received your last letter the hotel building was landed on the lot and I had contracted for the foundation work and material. The main foundation work is now done and I am informed that it will be sufficiently set so that the building can be let down onto it about the 13th inst. Then the rough plumbing work has got to go in after that before the carpenter work could be undertaken and gone ahead with so as to make the best progress, especially if there were two men to go at it, and I do not want to have you and Mr. Shade here on my own suggestion or responsibility until the work is ready to go ahead with. That is the reason I telegraphed you as I did, so I could write and explain. I would not want you to lose any time or be delayed on my account, if I can possibly avoid it, and so am trying to figure safe. It took longer to get the hotel building on the ground than I figured it would when I wrote you on the 12th ult. Of course, if you and Mr. Shade want to come anyway at once it will be all right with me and I will let you go ahead just as fast as things can be arranged; so long as you know the situation there can be no disappointments. Otherwise I will telegraph you so you can be here when I am sure the work can immediately be gone ahead with and continued right along without your losing any time except for unforeseen things. Of course, if I had known you were going to be able to come as you now are, I would have saved the foundation work for you and let you be doing that now, but I did not know. So the next best I can do is to let you take things up as soon as the building is on the foundation. I want to be understood right, that it is my sincere desire to have you do the work now just as it was when I wrote you before, but am simply not sure that if you came at once I could put you right to work and keep you going every day, especially two men; however, as I have before stated, when you know this and if then you are willing to come and take the chances with me as to just how much we may have to wait for the completion of the foundation work and getting the building onto it, and possibly for some of the rough plumbing, then you can come as fast as you like.

"I also mentioned to you about some government buildings here that I had bid on, and that if I got these they would have to be moved and have work done on them. These bids are to be decided upon and awarded at Washington, D. C., by the War Department, and Congressman Swing of this district, who is in Washington now, is working on the matter for me at that end; he wrote me on the 27th ult. that he had just talked with the officer in charge of these bids and that from his analysis of them he intended to recommend the acceptance of the bids in the way that will result in my bids being accepted, and it then remained as to whether this officer's recommendation was followed by his superior officers in making the awards. I may hear any time now as to this matter, and when I do and if I should get the buildings I have bids on, I will have this much more on my hands for immediate attention, because they have to be moved off the ground right away.

"So you see I will soon be in a position with this hotel building, and may also be with these government buildings if I get them, when I could not only use you and Shade to very good advantage regularly for probably about three months, but, further than that, it would be a great benefit and relief to me to have someone that I could rely upon to undertake and go ahead with this work and not have to give it such constant careful attention myself.

"Although, as I previously wrote, it is for you to consider the matter entirely from the standpoint of your best interests and be governed accordingly, and since you know my position and wishes, if, considering everything you want to come right away it is all right with me, or if you would rather wait and have me let you know about developments as fast as they occur I will do that, or if you think it better for you to give up the idea entirely in view of the circumstances, you feel perfectly free to do that. Just let me know so I can plan accordingly, for there are people after me to figure on these things but I am holding off on everything for the present. If you want to come now, just let me know and start; if you want more information let me know; if you want me to let you know when things are definitely ready to continue with I will do that. But, in any event, let me know.

"Of course, I am not saying that they could not get other work here to take up and fill in on any spare time they might have now or any time.

"We are all well, and, needless to say very busy with what we have on our hands, and the coming of my nephew and niece from Alabama is helping us out a great deal, considering they are both young and inexperienced.

"Hoping this finds all of you in the best of good health, and that Clarence's absence will not prove to be too hard on the rest of you (if he should come), although he could go back and forth once a month easy enough, and awaiting your advice as to what your wishes are, I am, Very sincerely." (Italics ours.)

Mrs. Tennant replied to this letter within the next few days to the effect that Mr. Tennant and Mr. Shade would be ready to start Mr. Wilde's work on three days' notice. On November 20th Mr. Wilde wrote to the Tennants stating the general nature of the carpenter work in connection with the alteration of the hotel building. In this letter Mr. Wilde refers to a figure which he had received from a San Diego firm of contractors, stating: "At first I had planned on letting the labor and material complete by contract, and so I now have a figure for doing it accordingly. But I would like to have Clarence and Mr. Shade do the work if they can, and in order that they would be sure of themselves either way I would like to have them come and go over the plans and the work to see if they felt satisfied that they could undertake it and could also keep within the contract figure that I have, which I think is high enough, and then if they felt they could not safely assure me of that I could let it by contract and in the contract would make a condition that they be employed by the contractor. In these ways they would be as sure as possible of working after they got here, and, of course, hope they will feel equal to undertaking it by themselves and hiring such other help as they can use to advantage or need." (Italics ours.)

This letter also emphasizes the necessity of speedy completion of the hotel building in order to get it ready for the winter season. He also says: "It will take them a few days to go over things and figure them and get their bearings so as to start work to the best advantage. * * * This may be a change for Mr. Tennant to test himself for independent work and thereby find his way to figure for himself." (Italics ours.)

The figure for doing the work which Mr. Wilde refers to in this letter was submitted by the firm of Garner & Knight, the net amount being $3,000. On November 20th Mr. Tennant telegraphed to Mr. Wilde: "Are you ready for us? Shade I anxious. Answer." This telegram was evidently written before the receipt of the letter last referred to, and on the same day Mr. Tennant telegraphed to Mr. Wilde, "Will see you Sunday P. M.," Mr. Tennant, accompanied by his friend Mr. Shade, reached San Diego Sunday, November 22, 1922, and, during the course of the conversation which Mr. Wilde had on that day with Mr. Tennant and Mr. Shade, he told Mr. Tennant of the written proposal which he had received from Garner & Knight, and that he had to have some kind of a contract with reference to the construction work, and that, if Mr. Tennant and Mr. Shade wanted to make a contract with reference thereto, he would like to have them do it. Mr. Shade expressed himself as not wishing to undertake the matter on a contract basis. Mr. Tennant expressed his desire to stay, but did not want to do so unless Mr. Shade also stayed. Mr. Wilde then told Mr. Tennant that he would like to have the matter arranged so that he could let the contract to Garner & Knight and let Mr. Tennant work for that firm. Mr. Tennant, however, did not agree to this. Mr. Wilde testified that he said: "The only way in which it could be arranged if he did not want for me to let the contract to Garner & Knight and in that contract to procure his employment was to have some definite contract with him as to the cost of this work." Mr. Tennant replied to this that he would rather stay and undertake the work with himself and Mr. Shade, even though he lost on it, than to leave San Diego. Further testimony of Mr. Wilde along this line was as follows: "I told him that I felt satisfied that the figure of Garner & Knight was a safe figure, that these men were men who were experienced in doing this class of work locally, they knew the local labor and material conditions, they were men who had operated here and lived here for some time, I had known them for some time, I knew of remodeling building work that they had done, and while I had no way of knowing details of the cost involved in figuring a job of this kind, that I felt their estimate of it was a safe, reliable estimate, and I was willing to let him undertake it on their exact figure if he wanted to do so; and his employment was the result of it, and the making of the contract was the result of this correspondence and these conversations." Shortly after this conversation the contract in question was signed, and Mr. Tennant went to work and received $8 a day, Mr. Shade receiving $10 a day. Mr. Tennant kept track of the labor until it amounted to over $1,800 and then quit.

The specifications referred to in the contract between Mr. Tennant and Mr. Wilde, and which were the same specifications that accompanied the bid of Garner & Knight, are set forth at page 5 of the reporter's transcript. It is unnecessary to quote them in full, but certain of their provisions, read in connection with the contract of which they are made a part by reference, throw additional light upon the intention of the parties. They are as follows:

"Specifications of the work and materials necessary in doing the carpenter work in remodeling building at 1451 State street for W. C. Wilde:

"Carpenter work. All work under this head to be performed in the best workmanlike manner. Contractor to furnish all labor in tearing out partitions and cutting openings in accordance with plans, and furnish all material and labor in putting in new partitions, which is shown on drawings, to furnish all doors and windows and other materials necessary to carry out full details of drawings, Contractor to be allowed to use all doors and windows and other materials which have been torn out, that are in good condition. * * *

"Front Porch. Contractor to furnish all labor and material and build front porch according to plans." (Italics ours.)

The work actually cost $1,106.85 more than the $3,000 referred to in the contract. During the progress of the work the labor accounts were kept by Mr. Shade, who reported the same to Mr. Wilde, by whom they were paid out, the common labor being employed by either Mr. Shade or Mr. Tennant. The material was bought and paid for by Mr. Wilde on the orders of Mr. Tennant or Mr. Shade, the orders being made out by one of these gentlemen and given to Mr. Wilde, who would place them with the materialmen. Sometimes Mr. Wilde would select a place where the material was to be bought, and sometimes Mr. Shade and Mr. Tennant went around to the various materialmen examining the material and prices in order to get an idea as to price and quality. The bills were all rendered to Mr. Wilde.

From the foregoing testimony, which went in without objection and which was not in any way contradicted by respondents, it seems evident that what the parties had in contemplation was that Mr. Tennant should be responsible for the carpenter work upon the building, guaranteeing that its cost would not exceed the amount of the bid submitted by Garner & Knight, and that it was not in the contemplation of the parties that Mr. Tennant should merely be employed as a journeyman carpenter. This is made evident not only from the correspondence of the parties antedating the actual contract but from the construction placed upon it by the acts of the parties themselves. Not only did Mr. Tennant employ Mr. Shade as his superintendent, but he also employed the other labor in connection with the carpenter work and co-operated with Mr. Wilde in picking out and purchasing the material.

[5, 6] It is, of course, a familiar rule that the actions of parties to a contract subsequent to its execution and with relation thereto may be looked to as an aid to its construction when the language of the instrument itself is ambiguous. Indeed, it has been said in such a case that the actions of the parties afford one of the most reliable means of arriving at their intention. Ghirardelli & Co. v. Students' Express & Transfer Co., 175 Cal. 427, 166 P. 16; Woodard v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 513, 153 P. 951; Grant v. Bannister, 160 Cal. 774, 118 P. 253; 6 Cal. Jur. (Contracts, § 184), and cases therein cited. The law recognizes the practical construction of a contract made by the parties thereto as the best evidence of what they intended (Boardman Co. v. Petch, 186 Cal. 476, 199 P. 1047, Union Oil Co. v. Stewart, 158 Cal. 149, 110 P. 313, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 567), and in this connection, and in addition to the acts of the parties, above referred to, it is not without significance that both parties in their verified pleadings set up almost identical constructions of the contract in issue (amendment to complaint, Cl. Tr. p. 16; answer and set-off, Cl. Tr. p. 5). In plaintiffs' pleading, first above referred to, the plaintiffs thus construe the contract: "That on or about the 28th day of November, 1922, said plaintiff, Clarence S. Tennant, made and entered into a contract in writing with said defendant, W. C. Wilde, whereby said Tennant undertook and agreed for the sum of three thousand ($3000) dollars, to supply materials and labor for certain work on the Court Hotel Building. * * *" The pleader is bound by the interpretation adopted by him and set forth in his pleading. Silvers v. Grossman, 183 Cal. 696, 192 P. 534.

[7] In support of the contention that the agreement is invalid and unenforceable for lack of mutuality and want of consideration, it is suggested that it afforded Tennant no control whatever over the cost of material and labor, and that Wilde might have hired any number of workmen and purchased any amount of material at his own option; hence that it was in effect a unilateral agreement by Tennant, imposing no obligations upon Wilde. Under the construction we have placed upon the contract, and under the construction the parties themselves appear to have given it, this theory must fall to the ground. Considerations, similar in import to the one in question, have been frequently upheld as against the contention that they lacked mutuality and consideration. Thus, in Scott v. Stevenson Co., 130 Minn. 151, 153 N. W. 316, a manufacturer had agreed to furnish a dealer with such fur goods as the dealer should need during the following winter season; no amount being specified. It was held that the contract was not void for indefiniteness, uncertainty, or want of mutuality. It was further held that parol evidence was admissible to show the understanding of the parties and the circumstances under which the agreement was made, and that a part performance was sufficient to remove any defect of mutuality or consideration, if any such had existed. In Young Co. v. Springer, 113 Minn. 382, 129 N. W. 773, the same defects were urged as against a construction contract. The contract in question consisted of a request by the general contractor for a written proposal and a letter replying thereto in which the subcontractor stated: "I will furnish and lay the tile in the Y. M. C. A. building as per plans and specifications for $894.00, for all vit (meaning vitreous tile) cut out, deduct at 45 cents per square foot." It was held that this offer and acceptance constituted a binding contract and that it was not material that changes in the plans of the building were contemplated which might reduce defendant's proposal to such an extent as to leave no work for him to perform. The court said: "The consideration necessary to support the contract is found in the offer of defendant to do the work and plaintiff's acceptance of the same." In Rosenthal v. Empire Brick & Supply Co., 123 App. Div. 503, 108 N. Y. S. 347, the validity of a contract was sustained whereby the seller agreed to furnish the buyer all the mason's materials required for the construction of certain houses. It was held that the buyer was bound to receive and the seller to deliver, and that the obligation was mutual. In Walker Mfg. Co. v. Swift & Co. (C. C. A.) 200 F. 529, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 730, the agreement was to furnish from 175,000 to 225,000 pounds of meat during a certain period of time, followed by the provision: "We take care of buyer's needs this year." It was held that the agreement imposed upon the seller the duty of furnishing the ordinary needs of the buyer in his line of business for the period of time covered by the contract, even though the amount stated therein should be exceeded, and that the objection of lack of mutuality did not apply. In Laclede Const. Co. v. Moss Tie Co., 185 Mo. 25, 84 S. W. 76, the contract consisted of a letter proposing to furnish all the railroad ties which the buyer might need, to the number of 1,000,000 or less, at a certain price, the buyer accepting the proposition by letter. It was held that this contract was mutual. In this case parol evidence of the surrounding facts and circumstances was admitted to show the purpose, meaning, and intent of the contract. A similar case is that of National Furnace Co. v. Keystone Mfg. Co., 110 Ill. 427, sustaining the validity of a contract for the sale of all the pig iron which the buyer and manufacturer should need in its business during a designated period of time. See Campfield v. Sauer (C. C. A.) 164 F. 833; Loudenback Fertilizer Co. v. Tennessee Phosphate Co. (C. C. A.) 121 F. 298, 61 L. R. A. 402; Lima Locomotive Works v. Nat. Steel Co. (C. C. A.) 155 F. 77, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 713; Dailey Co. v. Clark Can Co., 128 Mich. 591, 87 N. W. 761; Cooper v. Lansing Wheel Co., 94 Mich. 272, 54 N. W. 39, 34 Am. St. Rep. 341. In Smith v. Morse, 20 La. Ann. 220, the court upheld the validity of a contract by the terms of which an ice manufacturing company was to furnish a hotel company with all the ice it would use in the hotels maintained by it for a certain period of time. The court said, as to the want of mutuality: "This involved the legal proposition that there can be no contract where only one of the parties to it is bound; but it has no application here unless it be supposed that the contract contemplated that it was optional with Morse & Co. to dispense entirely with the use of ice in their large hotels, which is not sanctioned by any reasonable construction that can be placed upon the contract."

We think the trial court was in error in excluding the contract from the consideration of the jury, for which reason it will be necessary to reverse the judgment. Inasmuch, however, as all of the issues, other than those tendered by appellants' counterclaim and set-off, were settled by the judgment in the court below and no objection has been made to that judgment, except with respect to the exclusion from the jury of the evidence tendered in support of the set-off and counterclaim, it will not be necessary upon a retrial of the case for any issues to be considered other than those raised by the second defense and counterclaim.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to permit the introduction into evidence of the contract and specifications in question and of testimony pertinent and material to the issues tendered by defendants' second defense and counterclaim.

PREO v. ROED et al. (Civ. 6743.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 24, 1929.

1. New trial 🔑½—Power to grant new trial and mode of exercising it are statutory.

Power to grant new trial and mode of exercising it are dependent on statute, provisions of which define and limit court's powers, and statute must be followed in making motion for a new trial.

2. Appeal and error 🔑607(1)—Time after notice of decision denying new trial within which party may file demand for record commences to run immediately upon court's failure to pass on motion within two months (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 660, 953a).

Ten days' time "after notice of decision" denying new trial or "other termination" of such motion within which party may file demand for record under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, commences to run immediately upon court's failure to pass on motion within two months under section 660; written notice of decision denying motion not being essential.

3. Appeal and error 🔑607(1)—Reporter's transcript cannot be considered where appellant's request for transcript was not timely made (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Where appellant's request for transcript was not made within time prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, reviewing court cannot consider reporter's transcript in determining appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Murle Preo against B. A. Roed and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Fenston, Williams & Hansen and Frank Kauke, all of Fresno, for appellants.

Gallaher & Jertberg, of Fresno, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. In this action the jury found for the plaintiff and against the defendants and assessed plaintiff's damages in the sum of $7,500. From the judgment entered upon this verdict defendants have appealed.

The action grew out of a collision which took place between a truck owned and operated by defendant B. A. Roed and a motorcycle driven and ridden by plaintiff, it being alleged that defendant Roed was delivering milk of the Jersey Farm Dairy Company, under which name defendant Frank M. Helm, Inc., was doing business, and the damages awarded were for personal injuries received by plaintiff as the result of such collision.

Appellant B. A. Roed has filed no brief, and appellant Frank M. Helm, Inc., in its brief, contends that the judgment should be reversed for the reason that defendant B. A. Roed, whose truck, which was driven by his brother, L. A. Roed, and which collided with the motorcycle driven and ridden by respondent, was not an employee of defendant Frank M. Helm, Inc., but was an independent contractor. Respondent disputes this contention and urges that the evidence and inferences properly deducible therefrom sufficiently support the allegation that B. A. Roed was, at the time of the accident, in the employ and acting as the servant and agent of appellant Frank M. Helm, Inc., and further urges that the reporter's transcript on appeal—the appeal having been taken under the alternative method—cannot be considered for the reason that the notice of appellant to the clerk to prepare the transcript under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure was not given within the time allowed by law, and this court is without jurisdiction to avail itself of the reporter's transcript and therefore the clerk's transcript is the only record in the case properly before the court. If this latter contention of respondent be correct, and there is nothing before the court but the judgment roll, with the complaint stating a cause of action against the defendants, the jury having found a verdict against them, and with every intendment and presumption not contradicted by or inconsistent with the record on appeal being indulged in favor of the judgment of the superior court (Finkelstein v. Cosgrove, 83 Cal. App. 201, 203, 256 P. 608), the judgment must be affirmed.

The verdict of the jury was returned and filed May 26, 1927, and the judgment upon such verdict was duly entered on the same day. On June 1, 1927, 5 days after verdict and entry of judgment, the defendants served and filed their notice of intention to move for a new trial. On August 22, 1927, 88 days after the verdict and entry of judgment, defendants served and filed their notice of appeal. On August 22, 1927, 88 days after the verdict and entry of judgment and 27 days after the expiration of the two months' time within which, under the law (Code Civ. Proc. § 660), the court could pass upon the motion for a new trial, and at which time—the motion not having been presented—it was denied by operation of law, the defendants served and filed their notice to the county clerk requesting that the transcript of the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, instructions given at the request of plaintiff and offered and requested by defendants, etc., be made up and prepared.

Appellant Frank M. Helm, Inc.—the only appellant in the action filing briefs—has completely ignored the question raised by respondent as to the court's jurisdiction to avail itself of the reporter's transcript, devoting its entire argument in an effort to show that the evidence does not support the conclusion that defendant Roed at the time of the accident was its servant or agent.

[1] The defendants filed their motion for a new trial within ten days after the verdict, but did not further prosecute it and never made the motion in court, and the time for passing upon the motion by the court expired July 26, 1927, two months after the verdict of the jury, at which time the motion was denied without further order of the court (Code Civ. Proc. § 660), and defendants, under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, had to and including August 5, 1927, within which to file notice to the clerk requesting a transcript of the testimony and the record generally; such section providing: "Said notice must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment, order or decree, or if a proceeding on motion for new trial be pending, within ten days after notice of decision denying said motion, or of other termination thereof." The power to grant a new trial and the mode of exercising that power are dependent upon the statute, the provisions of which define and limit the powers of the court in granting a new trial. The right to move for a new trial is statutory, and must be pursued in the methods pointed out by the statute. Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 78 P. 11; Townley v. Adams, 118 Cal. 382, 50 P. 550.

[2] It has been held in this state that where a right depends upon notice of a fact or proceeding, and not upon service of notice, actual notice or knowledge shown by facts appearing in the records of the court is sufficient. Brown v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 141, 165 P. 429. As is said in Bernschein v. Whitaker, 175 Cal. 130, 165 P. 523: "The ten days' time 'after notice of decision' denying a motion for new trial or 'other termination' of such a motion, within which a party may file demand for record under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, or may serve a proposed bill of exceptions under section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure, commences to run immediately upon the failure of the trial court to pass on the motion within three months [now, by 1923 amendment, two months] after the verdict of the jury or service on the moving party of notice of decision of the court (Code Civ. Proc., sec. 660). Written notice of the decision denying the motion is not essential under these particular statutory provisions. Actual notice only is required, and in the event of such a termination of the new trial proceeding, as we have stated, the law itself gives the notice."

[3] The notice to the clerk, requesting the transcript, being filed beyond the ten-day limit prescribed in the statute, the question remaining is: May the court consider the reporter's transcript in determining the appeal? This question is directly passed upon in Hume v. Lindholm, 85 Cal. App. 80, 83, 258 P. 1003, 1005, in which the court says: "Defendant's request for a transcript having been made more than ten days after said actual notice, we hold that the request for the reporter's transcript was not made within the statutory time as to the judgment, and, therefore, cannot be considered as a part of the record on which to consider said appeal from the judgment (Spear v. Monroe, 181 Cal. 728, 186 P. 149; Brown v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 141, 165 P. 429)."

Under the authority of Hume v. Lindholm, supra, the reporter's transcript not being available for consideration by the court, on the record as presented the judgment must be and it is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

1. Mortgages 🔑37(2)—Grantor may give oral testimony that deed was intended as mortgage.

Grantor may give oral testimony that deed was in fact intended as mortgage.

2. Mortgages 🔑175—Attaching creditor, not showing it relied on condition of title, could not invoke statute providing that deed cannot be shown to be mortgage as against subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer for value without notice (Civ. Code, § 2925.)

Where husband and wife signed deed of wife's land to loan society, and grantee later deeded land back to husband and wife, attaching creditor of husband could not invoke Civ. Code, § 2925, providing that deed may be shown to have been intended as mortgage, except as against subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer for value without notice, where such creditor did not show that it parted with value in reliance on condition of title, or that its action was in any manner influenced by condition of title, and court properly admitted evidence that deed was intended as mortgage.

3. Evidence 🔑20(1)—It is common knowledge that institutions lending money on security require signature of both husband and wife.

It is common knowledge that banks and other institutions lending money on security require signature of both husband and wife to all documents, so that no question of community property may arise.

4. Mortgages 🔑173—Statute providing that grant intended to be defeasible is not defeated, unless instrument of defeasance is recorded, is intended to protect only persons relying on record title (Civ. Code, § 2950).

Civ. Code, § 2950, providing that grant purporting to be an absolute conveyance, but intended to be defeasible, is not defeated or affected, as against any person other than grantee or persons having actual notice, unless instrument of defeasance is recorded, is intended to protect persons dealing with real property in reliance on record title, and one not relying on record title could not claim protection of statute.

5. Mortgages ⚷38(4)—Grantor's testimony that deed was intended as mortgage held sufficient evidence that it was so intended.

Where husband and wife deeded wife's land to loan society, and loan society later deeded land back to husband and wife, in action by wife against attaching creditor of husband to quiet title, plaintiff's testimony that deed was in effect intended as mortgage was sufficient evidence that it was intended as mortgage, in absence of any evidence as to grantee's understanding of transaction.

6. Deeds ⚷194(5)—Where deed from husband to wife was recorded and placed in safe deposit box accessible to wife, there was presumption of delivery.

Where deed from husband to wife of his interest in land was placed in safe deposit box to which wife had access, there was presumption of delivery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Mary E. Say against the Crocker First National Bank of San Francisco, substituted as defendant in the place and stead of the Crocker National Bank of San Francisco. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Morrison, Hohfeld, Foerster, Shuman & Clark, of San Francisco (W. E. Simpson, of Fresno, and F. C. Hutchens, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts and A. W. Carlson, all of Fresno, for respondent.

NEEDHAM, Justice pro tem. This is a suit by Mary E. Say, a married woman, and wife of W. H. Say, against the defendant, to quiet title to land in Fresno county. The defendant denied the title of the plaintiff, and alleged the superiority over plaintiff's title of an attachment lien levied against the land in an action brought by the defendant against W. H. Say, the husband of the plaintiff, Ivan McIndoo and Henry Ross. The defendant also sets up as a separate and distinct defense that a certain deed executed by W. H. Say to his wife, the plaintiff, on April 7, 1924, and recorded the same day, about six weeks before the attachment in question was levied, was made with intent and for the purpose of defrauding creditors and particularly the defendant.

At the trial of the case the plaintiff Mary E. Say was the only witness called. No witnesses whatsoever were called by the defendant and appellant. A chain of the record title to the land in question was introduced in evidence. Mrs. Say testified that the land, which is the subject of this litigation, was deeded to her by her mother, and was her separate property. She further testified as to the time of this conveyance, and the deeds were duly placed in evidence in support of her testimony. The chain of title to the land in question showed that on December 7, 1895, a deed, signed by the plaintiff and her husband, W. H. Say, of the land in dispute, to the California Savings & Loan Society, was recorded in Fresno county. This deed was in form an absolute grant, and did not on its face contain a defeasance clause, which would indicate that it was given as security for any debt, or was intended as a mortgage.

The California Savings & Loan Society deeded on November 16, 1896, this same property to one J. C. Reis. This deed was also an absolute grant in form, and contained no defeasance clause. On November 23, 1896, a deed of this property was executed by Reis to the plaintiff, Mary E. Say, and her husband, W. H. Say, and which deed the plaintiff testified was intended as a reconveyance of the property to her; she having paid the loan personally. After this time, to wit, November 23, 1896, the record title stood apparently in the name of Mary E. Say and W. H. Say, her husband, who thereafter jointly executed certain deeds of trust to banks for loans which are not here material, except as they may have given some notice to the appellant of the true nature of the title. This condition of the title continued until April 7, 1924, on which date there was recorded in Fresno county a deed from W. H. Say to the plaintiff, his wife; the consideration being love and affection, conveying all of W. H. Say's title and interest in the property to the plaintiff.

On May 24, 1924, the defendant attached the interest of W. H. Say in this property in the suit heretofore referred to against W. H. Say, Ivan McIndoo, and Henry Ross. This writ of attachment, with the return thereon, was introduced in evidence as an exhibit, and it shows that the demand against these defendants, Say, McIndoo, and Ross, was for the total sum of $56,214.79, besides interest and costs, and the return of the sheriff thereon shows that real property of each of these defendants, to wit, Say, Ross, and McIndoo, was levied upon. No attempt was made by the defendant at the trial to show when this indebtedness accrued; whether before or after November 23, 1896, the date the property in controversy was reconveyed to Mrs. Say, as testified to by her, upon the payment by her of the indebtedness to satisfy the loan which, she testified, was originally given to the California Savings & Loan Society.

[1] At the trial, over the objection of the appellant, the plaintiff testified that the deed to the California Savings & Loan Society was not given or intended as an absolute grant of the property, but that the same was, in fact, a mortgage of the property. The right of the plaintiff to so testify—that is, give oral testimony that a deed was in fact intended as a mortgage—has been upheld many times by our courts. See Hillwig v. Boyer, 81 Cal. App. 763, 254 P. 662; 17 Cal. Jur. 735, 756. Plaintiff also testified, as before stated, as to the payment of the loan, and it appears with sufficient certainty from the record that the deed of November 23, 1896, from Reis to Mrs. Say and her husband, was in fact executed as a form of reconveyance or satisfaction of this indebtedness, in the absence of contrary testimony. As stated, the defendant called no witnesses, and therefore it does not appear in the record when W. H. Say became indebted to the defendant, or what was the nature of this indebtedness, nor was any showing given why the attachment levied in 1924 has apparently never been reduced to a judgment.

While the appellant contended that the deed of April 7, 1924, was in fraud of creditors, it offered no evidence whatever in support of this contention, and as the record now stands there was nothing upon which the trial court could base any finding of fraud or intent to defraud. With respect to the deed of April 7, 1924, from W. H. Say to his wife, the plaintiff, she testified that she found this deed in a safe deposit box some time in the summer preceding the trial. She was unable to state when she first saw the deed, nor how it came to be in the deposit box.

The appellant contends that the judgment of the trial court should be reversed and sets up the following points:

(1) That the appellant is a purchaser or incumbrancer without notice of the true character of the deed to the California Savings & Loan Society, and therefore is entitled to claim that the deed was absolute in form, and that the reconveyance vested the title in W. H. Say and his wife as tenants in common as to an undivided half interest.

(2) That, even if the deed were in fact a mortgage, there was no sufficient evidence offered by the plaintiff to establish this point.

(3) That there was no sufficient delivery of the deed from W. H. Say to his wife, Mary E. Say, dated April 7, 1924, and that the attachment vested before the deed became effective.

Appellant's first contention is based upon section 2950 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "When a grant of real property purports to be an absolute conveyance, but is intended to be defeasible on the performance of certain conditions, such grant is not defeated or affected as against any person other than the grantee or his heirs or devisees, or persons having actual notice, unless an instrument of defeasance, duly executed and acknowledged, shall have been recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county where the property is situated." And also it is claimed it finds support in section 2925 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "The fact that a transfer was made subject to defeasance on a condition, may, for the purpose of showing such transfer to be a mortgage, be proved (except as against a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer for value and without notice) though the fact does not appear by the terms of the instrument."

[2] We are of the opinion, however, that the appellant has failed to bring itself within the rule of the foregoing sections. No evidence was produced to show that, if W. H. Say borrowed money of the said defendant bank, the action of said bank in making the loan was in any way influenced by the apparent ownership of W. H. Say in the property in question. It was not shown that the bank had in any manner parted with value in reliance upon the condition of this title, or that its action was in any manner influenced by the condition of the title. It would seem that, if such had been the fact, it was within the power of the appellant to have produced either the officers or the records of the Crocker National Bank, which would have established it as a fact, if such was the fact. Under the circumstances, we do not see how appellant can be held to be a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer for value and without notice, as defined in section 2925 of the Civil Code, and we are constrained to hold that the action of the trial court admitting the evidence as to the nature of the transaction was, under the circumstances, free from error, and that the finding of the trial court in that regard finds support in the evidence.

[3, 4] For the same reason, the appellant here has not brought itself within the provisions of section 2950 of the Civil Code. Even giving the last-named section its fullest effect, as contended by the appellant, there is nothing in the chain of title to the property which would warrant upholding the appellant's position. The grant in question had already been, in legal effect, erased by the conveyance back to the plaintiff by J. C. Reis. It is common knowledge that banks and other institutions lending money upon security require the signature of both husband and wife to all documents, so that no question of community property law may arise, and we think it would be a harsh and unwarranted extension of the principles laid down in section 2950 of the Civil Code to hold that a transaction of the kind here noticed should be conclusive against the real owner of the property, merely because in some transaction the name of the husband appeared as an apparent owner of the property. We can conceive of cases where the evidence clearly shows that the attaching creditor parted with value upon the apparent title, and that the owners of the property had knowledge of such condition, and do not mean to say that in such cases the rule claimed by the appellant might not apply. But in the present case the elements of estoppel are entirely lacking. We think that the plain intent of section 2950 of the Civil Code was to protect persons who dealt with real property in reliance upon the record title. Appellant has, however, entirely failed to show where its position or action was in any manner based upon the apparent record title, and having introduced no evidence whatever, and in the absence of any such evidence, the court was justified in refusing to assume a fact which it was within the power of the appellant to show, if it had existed.

[5] As to the second point of appellant—that is, there was not sufficient evidence that the deed to the California Savings & Loan Society was intended as a mortgage, because it was not shown that the grantee so understood the transaction—it does appear, however, that the articles of incorporation of the savings and loan society were on file in Fresno county. No reason is shown why the appellant could not have shown that the deed was not intended as a mortgage by one of the officers of this loan association, if it still exists, or why no other evidence to controvert the testimony of the plaintiff was not offered in evidence. We are of the opinion that, standing alone and without conflict, the testimony of the plaintiff that the deed was in fact intended as a mortgage is sufficient to sustain the judgment, in the absence of any evidence as to the grantee's understanding of the transaction.

As to the third point of the appellant, that the delivery of the deed from W. H. Say to his wife was not sufficiently shown, this becomes more or less unimportant, in view of the disposition of the two foregoing points. Once it has been established that the plaintiff was entitled to show the true nature of the conveyance to the savings and loan society, and to show that her husband in fact had no title to the property, but had signed his name merely as a precaution to the savings and loan society, then a deed from him under such circumstances would not add anything to the plaintiff's title nor could the absence of such deed detract from the title.

[6] In any event, the evidence shows with sufficient clearness that the deed was recorded, and that it was placed in a safe deposit box to which the plaintiff, Mary E. Say, had access. Under the circumstances, there is a presumption of delivery which, not having been controverted, is sufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court. The case of Ward v. Dougherty, 75 Cal. 240, 17 P. 193, 7 Am. St. Rep. 151, holds that the possession of a deed by the grantee is prima facie evidence of delivery, and under section 1055 of the Civil Code is presumed to have been delivered at its date. Also in the case of Zihn v. Zihn, 153 Cal. 405, 95 P. 868, it is held that the burden is on the party asserting the nondelivery of a deed to overcome the presumption of delivery. As the appellant failed to present any evidence, it follows that it did not assume this burden, and therefore is in no position to complain. We think it may be assumed that this deed was given to correct the record; that is, to show that the property was the separate property of Mrs. Say.

The respondent argues that the appellant is not a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer, but at most is a mere lienholder, and cites 5 California Jurisprudence, 321, where it is stated: "A mere lienholder * * * is not a purchaser or incumbrancer for value," etc. We find it is unnecessary to pass upon this point, however, because, from what has been said, the judgment herein should be affirmed upon other grounds. However, as bearing upon this point, see Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 564, Plant v. Smythe, 45 Cal. 161.

We have carefully examined the authorities cited by appellant, but we do not think it necessary to refer to them in detail; it is sufficient to say they are not applicable to the situation shown in the record in the instant case.

For the reasons stated, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by A. A. Heer against Nathan Moran. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Marvin C. Hix, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Charles A. Shurtleff, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This action was commenced to set aside a settlement between partners and for an accounting. The court below refused to order an accounting and gave judgment for defendant. Plaintiff presents this appeal. Plaintiff and defendant were attorneys at law. In January, 1920, they formed a partnership for the practice of law, which was to continue at the pleasure of the parties. Upon the formation of the partnership it was agreed between the parties that all profits made by them or either of them in the practice of law during the existence of said partnership should belong to said partnership and should be divided between the parties share and share alike. Annually, after the close of each calendar year of said partnership, accountings were had and accounts settled between the parties. Pursuant to said agreement of partnership, plaintiff and defendant practiced law as such partners and under the firm name of Moran and Heer until on or about May 24, 1923, at which date notice of dissolution of said partnership was given. This notice was given on the date specified, by defendant to plaintiff, and the dissolution was acquiesced in by plaintiff; but the parties continued their business relations until about September 14, 1923, and on or about that date a settlement of their partnership was made. The finding of the trial court is as follows: That on the 14th day of September, 1923, plaintiff and defendant discussed at length, and not briefly, the business and assets of the said partnership, which said discussion was for a final and definite settlement and accounting of, and that the same resulted in an accounting and settlement of the affairs of said partnership between plaintiff and defendant. That plaintiff then and there freely and understandingly subscribed and delivered to defendant an instrument in writing, as follows:

"San Francisco, September 15, 1923.

"Received of Nathan Moran the sum of Six Thousand Dollars ($6000.00) in full satisfaction of all claims and demands in respect of the partnership heretofore existing between us, and in further consideration of which I hereby assign and transfer to the said Nathan Moran all my right, title and interest in and to the property, assets and accounts of the said partnership which is hereby dissolved and terminated.

"[Signed] A. A. Heer."

The trial court found further: "Defendant did not at any time make to plaintiff any false or untruthful misrepresentations. Plaintiff did not rely upon the representations made by the defendant, nor act wholly or at all upon belief or reliance therein, and did not by reason thereof accept from defendant the said sum of $6,000 as payment in full of plaintiff's share of the then accrued and undivided profits, business, good will and assets or any of them, of the said partnership. Further it is found: Said statements and representations were not, nor were any statements or representations made by defendant false or untrue, nor were the same or any of them then or at any time known to defendant to be untrue nor were untrue. Said statements and representations were not, nor were any of them made by defendant with the intent to mislead or defraud the plaintiff nor to induce him to accept the said sum of $6,000 in full of his share of the assets and profits of said business. At the time said representations were made, plaintiff had ample means of ascertaining the truth or falsity of the same equally as good and as available as those of the defendant, and plaintiff did, between May 24, 1923, and September 14, 1923, frequently, fully and carefully investigate the business, affairs and accounts of the said partnership. And in the settlement of the affairs of said partnership the plaintiff relied upon his own investigations, knowledge and means of knowledge."

[1, 2] The findings referred to find sufficient support in the evidence before the court. It may be true that certain evidence offered by plaintiff would have supported different findings, but that is a matter that gives us no concern. In Hotaling v. Hotaling, 187 Cal. 699, 203 P. 747, we find this apt language: "The trial judge was called upon to delicately adjust the balance so as to determine upon which side * * * the preponderance might lie, while upon this appeal our only duty is to ascertain if there was any substantial showing in behalf of the court's finding to give rational support to the conclusion reached." Further in the same case it is said: "We have but touched upon a review of the voluminous evidence, because of the fact that it is too manifest that any nice distinctions in these matters are foreclosed by the findings of the trial court" and again: "We find in this record on appeal many reasons for putting a more favorable construction upon the defendant's side of this controversy than were indulged by the trial court, but upon a review of the whole case, it is clear that the findings which support the judgment have substantial support in the evidence." In Aronson & Co. v. Pearson, 199 Cal. at page 303, 249 P. 195, it is said: "But where the evidence is sufficient to support conflicting inferences, the finding of the trial court either way thereon is conclusive on appeal. The evidence must be viewed in the light most favorable to the support of the findings and judgment." Without further citation of authority it may be said that there is no rule of appellate procedure which is more generally recognized and followed than the rule announced in the cases cited. The record before us consists of the testimony of the parties and certain documentary evidence. Excerpts from the testimony or inferences that may be drawn from the documents offered may lend color to the argument of appellant. But if we should detail here all of the evidence and analyze each alleged discrepancy we would still have the labor of setting at naught the rule announced, before we could disturb the finding. It might, however, be noted that both of the parties to this action are practicing attorneys of great experience. They had several months within which to settle their affairs and all of the business affairs of the partnership were matters of public record. Each of them was qualified to protect himself in any transaction and each knew the effect of the written agreement of settlement. Neither required independent advice nor was either reliant upon the representations of the other. With this condition existing it would not require evidence to the degree of demonstration to support the court's finding. We conclude that at the date of the written settlement everything was fairly and fully adjusted.

[3, 4] There remains, however, another contention of the appellant. Prior to the formation of the partnership the defendant Moran had been associated with other counsel in representing the executors of the Hearst estate. Though associated, he was not the attorney for the executors, but merely employed by the attorneys of record. Before the formation of the partnership between the parties hereto, the attorneys for the executors of the Hearst estate, with the consent of the said executors, arranged with defendant Moran that the latter should conduct all legal proceedings thereafter required in the course of the administration of the said estate and for such service should receive half of the attorney's fees allowed in the probate court. Under this arrangement the original attorneys for the executors still remained the attorneys of record in the probate proceeding. The defendant Moran did account for all fees received through the said Hearst estate employment up to the date of the dissolution of the partnership and likewise for all fees received thereafter excepting as will be noted as we proceed. After the Hearst estate was, to all intents, settled, and ordered distributed, and at a time subsequent to the dissolution of the partnership, there arose some questions regarding the claim of the federal government for additional income taxes accrued against Mrs. Hearst during her lifetime. This matter of unpaid federal taxes had never been handled by defendant Moran or by the attorneys with whom he had been associated in estate matters. The entire matter of federal income taxes, both before and after the death of Mrs. Hearst, had been in the hands of other counsel and had remained separate from and not connected with the administration of the estate. The trial court found upon sufficient evidence that defendant Moran at the time of the settlement of the partnership affairs had no reason to believe or know and he did not believe or know that this business was to be subsequently entrusted to him. However, that was what did happen. At a date subsequent to the dissolution of the partnership and the settlement of the affairs thereof, the executors of the Hearst estate retained Moran to represent them in these income tax matters, and from this service he has received large sums of money from the date of his retainer down to the commencement of this action, namely, in June, 1925. Plaintiff argues that such receipts were partnership assets and his right to participate therein. The trial court found that his employment was a new one and unforeseen and unanticipated and wholly individual to the defendant. We are not inclined to scrutinize the finding, but mention it merely as illustrating the situation at the time of the settlement. Any amounts that might have been received after the date of the settlement would be a matter of accounting. Plaintiff would not be entitled to enter into these questions without first establishing his right to an accounting. It is conceded that if the settlement agreement is binding and the right of the parties determined and settled thereby, then as long as the said settlement agreement stands no accounting will be ordered. The burden of proof is on plaintiff to prove his right to an accounting, and if he fails to sustain it, judgment must be for defendant. 1 Cor. Jur., p. 642. If we should proceed with the contention of appellant here and review all of the authorities cited on the question of what business might or might not have had the origin during the term of partnership, and if we should conclude that plaintiff, on an account taken, as claimed, we would still have before us the fact that plaintiff has precluded himself by the terms of an agreement found to be fair and binding.

Without evading the issue attempted, there was much evidence to support a conclusion that the relationship between defendant Moran and the Hearst estate was merely by grace of the attorneys of record therein, who had been his former employer. It was evident that Moran was not intrusted with the sole management of the affairs of the estate, but the business was brought to him from time to time and finally the bulk of the would be entitled to a share in the business probate matter was turned over to him. At no time could it be distinctly classed as his business or the business of the partnership of Moran and Heer. The case as a whole discloses a situation where two lawyers, without great practice, were employed by a large firm of attorneys. Moran, the defendant, was apparently closer in the confidence of the employers. Heer, the plaintiff, was receiving a small salary more like that paid to a clerk. The employing firm in a way withdraws from practice, and the two former employees establish an independent firm with no fixed income or attractive prospects. Moran, through his familiarity with the business of the Hearst estate, is given, from time to time, much remunerative work and shares the proceeds with Heer to an extent greatly in excess of the former income of the latter. Then when the firm of Moran & Heer is dissolved it happens that the Hearst executors, owing to the death of one of their attorneys and the removal of the other from the state, decide that Moran, on account of his familiarity with the estate matters, would be a logical choice as their advisor in certain new matters that have arisen. On the whole we are convinced that no injustice results to plaintiff in holding him bound by his settlement, and the trial court doubtless concluded that he had secured throughout fair and honorable treatment. The final finding of the trial court is as follows: "No accounting between plaintiff and defendant of the business, profits and assets of said partnership of Moran and Heer, from its beginning or for any time, is necessary to determine the respective rights of plaintiff and defendant. That notice of dissolution of said partnership was given and accepted on or about May 24, 1923, and on September 14, 1923, a full and complete settlement and accounting was had between the parties, at which time plaintiff was possessed of full knowledge of the business of said firm and had access to its records and accounts and that plaintiff thereupon freely and voluntarily entered into and made the said settlement and gave to defendant in writing a receipt in full of plaintiff's interest in said partnership and a release of all claims and liability." This finding is sufficiently supported by the evidence.

[5] Much is said in the briefs on the question of an effectual rescission. Under the findings plaintiff established no right to rescind nor did he prove the existence of any ground of rescission. Therefore, whether he did or did not give sufficient notice of rescission, or whether or not he made proper offer of restoration, became quite immaterial. Some other minor assignments of error are urged by appellant. These have been considered, but in view of what has been stated the judgment could in no wise be affected thereby.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Actions by Samuel Sanborn against E. Ballanfonte and another. Judgments for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. E. Borton and James Petrini, both of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Willis S. Mitchell, of Los Angeles, T. F. Allen, of Bakersfield, Henry St. Rayner, and Wm. S. White, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANDIS, Justice pro tem. The above-entitled actions were consolidated for the purposes of appeal. Action No. 6694 was tried in and appealed from Los Angeles county, and action No. 6695 tried in and appealed from Kern county. The appeals are from the judgments rendered in favor of plaintiff for advance royalties payable monthly which had accrued under two executory contracts whereby plaintiff granted unto defendants, in consideration of the covenants contained in the said contracts, the exclusive right to drill for, produce, and market oil and gas from the lands described for a period of 20 years, and all extensions of plaintiff's government lease, less 30 days. There are two contracts involved in each case, and they are identical in form, but cover different lands and provide for different amounts to be paid as monthly advance royalties, and each action covers a different period of time. The following discloses the material portions of the contracts sufficient for the purpose of considering the questions involved, to wit:

"Plaintiff is first party and defendants second parties: Contracts recite that first party has been granted a permit to prospect for oil and gás and to lease under the Act of February 25th, 1920 (Public No. 146), sections 2 and 11 of T. 27 S., R. 18 E., Mt. B. & M. in Kern County, California, and that second parties are desirous of developing oil and gas on a portion of said lands. * * *

"Now, therefore, the first party for and in consideration of the payments, agreements and stipulations hereinafter specified does hereby grant to said second parties the exclusive right to drill for, produce and market oil and gas from the following described portion of said lands pursuant to the terms of said permit and the lease or leases to be hereafter granted by the U. S. Government, to-wit: (Here follows description of the land.)

"In consideration of which the second parties do hereby agree as follows: In substance, to comply with and abide by all the terms and regulations of said permit * * * and with all regulations of the Department of the Interior relating thereto; to furnish such bonds as are required by the United States Government; pay all royalties accruing to the United States Government and pay 93 per cent, of all taxes that may be levied against said lands."

It then provides as follows:

"Said second parties agree and are hereby bound unto said first party to install upon said lands a substantial and adequate drilling outfit, and to begin actual drilling operations thereon within sixty days from the date hereof, and to drill diligently and continuously thereon until an aggregate of four wells are completed and brought into production;

"In the event that second parties drill first well to a depth of 2,000 feet and oil or gas in commercial quantities is not encountered therein, second parties may, at their option, by a good and sufficient instrument in writing, cancel this contract and abandon lands covered thereby, without any further obligations to first party;

"Said second parties agree and are hereby bound unto said first party to pay to said first party a royalty of seven per cent. of all of the oil and gas produced on said lands, or seven per cent. of the receipts from the sale thereof, at the option of the first party. Said royalties are to be paid on the 15th of each and every month following the month in which produced;

"This contract shall cover the entire term of first party's lease of twenty years and all extensions thereof, less thirty days;

"Said second parties agree and are hereby bound unto first party to pay to first party an advance royalty of $300 per month, same to be paid as follows: $300 upon the execution of this contract and $300 on the 25th day of each and every month thereafter until such time as first party's royalties from the sale of oil or gas begin to exceed $300 per month, after which time said royalties so advanced shall be deducted from the excess royalties of first party, over and above $300 per month, until all of said royalties so advanced have been refunded;

"Any and all advance royalties paid to first party by second parties shall not be refunded to second parties except as above specified;

"Second parties to furnish logs and data necessary in making reports to the government."

The above contract provides for monthly payments of $300 and the other contract for monthly payments of $675, and each covers different lands.

It is shown that pursuant to the provisions of said contracts defendants paid to plaintiff the monthly payments of $300 for the months of May, June, July, and August, 1923, and the monthly payments of $675 for the months of May, June, and July, 1923, and failed to pay any monthly payments thereafter falling due, and at all times failed to comply with any and all of the terms and conditions of said contracts, except the above-mentioned payments of monthly advance royalties.

In action No. 6695 (Kern county action), commenced July 3, 1924, plaintiff sought to recover under the contract providing for $300 monthly payments the sum of $3,000, covering the 10 months beginning with September, 1923, and ending with June, 1924, and under the contract providing for $675 monthly payments the sum of $7,425 covering the 11 months beginning with August, 1923, and ending with June, 1924.

In action No. 6694 (Los Angeles county action), commenced April 29, 1925, plaintiff sought to recover under the contract providing for $300 monthly payments the sum of $3,000 covering the 10 months beginning with July, 1924, and ending with March, 1925, and under the contract providing for $675 monthly payments the sum of $6,750 covering the same 10 months, and as a third cause of action sought to recover the total amount under a common count in assumpsit for money in the principal sum of $9,750, and $425.45 interest; and by supplemental complaint filed March 5, 1926, sought to recover an additional $975 covering the monthly payment falling due May 25, 1925, $300 under one contract and $675 under the other contract. Subsequent to the commencement of said actions, to wit, on June 15, 1925, plaintiff caused written notice to be served on defendants notifying them that all their rights under the two contracts involved herein "are terminated and ended from and after the date of service" of the notice and all their rights to the lands involved are terminated and ended. Then follows a recital of the reasons for the termination, involving various breaches of the terms of the contracts, and the statement:

"You are further notified that this notice is not, and shall not be construed to be a waiver of payment of any advance royalty which has fallen due by the terms of said contracts prior to the date of service on you of this notice, but it is expressly stated herein that no demands will be made by the undersigned for payment of advance royalties under the said contracts or either of them except for the payment of advance royalties which have fallen due under said contracts prior to the date of service on you of this notice.

"You are further notified that nothing in this notice shall be construed to be a waiver or abandonment by the undersigned of any claim for damages arising by reason of your breach of the said contract."

Under their amended answer defendants urged several defenses, none of which was sustained by the trial court, the last one of which appears to be the only one seriously urged on these appeals, and is as follows: "That by service of notice of June 15, 1925, and defendants' assent thereto, the defendants were released from liability under the contracts for payment of previously as well as subsequently accruing installments of rental."

It is the contention of defendants that by the service on defendants of said notice under date of June 15, 1925, plaintiff rescinded the contracts and that the legal effect of such rescission is that from the time of such rescission the contracts became in legal effect void ab initio.

Counsel for defendants concede that it is the rule, regarding ordinary leases for ordinary rental for use and occupation of the ground, that a rescission by the landlord for breach of condition terminates all future liability for rent, but has no effect upon liability for the rentals already accrued at the date of cancellation, and contend that the contracts here involved are not leases, but are in legal effect conditional contracts of sale where the installments are paid, not as rental but as the purchase price for the thing being sold, and that a rescission or cancellation relates back to the beginning of the contract and cancels installments accrued but unpaid, as well as all future installments.

In other words, defendants ignore the terms of the surrender or termination and seek to invoke a forfeiture of plaintiff's right to recover previously accruing installments on the theory that the relation between the parties was that of vendor and vendee, and not lessor and lessee; and by applying the rules applicable to an ordinary conditional and installments sale of realty.

[1] From the undisputed facts that solemn contracts in writing were entered into by and between the parties by the terms of which plaintiff grants to defendants certain rights and privileges, to wit, the exclusive right to drill for, produce and market oil and gas from certain described lands, in consideration of which defendants agree to perform certain conditions among which they agree to pay monthly to plaintiff certain sums therein set forth, that defendants did meet said monthly payments for several months and then not only failed to make any further monthly payments, but failed to perform any of the other covenants agreed to be performed, eliminating from consideration the legal effect of said notice and acquiescence, it very clearly appears that at the time the notice was served upon defendants, under the express terms of the written contracts, defendants were indebted to plaintiff in the several sums sued for, and for which judgments were rendered, and if such rights are lost to plaintiff, it must result from the legal effect of the acts of the parties involved in the serving of said notice by plaintiff and the acquiescence in the notice and the demands of the notice by defendants.

[2, 3] Obviously, therefore, the real issue is one of construction and determination of the legal effect of such acts of the parties. An executory contract may be rescinded, abandoned, or terminated, either wholly or in part, by the mutual consent of the respective parties at any stage of their performance. 6 Cal. Jur. § 230, p. 382; Tompkins v. Davidow, 27 Cal. App. 327, 149 P. 788. "Termination" or "cancellation" of a conditional contract means to abrogate so much of it as remains unperformed, doing away with an existing agreement upon the terms and with the consequences mentioned in the writing, and different from "rescission," which means to restore the parties to their former position. Young v. Flickinger, 75 Cal. App. 171, 174, 242 P. 516, Winton v. Spring, 18 Cal. 451.

[4] A reservation of rights contained in a mutual agreement of termination of future rights and obligations under an executory contract is binding upon the parties to it. Winton v. Spring, supra, 451; Young v. Flickinger, supra, 174 (242 P. 516) Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 582, 229 P. 327; McCreery v. Day, 119 N. Y. 1, 23 N. E. 198, 6 L. R. A. 503, 16 Am. St. Rep. 793; Kromér v. Heim, 75 N. Y. 574, 31 Am. St. Rep. 491.

[5] What did the parties mean by the transaction consisting of plaintiff's serving of the notice to terminate or cancel the contracts and the acquiescence of defendants in said notice and the demands contained therein?

When ascertained, that intention must prevail.

It very clearly appears that instead of said notice and acquiescence constituting a rescission of said contracts, and rendering them void ab initio, as contended by defendants, they constituted an agreement—a meeting of the minds of the parties—in complete settlement of the subject-matter of the contracts, in accordance with the express reservations, terms and conditions set forth therein, under which the rights and obligations of defendants thereafter were to be terminated, manifested what the intention of the parties was in respect thereto and expressly reserved unto plaintiff the right of payment and recovery for the advance royalties which had accrued and matured up to the time of service of the notice and released defendants from all their obligation of payment of all advance royalties accruing under the terms of the contracts subsequent to the time of the service of the notice.

In short, the agreement resulting from said notice and acquiescence did not terminate the contracts, or plaintiff's rights that were expressly reserved thereby, but merely terminated the rights of defendants to the possession and use of the premises and released them from their obligations to pay the advance royalties from and after the date of service of said notice of termination.

What we have said disposes of all points urged by defendants. Having disposed of both cases upon their merits, and having found it necessary to affirm the judgments of the trial courts, makes it unnecessary to decide plaintiff's motion for dismissal and defendants' request for diminution of record.

The judgments are, and each is, affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

PETERS v. UNITED STUDIOS, Inc., et al.★

(Civ. 6706.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 19, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 18, 1929.

1. Master and servant 🔑301(4)—Legal presumption is that employee hired out under rental agreement for operation of instrumentality owned by master remains servant of general employer.

When a master hires out, under rental agreement, the services of employee for operation of instrumentality owned by the master, together with use of instrumentality, without relinquishing power to discharge servant, legal presumption is that, though hirer directs servant where to go and what to do in performance of work, the servant as operator of instrumentality remains, in absence of agreement to contrary, servant of general employer, and negligence of servant constitutes that of owner of instrumentality.

2. Master and servant 🔑301(4)—General employer may lend servant with instrumentality in such manner as to render person to whom servant is loaned special master.

General employer may lend servant together with instrumentality in such manner as to render person to whom servant is loaned the special master pro hac vice, and hence relieve general employer from liability for servant's negligence in operation of instrumentality.

3. Master and servant 🔑301(4)—General employer, to escape liability for negligence of servant loaned to another, must resign full control of servant.

General employer, in order to escape liability for negligence of servant loaned to another, together with instrumentality, must resign full control of servant for the time being.

4. Master and servant 🔑301(4)—Right to exercise control is decisive in determining liability of general employer for negligence of servant loaned to another.

Right to exercise control rather than the mere fact of its exercise is decisive in determining whether general employer is liable for negligence of servant loaned to another.

5. Automobiles 🔑245(29)—Whether employee hired out to another, together with tractor, remained employee of general employer, held for jury.

Whether employee hired out, together with tractor, to another, was special employee or remained employee of general employer so as to render it liable for his negligence in operation of tractor, held for jury, in view of evidence failing to conclusively prove terms of contract of hiring; hence instruction that general employer was liable as matter of law for his negligence was erroneous.

6. Automobiles 🔑246(42)—Instruction authorizing recovery against general employer for negligence of servant hired out to another held erroneous under evidence.

Instruction authorizing recovery against general employer for injuries resulting from negligent operation of tractor by employee hired out to another held erroneous, in view of evidence, in that it assumed liability of general employer for negligence.

7. Automobiles 🔑246(30)—Instruction authorizing recovery for injury from negligent operation of tractor held not erroneous because failing to expressly refer to absence of contributory negligence.

Instruction authorizing recovery for injuries resulting from negligent operation of tractor held not erroneous as to employee because failing to expressly refer to absence of contributory negligence, in view of fact that it negatived its existence by positing employee's negligence as sole proximate cause, particularly since jury were fully instructed elsewhere on subject of contributory negligence.

8. Trial 🔑243—Instructions on contributory negligence held not so conflicting as to mislead jury.

Instructions on subject of contributory negligence, one of which used words "contributed directly and proximately," another "proximately cause," and a third "contributed in any manner proximately," held not so conflicting as to have misled jury, though it would have been better to omit word "directly" in charging thereon.

9. Automobiles 🔑244(6)—Evidence held to sustain finding of negligence as to operator of tractor striking person.

Evidence in action to recover for injuries resulting from being struck by a tractor held sufficient to support finding of negligence as to operator.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by Frederick Peters against United Studios, Inc., and Kenneth Daum. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed as to defendant Daum, and otherwise reversed.

Loeb, Walker & Loeb and Milton H. Schwartz, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendants United Studios, Inc., and Kenneth Daum from a judgment following a verdict against appellants for personal injuries suffered by plaintiff and respondent Peters.

Peters, who is a moving picture actor, was struck and injured by a tractor belonging to appellant United Studios, Inc., and driven by appellant Daum. At the time of the injury Daum was in the general employ of United Studios, Inc., and had been driving the tractor for such employer for more than a year.

★Rehearing denied.

A few days before the injury to Peters, Daum had been sent with the tractor to the Christie Film Company, and, while Daum was driving the tractor in the filming of a scene for a moving picture comedy being made by the Christie Company, the tractor struck and injured Peters, who was one of the characters in the scene.

The court gave the jury the following instruction: "You are instructed that, as a matter of law and as a matter of fact, the defendant Kenneth Daum, in the driving, management and operation of the tractor that struck the plaintiff on the occasion involved here, was the agent and servant of the defendant United Studios, Incorporated, and any act of negligence, if any, on his part, was the act of negligence of said defendant corporation as well as his own."

Appellant United Studios, Inc., asserts (1) that under the evidence Daum at the time of the injury was in the special employ of Christie Film Company so as to relieve United Studios, Inc., of liability for his negligence as a matter of law; or (2) that at least under the evidence the question should have been left to the jury to determine under appropriate instructions whether the Christie Company had not for the time become Daum's special employer so as to relieve the United Studios, Inc., of such liability. This raises the nice question of general and special employer in its application to the doctrine of respondeat superior which has so often troubled trial and appellate courts.

The evidence, which is substantially without conflict, shows that Daum had been and was in the general employ of United Studios, Inc., as a tractor driver; that, from five to seven days before the occurrence of the injury to Peters, Daum was sent with the tractor by his foreman to the Christie Studios. Daum's testimony, as to what his foreman said at that time, which is the only testimony on the subject, was as follows:

"He told me that I was supposed to go over to the Christie Studios and do whatever they wanted done over there; that I was supposed to go along with the tractor, that they wanted a tractor over there and for me to go along and stay with them until they finished what they wanted."

"Well, he says, 'I have got a trip for you over to Christie's Studios.' He said, 'You are supposed to go over there and stay with Christie Studios until they get through,' and do whatever they wanted done over there, using me until they didn't need me any more, and bring it back and report the time after I got through with Christie Studios."

Daum was also told to report to George Brierly, Christie's foreman, and did so. The first day that he arrived at Christie's the Christie people attached two angle irons to the front of the tractor. Then it was put on a truck and taken to Wilmington. At Wilmington it was used in filming certain scenes of a motion picture, on one occasion being driven by Jimmie Adams, a Christie comedian, and on the other occasions by appellant Daum. In one scene Daum was dressed in Adams' clothes and made up to look like Adams, "doubling for" Jimmie Adams. In the other scenes Daum wore his own clothes and was not made up. In one scene Daum pushed a series of boxes or crates along the pier and in another successively shoved seven crates off the pier into the water with a moving picture actor on top of each crate. At one time at Wilmington the tractor was left running around in circles with no driver and without anybody within forty feet of it. Daum remained at Wilmington with the tractor about four or five days. During that time the tractor was kept each night in a warehouse furnished by the Christie Company. The scenes in which the tractor was used were directed by one Watson, a Christie director. Watson told Daum what to do, but did not undertake to interfere with the mechanical operation of the tractor. Watson testified that he did not arrange with the United Studios, Inc., for the tractor and driver and knew nothing about the contract between Christie's and the United Studios, Inc. He did not talk with anybody about the control which he was to exercise over Daum, but assumed to make what use he saw fit of the tractor and driver.

On the day of the injury to Peters the tractor was brought from Wilmington to the Christie Studios to be used in a scene made to represent a portion of the pier at Wilmington. Daum was to drive the tractor through a doorway and across the stage at a time when Jimmie Adams had fallen down and Adams was to get up and run out of its way. Daum drove the tractor in this manner four or five times and on the last time it struck an obstruction and veered into Peters. In this scene Daum wore no make-up.

Oil and gas were furnished by Christie and Daum kept track of his time and turned it in to the United Studios, Inc., after he took the truck back to them and was paid his regular wages by United Studios, Inc. After the injury to Peters the Christie Company had no further use for the tractor and after the angle irons had been removed, Daum returned with the tractor to the United Studios, Inc.

Other than Daum's testimony as to what he was told to do by his foreman before taking the tractor to Christie's the record is silent as to the contract or arrangement between the United Studios, Inc., and the Christie Company.

There are certain well-settled rules of law applicable to this class of case.

[1] 1. "When a master hires out, under a rental agreement, the services of an employee for the operation of an instrumentality owned by the master, together with the use of the instrumentality, without relinquishing to the hirer the power to discharge such servant, to go where and perform such work as the hirer directs, the legal presumption is that, although the hirer directs the servant where to go and what to do in the performance of the work, the servant as the operator of the instrumentality employed in the doing of the work, remains, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the servant of the general employer in so far as concerns the manner and method of operating the instrumentality, and the negligence of the servant must be held to be that of the owner and not that of the hirer of the instrumentality." Billig v. Southern Pacific Co., 189 Cal. 477, 485, 209 P. 241, 244; 1 Labatt, Master and Servant (2d Ed.) 176.

[2] 2. However, the general employer may lend his servant together with an instrumentality in such a manner as to render the person to whom the servant is loaned the special master pro hac vice, and hence relieve the general employer from liability for the servant's negligence in the operation of the instrumentality. Burns v. Jackson, 59 Cal. App. 662, 211 P. 821; Linstead v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 276 U. S. 28, 48 S. Ct. 241, 72 L. Ed. 453.

[3] 3. But "to escape liability the original master must resign full control of the servant for the time being, it not being sufficient that the servant is partially under the control of a third person; and it is necessary to distinguish between authoritative direction and control and mere suggestions as to details or the necessary cooperation where the work furnished is part of a larger operation." Moss v. Chronicle Pub. Co., 201 Cal. 610, 616, 258 P. 88, 91 (55 A. L. R. 1258); Standard Oil Co. v. Anderson, 212 U. S. 215, 29 S. Ct. 252, 53 L. Ed. 480.

[5] Applying these rules to the evidence above summarized, our problem is this: Under that evidence was the trial court correct in holding that there was no evidence sufficient to overcome the presumption that Daum remained the employee of his general employer, United Studios, Inc., at all times while operating the tractor? And the correct solution of this question depends in turn upon the answer to the further question: Did the United Studios, Inc., surrender wholly and entirely to the Christie Company the right to exercise control over Daum in the operation of the tractor? Because if the United Studios, Inc., retained any right of control over Daum, whether they actually exercised any control at the time of the injury or not becomes immaterial. The question is not "Who was Daum obeying?" but "Who was Daum bound to obey?" Billig v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, page 484 of 189 Cal. (209 P. 241).

Before attempting an answer to these questions it may be well to examine briefly the fundamental basis of the legal presumption that a servant lent or hired with an instrumentality remains the servant of the owner of the instrumentality. The prototype of this class of cases is the case of a driver lent or hired with a horse and carriage. The courts early came to see that the driver, even though borrowed or hired by another, was still performing the services for which he was hired by the owner of the horse and carriage, i. e., driving them. Even though transporting another in the carriage, still in the operation of driving his master's horse and managing his master's carriage he was still doing just what his master had hired him to do. His business for his master was to drive that horse and carriage. The change from a horse-drawn to a self-propelled vehicle creates no change in the basic relation. Daum in driving the tractor, i. e., in its mechanical operation, was doing just what he was employed by the United Studios, Inc., to do. Stewart v. Cal. Imp. Co., 131 Cal. 125, 131, 63 P. 177, 724, 52 L. R. A. 205. It follows that in order to relieve itself from liability under the doctrine of respondeat superior the United Studios, Inc., must affirmatively show that by its agreement with the Christie Company it had for the time surrendered to the latter company all right to control Daum in the operation of its tractor. As the New York Court of Appeals said in a recent case where a steam shovel with its operators had been hired by another:

"The Powers-Kennedy Company, after the shovel had been placed upon the work, directed the engineer of the shovel where to make excavations. It gave no directions as to the details of the work, such as firing the boiler, regulating the steam pressure, applying the levers to start and stop the machinery, maneuvering the boom and bucket, oiling the machinery, or giving care to the steam shovel to keep it in working order. It was important to the defendant, as the owner of the machine, in order that the life of the machine might be preserved, that the engineer and fireman, in respect to these and other details, perform their work with care, skill and judgment.

"When originally employed, the engineer and fireman subjected themselves to the orders of the defendant in respect to all such matters, and became liable to discharge at the defendant's hands, if its orders were disobeyed. In the absence of proof that the defendant, the general employer, surrendered control, in these respects, to the Powers-Kennedy Company, as special employer, it must be presumed that the defendant's power of control continued." Bartolomeo v. Charles Bennett Cont. Co., supra, page 99 of 156 N. E. (245 N. Y. 69).

In order to determine the effect of the evidence relied upon, we may sum it up as follows:

As supporting the claim that appellant United Studios, Inc., surrendered full control of Daum to the Christie Company, that appellant cites:

(1) Daum's foreman told him to take the tractor to the Christie studios and "do whatever they want done."

(2) The Christie Company put angle irons on the front of the tractor so that it could shove the crates around the wharf.

(3) The Christie Company furnished the oil and gas.

(4) Daum drove the tractor in the filming of certain scenes under the direction of Christie's director.

(5) At one time Daum was "made up" to look like Jimmie Adams and "doubled" for Adams in driving the tractor.

(6) The director had Adams drive the tractor in one scene.

(7) In another scene the tractor was permitted to run in circles without any driver.

(8) Daum did not report to the United Studios, Inc., at any time while driving the tractor for the Christie Company.

As supporting the position that United Studios, Inc., did not surrender full control of Daum, respondent cites:

(1) No one testified as to the exact terms of the contract or arrangement between United Studios, Inc., and the Christie Company, and Watson testified that he had no express authority or direction from any one to assume full control of Daum and the tractor.

(2) The United Studios, Inc., hired Daum and retained the right to discharge him.

(3) The United Studios, Inc., continued to pay Daum's wages and he reported his time to them at the conclusion of his work with the Christie Company.

(4) Watson, Christie's director, did not interfere with the mechanical operation of the tractor by Daum while Daum was driving it.

None of these facts are, in our judgment, conclusive either way.

The direction to Daum to do whatever the Christie Company wanted done is equivocal. It might indicate an intention to surrender complete control over Daum and the tractor to the Christie Company, or it might amount merely to a direction to Daum to co-operate with the Christie Company while retaining the general power of control over him in the United Studios, Inc. A direction to do "anything they wanted to take care of" in Umsted v. Scofield Eng. Const. Co., supra, was held not necessarily to indicate an intention by the general employer to surrender complete control of the employee; the court saying that "the jury may well have inferred that the absence of more specific and detailed instructions from Sayre was to be accounted for by the fact that Sims was a skilled electrician, who did not require supervision or control as to the details of accomplishing the task to which he was assigned." The jury might equally infer here that Daum being an experienced operator of the tractor did not require supervision or control in driving it.

The putting of angle irons on the tractor and the furnishing of gas and oil may or may not have been with the consent of United Studios, Inc., and are in any event perfectly consistent with the retention of the general power of control over Daum by the United Studios, Inc.

The fact that Daum and the tractor were used in filming scenes of a moving picture and that Daum in one of these scenes was "made up" are persuasive but not conclusive of the exercise of full control by the Christie Company through their director. The fact that Daum was "made up" is no more important than the fact that a driver or chauffeur might wear a uniform furnished by the person to whom the owner had rented a carriage or automobile. Such fact is obviously not conclusive on the question of control. 39 C. J. 1277. Neither in our opinion is the fact that Daum drove the tractor in the filming of scenes under the direction of Watson. It is true that in so doing Daum at Watson's direction must co-ordinate the movements of the tractor with the movements of the actors so as to get the desired effect in the finished film. But basically the situation was no different in this respect than in the case of Standard Oil Co. v. Anderson, supra. In that case the general employer had let a steam winch and drum with a winchman to a master stevedore to assist in loading a ship. In hoisting and lowering the cargo the winchman acted on a signal from the stevedore's foreman. The Supreme Court of the United States in sustaining a verdict against the general employer based on the negligence of the winchman said:

> "Much stress is laid upon the fact that the winchman obeyed the signals of the gangman, who represented the master stevedore, in timing the raising and lowering of the cases of oil. But when one large general work is undertaken by different persons, doing distinct parts of the same undertaking, there must be co-operation and co-ordination, or there will be chaos. The giving of the signals under the circumstances of this case was not the giving of orders, but of information, and the obedience to those signals showed co-operation rather than subordination, and is not enough to show that there has been a change of masters."

The fact that the director had Adams drive the tractor in one scene and had it running in circles without a driver in another is not determinative of the question of who had the right of control over Daum when he was driving the tractor. Watson himself testified that he had no express authority or directions from any one as to the extent of the control to be exercised over Daum and the tractor by himself. He may have gone beyond his rights in taking the control of the tractor from Daum, and while the United Studios, Inc., would have been relieved of liability for any mishap that might have occurred while Daum was not operating the tractor, that does not necessarily determine the question of their liability when Daum was operating it. The question is, "Who, at the time and place of the collision, had authoritative control?" Billig v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, page 483 of 189 Cal. (209 P. 243).

The fact that Daum did not report to the United Studios, Inc., while driving the tractor for the Christie Company is not entitled to great weight. The right to control may exist without its exercise.

We conclude that it cannot be said from these facts that the court should have held as a matter of law that Daum at the time of the injury to Peters was the special employee of the Christie Company so as to necessarily relieve appellant United Studios, Inc., of liability for his negligence.

An examination of the facts relied upon by respondent to sustain the instruction of the trial court that United Studios, Inc., was the employer of Daum at the time of the injury and responsible for his negligence as a matter of law, satisfies us that they are likewise not conclusive on that question.

The right to hire and discharge and the payment of wages by the general employer are evidentially important, but not conclusive of the fact that the general employer has retained control. Linstead v. C. & O. Ry. Co., supra.

While the failure to control the mechanical operation of the tractor is likewise evidentially important (Bartolomeo v. Charles Bennett Cont. Co., supra), yet it was said in Burns v. Jackson, 59 Cal. App. 662, at page 668, 211 P. 821, 824, that "such matters would naturally be left to the judgment of the driver, who was better qualified and in a better position than the employer to exercise such judgment." The question is, again, not what control was actually exercised, but who had the authoritative right to control.

The fact that the terms of the contract of hiring were not conclusively proved left it, in our judgment, to the jury to determine from all the evidence who at the time and place of the injury had the right to exercise exclusive direction and control of the conduct of Daum.

In the last analysis the question really depends on the construction to be given to the direction to Daum to "do whatever they want done" in the light of all the proved circumstances in the case. That was peculiarly a fact to be determined by the jury and should not have been taken from them.

We conclude, therefore, that the court erred in instructing the jury as a matter of law that appellant United Studios, Inc., was liable for the negligence of Daum.

We likewise conclude that under the evidence in this case the question of whether or not Daum remained subject to the control of United Studios, Inc., so as to render them liable for his negligence, should have been left to the jury to decide under appropriate instructions by the court. This conclusion, we believe, is in harmony with all the decisions.

In considering the decisions it must be kept in mind that they fall into three classes: (1) Those in which the court held as a matter of law that the general employer was liable; (2) those in which the court held as a matter of law that the special employer was liable; (3) those in which the court held that the question was, or should properly have been, one for the jury to determine.

In the first class falls the Billig Case, relied on by respondent. In that case the owner of a truck let truck and driver to another. The hirer superintended the loading and unloading, but exercised no control over truck or driver while on the road. For the negligence of the driver while on the road with a load the court held the owner of the truck liable as a matter of law, saying (pages 485, 486 of 189 Cal. [209 P. 244]): "While the evidence in the instant case shows that Geiger, under the implied terms of the claimed contract of hiring, possessed and exercised authority to control the conduct of Pratt in the work of loading and unloading, nevertheless, so the evidence shows, Geiger never assumed the right to direct and control Pratt in his operation of the truck while in transit, and there is no evidence showing, or tending to show, with respect to the operation of the truck, while in transit, that the defendant relinquished unto Geiger the right to control Pratt."

The difference on their facts between the Billig Case and the instant case is obvious.

Typical of the second class of cases is Linstead v. C. & O. Ry. Co., supra. There two railroad companies had a reciprocal agreement by which each lent the other an engine and crew for certain hauling over the other's tracks. While the lent engine and crew were operating over the borrowing company's tracks they were subject exclusively to the borrowing company's control, a fact that was proved unequivocally and without conflict. There the United States Supreme Court held the special employer liable as a matter of law. There was no such unequivocal proof in the instant case.

In the third class fall most of the cases cited on this appeal. Of this class of cases Labatt says that "it is scarcely permissible to lay it down as a doctrine universally accepted, that a jury is never warranted in inferring a suspension of the general employer's control, unless there is some direct and specific evidence which goes to show that it was intended by the parties to the contract that the driver should be entirely subject to the control of the hirer with respect to the management of the team. But the continuance of the general employer's control has been affirmed in cases of this class so frequently, and with relation to such a large variety of circumstances, that there would seem to be good grounds for saying that this doctrine really sums up the effect of the authorities as a whole. Whether this view be well founded or not, it will, at all events, be apparent from a perusal of the decisions collected in the subjoined note that it is extremely difficult to make good a claim or a defense based upon the theory that a person sent to take charge of a vehicle hired from his general employer was under the hirer's control in such a sense as to have become his servant for the time being." 1 Labatt, Master and Servant (2d Ed.) 176, 177. In a recent case in our Supreme Court (Umsted v. Scofield Eng. Const. Co., supra) it was held that the question whether the general employer was liable should have been submitted to the jury and that the trial court erred in charging, as a matter of law, that the special employer had become pro hac vice the responsible employer. There the decedent, who was employed by his general employer as an electrician, was hired by a construction company from the general employer on a cost-plus basis for employee and material. His wages were paid by the general employer and he was told to do "anything they wanted to take care of." On the job the construction superintendent of the construction company had directed him as to what was to be done, but not as to how to do anything. The Supreme Court said: "The jury might have inferred that the instructions given by La Barr [of the construction company] were merely directions as to the result to be accomplished, such as are required in the nature of things to be given to independent contractors in any case. By reason of the character of the work, it would have been impossible for the duly authorized agents of the construction company and the electric company to have agreed beforehand as to the precise work to be done."

This language fits our case like a glove. To this class of cases likewise belongs Burns v. Jackson, 59 Cal. App. 662, 211 P. 821. In that case the court affirmed a judgment where the question of the liability of the special employer had been left to the jury as a matter of fact. While it is true that on the first appeal in that case the court affirmed a nonsuit as to the general employer, the evidence was not set out, the court contenting itself with the statement that "the testimony shows without contradiction that at the time of the collision referred to both truck and chauffeur were under the control and management of the defendant Jackson [the special employer]." Burns v. Southern Pacific Co., 43 Cal. App. 667, 669, 185 P. 875, 876. If the testimony so showed without contradiction, of course the general employer was properly dismissed. Linstead v. C. & O. Ry. Co., supra.

Lastly, appellant relies much upon Famous Players Lasky Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 194 Cal. 134, 228 P. 5, 34 A. L. R. 765. There the general employer furnished two airplanes with fliers for use in a moving picture. The fliers were accompanied by two representatives of the general employer, who told them to "put themselves under the direction of the representatives of the petitioner herein [the special employer] as to the details of said flight"; the representatives of the general employer then tacitly consented, by their silence, while the special employer directed the pilots to fly lower than they thought safe and in making such a flight one of the fliers was killed. The Industrial Accident Commission made an award against the special employer, which was affirmed. This case is very similar to ours upon its facts, and undoubtedly justifies our conclusion that the trial court erred in instructing the jury, as a matter of law, that the United Studios, Inc., remained liable for Daum's negligence. But it does not require us to hold, as appellant contends, that under the evidence the Christie Company must be held, as a matter of law, to have acquired the entire right of control over Daum so as to relieve United Studios, Inc., from liability. It is to be observed in that connection, first, that the Supreme Court in that case was affirming a decision of the Industrial Accident Commission on the facts, and, second, that that case differed from ours in the important particular that the representatives of the general employer were present on the ground, expressly told the pilots to put themselves under the direction of the special employer, and then by their silence tacitly acquiesced in a direction by the special employer to fly lower, even when the pilots in their hearing objected that they feared it would be dangerous to do so. These facts might have justified the Supreme Court in holding that the general employer had surrendered the entire right of control, as a matter of law, had it been necessary to do so. They are essentially different from the facts here under consideration.

Respondent argues that cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act are, in any event, based upon a different principle of law, and therefore are not controlling in a case involving the question of respondeat superior. Under the New York statute the New York Court of Appeals has held that the principle applicable to the two classes of cases is identical; i. e., that the special employer can be held liable for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act only when he would be liable to a third person for the injured employee's negligence. Schweitzer v. Thompson & Norris Co., 229 N.

Y. 97, 127 N. E. 904. This would seem to be the logical rule, and in the first California case holding both a general and special employer liable for workmen's compensation our Supreme Court said: "The definitions of 'employer' and 'employee' in our workmen's compensation law (sections 13, 14) are broad enough to include both the general and the special employer, and as such contracts of employment, express and implied, were recognized before the constitutional amendment, we do not see why either or both might not give jurisdiction to the Industrial Accident Commission." Employers' L. A. Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Commission, 179 Cal. 432, 439, 177 P. 273, 275.

We may therefore assume that the principles involved in the two classes of cases are identical. So assuming, we are satisfied that there is nothing inconsistent with our conclusion in any of the cases.

[6, 7] Appellants complain of the following instruction given by the court: "You are instructed that it was the duty of the United Studios, Inc., through its agent and servant in charge of the tractor that struck the plaintiff, to have used ordinary care and prudence in the management and operation thereof, and if you find under the evidence that the said driver of said tractor did not use the care of an ordinarily prudent person, but, on the contrary, negligently operated the said tractor, and that said negligence, if any, was the sole proximate cause of any injuries to plaintiff, then you will find damages in favor of plaintiff and against defendants, and each of them, as defined in other instructions herein."

As to appellant United Studios, Inc., this instruction is subject to the same vice as the instruction hereinabove discussed and assumes the liability of that appellant for the negligence of Daum.

As to appellant Daum, it contains a correct statement of the basis upon which he could be held liable. Counsel complains that it does not expressly refer to the absence of contributory negligence. But it does negative its existence by positing defendant's negligence as the sole proximate cause. Elsewhere the jury were fully instructed upon the subject of contributory negligence and they could not have misunderstood the meaning of the word "sole" in this instruction.

[8] "Jurors are presumed to be persons of common intelligence and capable of comprehending the ordinary use of language as applied to the particular proposition under consideration and in reference to which it is employed. We will not assume that they may not have understood the charge as we understand it." Douglas v. Southern Pac. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 264 P. 237. This is certainly true when the instruction states the law with entire correctness. Appellants likewise complain, without any citation of authority, that conflicting instructions were given on the subject of contributory negligence. One instruction used the words "contributed directly and proximately," another "proximately cause," and a third "contributed in any manner proximately." It would seem better to omit the word "directly" in charging on proximate cause, although it was not disapproved in Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 20, 25, 26, 204 P. 393, and the verb "contribute" seems preferable to "cause" in charging on contributory negligence. But the jury cannot have been misled by, or have misunderstood, the instructions as a whole.

It is also doubtful if appellants are in a position to complain in view of the fact that the transcript does not show that these instructions were not given at appellants' request. Sutter Butte Canal Co. v. American R. & A. Co., 182 Cal. 549, 553, 554, 189 P. 277; Bognuda v. Pearson, 71 Cal. App. 105, 110, 111, 234 P. 857.

[9] Appellants finally assert that there is no evidence to support the finding of negligence. With this we cannot agree. Daum had driven the tractor through the same opening three or four times. There is evidence that he had a clearance on each side of from eighteen inches to two feet. On the last time through this opening the wheel of his tractor struck a projection and the tractor veered around and struck the plaintiff. The plaintiff testified that after striking the projection the truck came faster. From this evidence the jury was clearly warranted in finding either that Daum negligently drove too near the projection or after striking it negligently accelerated his motor or both.

In accordance with the views herein expressed the judgment is affirmed as to appellant Daum and reversed as to appellant United Studios, Inc.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.

JEFFORDS et al. v. YOUNG et al. (Civ. 3748.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 20, 1929.

1. Judgment 🔑405—Equity will give relief from judgment procured by extrinsic fraud, mistake, or excusable neglect not resulting from complainant's negligence or laches.

Equity will relieve an injured party from the effect of a judgment procured by extrinsic fraud, mistake, or excusable neglect which was not the result of negligence or laches on the part of complainant.

2. Judgment 🔑436, 443(1)—Equity will not set aside judgment procured by intrinsic fraud or through complainant's gross negligence.

Equity will refuse to interfere to set aside judgment which has been procured by extrinsic fraud, or through gross negligence of complainant, and judgment procured by forged instruments or perjured testimony is the result of intrinsic fraud against which equity will not furnish relief in a collateral attack.

3. Judgment 🔑443(1)—"Extrinsic fraud" will alone justify equity in setting aside judgment.

"Extrinsic fraud," which consists of such conduct as prevents a real trial upon the issues involved, may result from failure to notify injured party of time of trial, or any other act or omission which procures his absence or the absence of material witnesses, and it alone will justify court of equity in setting aside judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second and Third Series, Extrinsic or Collateral Fraud.]

4. Judgment 🔑432—Serious illness of complainant's counsel, preventing his appearance at trial or fair presentation of case, may warrant equitable intervention to set aside judgment.

Serious illness of complainant's counsel, which prevents his appearance at the trial, or fair presentation of complainant's case, may warrant intervention of equity to set aside judgment, where situation could not have been anticipated or avoided by exercise of due diligence.

5. Quieting title 🔑39—In suit by purchasers under unrecorded deed against subsequent purchaser to quiet title, defendant could set up his title and seek affirmative relief.

In suit by purchasers under unrecorded deed against subsequent purchaser to quiet title on ground of fraud, subsequent purchaser had right to set up his own legal title in the answer, asserting his ignorance of plaintiff's equitable title, and praying for affirmative relief.

6. Judgment 🔑453—Purchasers under unrecorded deed, alleging subsequent purchaser had notice of contract and that default judgment against them quieting title in subsequent purchaser was due to their misinformation, as result of their attorney's having been incapacitated by illness, could have judgment set aside.

Purchasers of property under unrecorded deed, under complaint alleging that vendors subsequently sold property to defendant having notice of plaintiffs' contract, and that defendant in their suit to quiet title prayed for affirmative relief to have his title quieted against them, held entitled to intervention of equity to set aside default judgment quieting defendant's title, on showing that they were misinformed by their attorney that the case was to be continued, and that such misinformation, followed by their failure to appear, resulted from serious illness of attorney, which wholly incapacitated him for service, and as result of which he subsequently died.

7. Judgment 🔑443(2)—Judgment procured by mutual fraud or collusion of complainant's attorney with adverse parties or counsel may be vacated.

Judgment procured by means of mutual fraud or collusion of complainant's attorney with adverse parties, or their counsel, may be set aside on proper showing.

8. Judgment 🔑432—Equity will furnish relief to client damaged, so as to shock conscience, by action of attorney who has become incapacitated without client's knowledge or fault.

When attorney becomes physically or mentally incapacitated, without knowledge or fault of his client, and, as result of his acts or conduct during such period of incapacity, client is so damaged as to shock conscience, equity will furnish relief.

9. Quieting title 🔑10(2)—Holder of equitable title to realty may not sue holder of legal title to quiet title.

Suit to quiet title on part of one who owns only equitable title to real property will not lie against owner of legal title.

10. Judgment 🔑447(1)—Equity will not vacate judgment, if result would be the same on another trial.

Equity will not perform idle act of vacating judgment where it appears that another trial would result in the same judgment.

11. Quieting title 🔑17—Purchasers under unrecorded deed, in action to quiet title against subsequent purchaser as record owner, could, under defendant's prayer for relief have defendant's title quieted, subject to their equitable claim, on proof that defendant took with notice.

Purchasers of real property under unrecorded contract, though not entitled to have their title quieted as against subsequent purchaser who recorded his deed, could assert equitable claim as against subsequent purchaser's prayer to have title quieted in him, and could have his title quieted, subject to their equities, on proof that vendors induced them to refrain from recording their deed, and subsequent purchaser had knowledge of their contract.

12. Judgment 🔑407(2)—Suit to set aside judgment held not barred by adverse decision on complainants' motion to set aside judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

That complainants had unsuccessfully resorted to motion to set aside judgment for fraud, mistake, or excusable neglect under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, held not to bar suit in equity to have judgment set aside for the same cause.

13. Judgment ⚷453—Purchasers under unrecorded deed, against whom subsequent purchaser obtained judgment quieting title, could not have judgment set aside as against bank as escrow holder.

Purchasers under unrecorded deed, against whom default judgment was rendered quieting title in subsequent purchaser, had no right of action to set judgment aside as against bank in which contract and deed were deposited in escrow and which refused delivery of deed on payment of price.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

Suit by C. D. Jeffords and others, a copartnership doing business under the name of the Jeffords-Schoenmann Company, against Thomas I. Young and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed in part, and in part reversed and remanded, with directions.

Hedley Richmond, of Los Angeles, and M. C. Atchison, of Calexico, for appellants.

Ault & MacKinnon, of Calexico, and A. L. Hubbell, of Escondido (Harry W. Horton and Kendall B. Perkins, both of El Centro, and Edgar B. Hervey and M. W. Conkling, both of San Diego, of counsel), for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon default of the plaintiffs for failure to amend their complaint after separate demurrers thereto had been sustained.

This suit was brought to set aside a final judgment against the plaintiffs quieting title to the "Young ranch," consisting of 20 acres of land in Imperial county, Cal., which judgment upon appeal was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 239 P. 1054. The complaint in this case alleges that plaintiffs executed a written contract with the defendants, Thomas I. and Lillie E. Young, on December 31, 1921, to purchase said property for $4,200, upon specified terms; that the contract and deed of conveyance were deposited in escrow with the Central Bank of Imperial Valley at Calexico, where plaintiffs subsequently paid, from time to time, the aggregate sum of $3,600, which was applied on the purchase price of the ranch; that they immediately took possession of the premises and made valuable improvements thereon; that on July 27, 1923, they tendered at said bank the further sum of $525, which was refused upon the grounds that the bank was no longer the owner's agent, and that all documents involved in the transaction had been returned to them.

The complaint further alleged that the plaintiffs were persuaded by the vendors not to record their contract for the reason that it would impair the owner's credit; that despite their contract and the receipt of a substantial proportion of the purchase price of said land, the Youngs, without the knowledge of appellants, subsequently, on August 1, 1923, sold and conveyed said premises for a valuable consideration to one W. H. Lorenz, who had knowledge of the existing contract of appellants; that the grantee immediately thereafter recorded his deed; that appellants learning of said transfer promptly filed suit against the defendants, Youngs and their grantee, Lorenz, to quiet title to said land; that the defendants Youngs filed a disclaimer and Lorenz answered, setting up his purchase of the land, his ignorance of appellants' claims, and praying for affirmative relief to the effect that his title be quieted against them. It was alleged that the cause was regularly set for trial in the superior court of Imperial county for October 25, 1923; that just prior to said date of trial, and on October 23d, Wilbur Randall, an attorney of Los Angeles, who had been employed to assist plaintiffs' regular attorney, Hedley Richmond, "telephoned to plaintiffs, that said cause was to be continued, by stipulation of counsel * * * and that he had arranged * * * for the filing of an amended complaint therein. That acting under such instructions, plaintiffs herein did not attend the trial, had on the 25th day of October, * * * and were absent from Imperial County, California, at the time of said trial. * * * That the plaintiffs * * * did believe that the trial of said cause would be continued, * * * and but for the statement of the attorney, Wilbur Randall, the plaintiffs and their said attorney Hedley Richmond, would have been present at such trial, on the 25th day of October, 1923."

It was further alleged "that said attorney Wilbur Randall, on the day of and during the trial of said cause was sick with a very high fever, caused by an attack of pneumonia and in fact died a few days after said 25th day of October, 1923, * * * from such disease," and that said lawyer at the trial of said cause was wholly incapacitated on account of his illness, to appear or properly represent the plaintiffs; that because of said erroneous information plaintiffs failed to appear at the trial in person or by their regular attorney, or to adduce evidence of their equitable title, and that the court therefore rendered and entered judgment against them, quieting title to said land in the grantee, Lorenz, dismissing the action as to the Youngs and finding that plaintiffs had no right, title, estate, or equity in or to the premises. Thereupon the plaintiffs were subsequently ousted from their possession of the premises.

The plaintiffs immediately moved the trial court to set aside the former judgment, which motion was denied, and upon appeal therefrom the judgment and order were affirmed. From the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Jeffords v. Young, supra, it appears that the motion to vacate the former judgment was made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but that no affidavits of merit were filed in support of the motion. The court says: "In the present case, * * * the clerk's transcript does indicate affirmatively that no affidavits were on file which could have been used in support of the motion. * * * The order denying that motion must, therefore, be affirmed." It is true that subsequently the plaintiffs renewed their motion to set aside that judgment and asked the trial court to grant a new trial, upon which subsequent motion affidavits of merit were filed. This motion, however, was also denied, and the plaintiffs failed to appeal therefrom. They perfected their appeal only from the former order. Regarding this motion for relief, the Supreme Court said: "Upon the showing there made the learned trial judge might well have granted the relief prayed for * * * upon the ground of excusable neglect. * * * No appeal was taken from this order and we are, therefore, without jurisdiction to review it. The only notice of appeal which appears in the record * * * is directed solely at the judgment and the order of December 14, 1923," which was unsupported by affidavits.

[1, 2] Equity will relieve an injured party from the effect of a judgment procured by extrinsic fraud, mistake, or excusable neglect which were not the result of negligence or laches on the part of the complainant. Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 67 P. 282, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98; Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 P. 317; Simonton v. Los Angeles T. & S. Bank, 192 Cal. 651, 656, 221 P. 368; Estate of Ross, 180 Cal. 651, 658, 182 P. 752; Clavey v. Loney, 80 Cal. App. 20, 251 P. 232. It will, however, refuse to interfere in an action where a judgment has been procured by intrinsic fraud or gross negligence of the complainant. Clavey v. Loney, supra. A judgment procured by forged instruments or perjured testimony is the result of intrinsic fraud, against which equity will not furnish relief in a collateral attack. Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 133, 25 P. 970, 27 P. 537 (13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159).

[3, 4] Extrinsic fraud alone will justify a court of equity in setting aside a judgment. Extrinsic fraud consists of such conduct as prevents a real trial upon the issues involved. It may result from a failure to notify the injured party of the time of trial or any other act or omission which procures his absence or the absence of material witnesses. 15 Cal. Jur. 10, § 121. The serious illness of complainant's counsel, which prevents an appearance at the trial or a fair presentation of his cause, and which situation by the exercise of due diligence could not have been anticipated or avoided, may warrant the intervention of equity. 3 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) 2598, § 1247.

[5, 6] In the present case it appears that the appellants held a valid contract to purchase the real property involved in this action, upon which they had paid or offered to pay substantially the entire purchase price; they were persuaded not to record their agreement. Secretly and fraudulently the owners sold and conveyed this land to another purchaser. Upon the discovery of this fraud the appellants promptly filed a suit to quiet the title to this land. The grantee answered the complaint, setting up his legal title, asserting his ignorance of the plaintiffs' equitable title, and praying for affirmative relief. This he was permitted to do. Brooks v. White, 22 Cal. App. 719, 136 P. 500. The issues of this suit were thus settled, and the case was definitely set for trial. It was alleged in the present case that without the fault of these appellants and solely because of the serious illness of their lawyer who had active charge of the case, which illness wholly incapacitated him for service, and as a result of which he subsequently died, they were furnished with erroneous information which resulted in their absence from the trial and prevented them from adducing evidence in support of their equitable title, and that therefore the judgment was rendered against them. That judgment, upon a proper showing, should have quieted title in the grantee, Lorenz, subject to the equitable claim of the plaintiffs. Equity should furnish relief from this unjust situation.

[7, 8] A judgment procured by means of actual fraud, or collusion of the complainant's own attorney with the adverse parties or counsel, may be set aside upon a proper showing. 1 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) 503, § 249; 1 Black on Judgments (2d Ed.) 350, § 344; Anthony v. Karbach, 64 Neb. 509, 90 N. W. 243, 97 Am. St. Rep. 662. Ordinarily a client is chargeable with the negligence of his own attorney. Smith v. Tunstead, 56 Cal. 175; Romero v. Snyder, 167 Cal. 216, 138 P. 1002; Alferitz v. Cahen, 145 Cal. 397, 78 P. 878; 1 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) 495, § 248. But manifestly, when, without the knowledge or fault of a client, his attorney becomes physically or mentally incapacitated so that his acts or conduct which are controlled thereby leads to a damaging result in pending litigation so detrimental and unjust as to shock the conscience, surely equity will furnish relief.

[9-11] The respondents contend that equity will not interfere with the judgment in the present case, for the reason that the appellants possessed merely an equitable title to the land, and that the suit to quiet title may therefore not be maintained against the grantee who holds the legal title. It is true that a suit to quiet title on the part of one who holds only an equitable title to real property will not lie against one who owns the legal title. Chase v. Cameron, 133 Cal. 231, 65 P. 460; Kennedy v. Scally, 62 Cal. App. 367, 217 P. 96; County of Los Angeles v. Hannon, 159 Cal. 37, 48, 112 P. 878. The respondent asserts that because the suit to quiet title will not lie against the owner of the legal title, equity will not perform the idle act of vacating a judgment where it appears that another trial would result the same. This principle is also correct. Painter v. J. B. Painter Co., 133 Cal. 129, 65 P. 311; McCargar v. Bittleston L. & C. Agency, 75 Cal. App. 770, 244 P. 110; Hogan v. Horsfall (Cal. App.) 266 P. 1002. While it is true that the complaint of the appellants stated facts constituting only a suit to quiet title, the answer of the grantee Lorenz set up new matter and asked for affirmative relief, praying that the title be quieted in him. The new matter in the answer is deemed to have been denied, and, in spite of the nature of plaintiffs' original action, they have a right to interpose, against the defendants' claim of legal title, any equitable claim which they may possess, and upon a proper showing the grantee's title should be quieted subject to the valid equitable claim of the appellants. Based upon the facts alleged in the present case, a rehearing of the former case should therefore result in a different decree recognizing the claim of the appellants.

[12] Finally, it is contended that in an effort to vacate the judgment, having unsuccessfully resorted to the remedy provided by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the appellants are now barred from applying to equity for the same relief. The remedies for relief from a judgment procured by fraud, mistake, or excusable neglect, provided by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the ordinary suit in equity, are entirely distinct and cumulative. An unsuccessful resort to the first-mentioned remedy does not bar an application to equity for relief. 15 Cal. Jur. 27, § 127; Estudillo v. Security L. & T. Co., 149 Cal. 556, 561, 87 P. 19; Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 P. 317; Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 55, 63, 65 P. 139; 3 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) 2488, § 1198. In Bacon v. Bacon, supra, at page 484 of 150 Cal. (89 P. 320) it is said with respect to these different remedies: "It [sec. 473, Code Civ. Proc.] is a cumulative remedy, and does not displace the remedy in equity. (Baker v. O'Riordan, 65 Cal. 368 [4 P. 232].) We have recently held not only that it does not displace the equitable remedy, but also that an adverse decision on such a motion does not necessarily bar a subsequent suit to vacate the judgment for the same cause." To the same effect, the author of Freeman on Judgments, supra, says: "The summary disposition of a question upon motion, resulting in a denial of the relief claimed, should not ipso facto preclude the party from obtaining the aid of chancery. * * * The denial of a motion to open a judgment should not of necessity preclude a court of equity from subsequently granting the relief denied at law. The decision of such motion is not such a res adjudicata as precludes equity from reexamining the question. The opening of a judgment in a court of law is usually ex gratia, while restraining the plaintiff from proceeding on the judgment is, in equity, more nearly a matter of right. The facilities for investigating the issues presented in the motion are usually much better in equity than at law, owing to the more summary character of the motion proceedings."

We are of the opinion that the complaint in the present action alleges facts sufficient to state a cause of action against the defendants Thomas I. Young, Lillie E. Young, and W. H. Lorenz justifying the aid of equity, and that the former application to vacate the judgment in the statutory proceeding does not bar the remedy here sought.

[13] The complaint does fail to state a cause of action against the defendants A. L. Hubbell and Central Bank of Imperial Valley, and the judgment, so far as it applies to the last-mentioned defendants, is therefore affirmed; otherwise the judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to overrule the demurrers of the defendants Thomas I. and Lillie E. Young and W. H. Lorenz and permit them to answer the complaint.

PETROTTA v. GERSON. (Civ. 3765.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 25, 1929.

1. Contracts 🔑163—Only when repugnant clauses cannot be reconciled does written part of contract control printed portion (Civ. Code, §§ 1651, 1652).

Only when repugnancies between printed and written portions of contract cannot be reasonably reconciled, as required by Civ. Code, §§ 1651, 1652, does written part of contract control the printed portion.

2. Sales 🔑279—Written contract provision that seller would refund initial payment and take back pump, if it did not pump to capacity, required water to be reasonably free from foreign substance.

Where printed clause of sales contract, stipulating that with a lift of 320 feet, by use of 5 horsepower motor, pump sold would raise 41 gallons of water each minute, but that seller would not be responsible for damage caused by presence in water of foreign matter, was followed by written statement that, if pump did not pump to capacity, or was otherwise not acceptable to buyer, seller would refund initial payment and take back equipment, seller merely guaranteed that pump would handle 41 gallons of water each minute, if water was free from impeding impurities, and that only if such water was reasonably free from sand or other foreign substance would seller refund initial payment and take back equipment, if pump would not pump to capacity of 41 gallons per minute.

3. Sales 🔑277—Subsequent written agreement construing guaranty as to capacity of pump could be considered in determining parties' intent.

Subsequent written agreement between parties to sale and purchase of pump, specifically referring to original sales contract, and purporting to construe guaranty as to capacity of pump, could be considered in determining intent of parties in buyer's action to rescind contract on ground of seller's breach.

4. Sales 🔑279—Provision authorizing buyer to avoid contract, if pump was otherwise not acceptable to buyer, did not authorize buyer to repudiate contract on mere whim or caprice.

Provision in contract for sale of pump that contract may be avoided by buyer, if pumping plant does not pump to capacity, "or is otherwise not acceptable to customer," must be construed in connection with entire contract, with view to ascertaining extent and nature of guaranty intended by parties, and, when so construed, would not justify rejecting pump merely because of buyer's whim or caprice, since it related to mechanical operation of pump.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elias Rosenkranz, Judge.

Action by John Petrotta against Samuel H. Gerson, doing business under the fictitious name and style of the Westco-Chippewa Pump Company, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hoye & Boehler, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

M. J. Finkenstein and Harry A. Finkenstein, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the defendant in an action to rescind a contract for the purchase of a pump, for the breach of an alleged covenant on the part of the vendor that it would elevate 41 gallons of water each minute.

Pursuant to a written contract dated January 2, 1925, the respondent sold and delivered to the appellant, at Tujunga, Cal., and installed in his 320-foot well, a Westco-Chippewa pump, for the agreed price of $1,892.42, upon which there was paid the sum of $630.80. By the terms of this contract, which was prepared upon a printed form, it was stipulated in part that, with a lift or depth of 320 feet, by the use of a five horse power motor, the pump would raise 41 gallons of water each minute, except that the printed guaranty clause contained the following provision:

"The equipment described in these specifications was designed primarily to pump clear water, and the company will not be responsible for damage caused by the presence in the water of any foreign matter."

Immediately following the last-quoted paragraph, which appeared in printed form, this statement was written with pen and ink:

"The company agrees, in event pumping plant does not pump to capacity, or is otherwise not acceptable to customer, they will refund initial payment of $630.80 and take back equipment."

Mingled with the water of the well there was a considerable amount of sand, which seriously cut the leather valves in the cylinders, causing them to leak, and thus greatly reduced the quantity of water which the pump would normally raise in a given period of time. After some experimenting the pump failed to produce more than 32 gallons of water per minute. An expert witness, called on behalf of the respondent, testified that this was wholly due to the damaged valves, caused by the presence of sand in the water; that, when this sand was substantially eliminated from the water, the valves could be renewed; and that this pump, operating in a 320-foot well in fairly clear water, would elevate by means of a five horse power motor 41 gallons of water each minute. On the foregoing account, the appellant became dissatisfied with the result of the action of the pump, and complained of it to the vendor. Thereupon, in consideration of the appellant's executing and delivering to the respondent his "trade acceptance" pledge for $1,336.62, which was the balance of the purchase price of the pump, including the accrued interest, the vendor signed a subsequent written agreement, March 25, 1926, guaranteeing that, after the sand was eliminated from the water and the valves were renewed, the pump would deliver 41 gallons of water per minute; that, if it was discovered that the deficiency in the delivering capacity of the pump was not due to the effect of the sand, the pump would be repaired without cost to the appellant. This document read in part:

"Witnesseth—that whereas party of the second part [appellant] has this day completed his part of that certain contract of purchase entered into on January 5th, 1925, between the parties hereto, party of the first part [respondent] agrees as follows:

"(1) That if, after pump has been allowed to operate until the water pumped is clear and free of sand or other foreign matter, it does not deliver the rated capacity (41 gallons per minute), the plungers will be removed, examined, repaired, or replaced, and reinstalled.

"(2) If it is found that the failure on the part of the equipment to deliver its rated capacity (41 G. P. M.) is due to any other cause than the presence of foreign matter in the water, no charge will be made for the labor and material necessary to correct same.

"(3) If, after examination, it is found that the trouble is due to sand and/or other foreign matter, then the party of the second part agrees to pay for above-mentioned labor and material.

"(4) It is hereby guaranteed that, if well clears up and delivers clear water, the equipment will deliver its rated capacity of 41 G. P. M., if the supply in the well is adequate, and water level when pumping does not lower below 350 feet below pump head, and party of the second part will be required to make no further payments on account of the purchase contract of January 5th, 1925, until pump is delivering its capacity of 41 G. P. M."

The sand, however, was not eliminated from the water. The appellant replaced the pump with one purchased from another firm, and offered to return to the respondent the pump which is involved in this action, which was refused. On May 27, 1927, the appellant gave notice of rescission of the contract, and commenced this action to cancel the contract and trade acceptance pledge for $1,336.62, and to recover the sum of $630.80, which had been paid on account of the purchase price. The defendant answered, and filed a cross-complaint for $1,336.62, the unpaid portion of the purchase price of the pump. Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant on his cross-complaint.

The appellant contends that the pen and ink paragraph of the original contract of January 2, 1925, which reads, "The company agrees, in event pumping plant does not pump to capacity or is otherwise not acceptable to customer, they will refund initial payment of $630.80 and take back equipment," constituted an unconditional guaranty that the pump would deliver forty-one gallons of water per minute, regardless of the presence of sand in the water; that the pen and ink paragraph above quoted superseded and controlled the preceding printed portion of the contract; that he was privileged to reject the pump, if it was not acceptable to him for any other reason; and that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence.

[1] This case depends entirely upon the intent of the parties with respect to the guaranty, which must be ascertained by a construction of the contract. The facts are not seriously disputed. Title 3 of the Civil Code furnishes the rules which will govern in the construction of this contract. It must be interpreted so as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties. 6 Cal. Jur. 252, § 163. Where the language is unambiguous, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone. The contract is to be construed as a whole, so as to give effect to every clause and portion, if reasonably possible. Where the written and printed portions of a contract are repugnant and irreconcilable, the written portion controls. Section 1651, Civ. Code. Repugnant clauses of a contract, however, should be reconciled, if reasonably possible. Section 1652, Civ. Code. It is only when such repugnant clauses cannot be reasonably reconciled that the written part of a contract will control the printed portion. Jackson v. Snow, 62 Cal. App. 56, 61, 216 P. 60; 6 R. C. L. 848. § 239.

With the foregoing principles of construction in mind, there seems to be little difficulty in determining the intent of the parties as expressed by the contract with respect to the guaranty of the quantity of water which the pump was expected to convey in a specified period of time. The printed and written paragraphs of the guaranty appear to be reasonably susceptible of reconciliation.

[2] It seems quite evident that the respondent intended to guarantee merely that the pump would handle 41 gallons of water each minute, provided the water was free from sand or other impeding impurities. It is unreasonable to expect any pump to convey its ordinary normal quantity of water, when the water is permeated with a large amount of sand, which destroys the efficient use of the valves. The contract specifically provided that the pump "was designed primarily to pump clear water, and the company will not be responsible for damage caused by the presence in the water of any foreign matter." It is not unreasonable to construe the succeeding written paragraph to mean that, provided the water is reasonably clear and free from sand or other foreign substance the vendor "will refund the initial payment of $630.80, and take back the equipment," if, under such circumstances, the "pumping plant does not pump to capacity" of 41 gallons per minute. This is a mere assurance that the normal capacity of the pump was guaranteed to be 41 gallons per minute under ordinary conditions, with the water reasonably free from sand or other foreign substance. The case of Retsloff v. Smith, 79 Cal. App. 443, 249 P. 886, which is relied upon by appellants as authority for the assertion that a written clause in a contract supersedes and destroys a printed clause, regardless of whether they may be reasonably reconciled or not, fails to support his claim. In that case neither the printed nor the written portion of the contract was impaired or destroyed. The court says: "This construction does not nullify the former provision, but harmonizes the two, and gives both provisions life and meaning." This is precisely what the recognized rules of construction require of a court, if it is reasonably possible.

[3] Moreover, it is evident from the unequivocal language of the subsequent written agreement of March 25, 1926, above quoted, that the parties to this action so construed the guaranty. The latter instrument, which specifically referred to the former contract, and which purports to construe the guaranty as to the capacity of the pump, may properly be considered in determining the intent of the parties. 6 R. C. L. 850, § 240.

[4] Nor does the clause in the written portion of the guaranty, to the effect that the contract may be avoided if the "pumping plant does not pump to capacity, or is otherwise not acceptable to customer," authorize the vendee to reject the pump or repudiate the contract upon mere whim or caprice. This clause should be construed in connection with the entire contract, with a view of ascertaining the extent and nature of the guaranty intended by the parties. The subject under consideration, which led to the use of the clause pursuant to which the appellant claims the right to reject the pump for no other reason than that it was "not acceptable" to him, was the guaranty of the mechanical operation of a machine to pump water from a well. This would not justify the rejecting of the plant merely because the buyer disliked its appearance, or because it was not painted to suit him, or for any other trivial reason. Under certain circumstances, such language may authorize an arbitrary option to reject a purchased article. But in the absence of language clearly indicating such arbitrary authority, and where the mere mechanical operation of a machine is involved, there must be reasonable cause for rejecting it.

In 6 Ruling Case Law, at page 954, it is said: "A distinction has been drawn between cases where the fancy, taste, sensibility or judgment of the promisor are involved, and cases where only operative fitness or mechanical utility is involved. In the latter class of cases, the subject-matter of the contract is such that the satisfaction stipulated for must be held to apply to quality, workmanship, stability, and other like considerations, rather than to personal satisfaction." In applying the principle of this distinction, there may be some confusion of authorities, but there can be no question that the present case belongs to the class which does not authorize an arbitrary rescission without reason, but rather depends upon the existence of some mechanical defect of the pump. No defect, except the lack of the capacity of the pump, has been urged by the appellant. This clause will therefore not justify the rejecting of the pump or the rescission of the contract without reason.

The case of Tiffany v. Pacific S. P. Co., 180 Cal. 700, 182 P. 428, 6 A. L. R. 1493, which is relied upon by the appellant, clearly belongs to the class of cases which confers arbitrary power to act. It was a suit for damages for breach of a contract to employ an expert workman to finish the manufacture of glazed brick. The plaintiff was entitled to retain his employment so long as he finished "a product satisfactory to the defendant." His work was not satisfactory, and he was discharged. The court said: "Quality was also important, for, if the glaze was not rightly mixed, it would scale off, or crack, after being burned, and, if the color or transparency was not satisfactory to purchasers, the brick would not be as easily sold." In an employment consisting of an occupation that required the exercise of taste or the approval of color and appearance which are difficult to standardize, it was properly held that the workman could be discharged under the provisions of the contract, without assigning specific defects of the product or incapacity on the part of the workman. That case is therefore readily distinguished from the present action.

In view of the foregoing principles of law, it becomes immaterial whether the finding that plaintiff refused to permit the defendant to repair the cylinder valves is supported by the evidence or not. We are of the opinion, however, that the findings are amply supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte HAMPTON. (Cr. 1811.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 24, 1929.

Criminal law 🔑1189—Reversal of judgment without order respecting new trial finally determines action and entitles defendant to discharge from custody (Pen. Code, §§ 1260, 1262).

Under Pen. Code, §§ 1260, 1262, reversal of judgment on appeal from judgment alone, without making any order concerning new trial, operates as final determination of action, thereby entitling defendant to discharge from custody on writ of habeas corpus.

Application by Frank Hampton for writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner ordered discharged from custody.

Schaeffer & Weldon, of Santa Maria, for petitioner.

Clarence C. Ward, Dist. Atty., of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this proceeding (wrongly entitled People v. Hampton), a writ of habeas corpus was issued out of the Supreme Court and made returnable in this court.

Upon an information which charged Hampton with the crime of murder, he was found guilty of the crime of manslaughter. On appeal from the judgment of conviction, that judgment was reversed by this court (273 P. 854). The judgment of reversal did not contain any order for a new trial, and there was no appeal from any order denying motion for new trial. But although the judgment of reversal did not order a new trial, this court did not direct that the defendant be discharged from custody. When the remittitur had been received in the superior court of Santa Barbara county, where the action was pending, that court overruled defendant's objections to further trial and retained him in custody awaiting another trial of the action. He now claims the right to be discharged from the custody of the sheriff.

Section 1260 of the Penal Code provides that in rendering judgment upon appeal the court may "reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment or order appealed from, * * * and may, if proper, order a new trial." Section 1262 of the Penal Code provides that: "If a judgment against the defendant is reversed without ordering a new trial, the appellant court must, if he is in custody, direct him to be discharged therefrom. * * *" The decisions to which we have been referred in connection with these provisions of the Penal Code do not answer the particular question presented in this proceeding. It is our opinion, however, that the legislative intention as expressed in the code provisions above noted was that, where the appeal is from the judgment alone, and where the appellate court reverses the judgment without making any order concerning the subject of new trial, such reversal shall operate as a final determination of the action, thereby entitling defendant to discharge from custody. The effect of this decision is that, if there be now existing any cause of action against petitioner Hampton, for the crime of manslaughter, in relation to the transaction out of which the former action arose, the only possible means of prosecution thereof would be by a new action.

It is ordered that the petitioner, the said Hampton, be discharged from custody.

PEOPLE v. HIRSCHLER. (Cr. 1530.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 25, 1929.

1. Criminal law 🔑1032(5)—Objections made for first time on appeal, that robbery information omitted certain elements, and that it was uncertain, held unavailable, in view of contention it charged larceny (Pen. Code, § 1012).

In absence of demurrer, defendant's contention, made for first time on appeal, that information charging robbery was insufficient because elements of force and fear and use of dangerous and deadly weapon were omitted, and that information was uncertain for not alleging that taking was from possession or immediate presence of victims, held unavailable under Pen. Code, § 1012, where defendant also claimed that allegations were insufficient except as a claim of larceny, since this in itself was a public offense, and it could therefore not be said that information wholly failed to state a public offense.

2. Robbery 🔑17(1)—Information charging robbery held not objectionable for omitting elements of force and fear and use of deadly weapon nor for not alleging taking from possession or immediate presence of victims (Pen. Code § 951, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043).

Under Pen. Code, § 951, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, prescribing form of pleading in criminal cases, information charging that defendants robbed certain person held not objectionable because omitting elements of force and fear and use of dangerous and deadly weapon nor for uncertainty in not alleging that taking was from the possession or immediate presence of victims.

3. Criminal law 🔑1119(3)—Alleged improper remark of trial court not in record could not be reviewed by appellate court.

Defendant's objection to alleged remark of trial court set forth in brief could not be considered by appellate court, where such remark was not disclosed by record, since neither party nor appellate court is entitled to go outside of record.

4. Criminal law ⚷372(6)—Evidence of other robberies held admissible to establish conspiracy to rob bootlegging establishments.

In prosecution for robbery of alleged bootlegger's place of business and persons there present, in which theory of prosecution was that defendants formed conspiracy to commit alleged offense and to rob such places and persons in general, evidence that on a different date and at a different place defendants committed a similar offense held properly admitted as limited to proof of issue of conspiracy, though it constituted evidence of other crimes; defendant's remedy, if prosecution did not succeed in connecting theory of conspiracy with main offense on trial, being by motion to strike out.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Paul Hirschler and another were convicted of robbery, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leo Sullivan and J. L. Royle, both of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and W. Augustine, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against Paul Hirschler and Edward Haight which purported to plead against both defendants the charge of robbing A. F. Bouvier and George Deline. The information alleged two counts, and further alleged that both acts were part of one transaction. The defendants pleaded not guilty, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned four separate verdicts, finding each defendant guilty on each count. The defendants each made a motion for a new trial. The motions were denied. The defendant Hirschler has appealed from the order and judgment and has brought up a typewritten record.

[1] The charging part of each count in the information followed the same form. That in the first count alleged that "they robbed Alfred F. Bouvier of one purse containing $44.80, more or less, lawful money of the United States, one California Diamond Jubilee 1925 one-half dollar and one United States 1872 half dime." The alleged offense was committed on the 11th day of September, 1928, and the information was filed October 16, 1928. The defendant contends: (1) That the elements of force and/or fear are lacking and no substitution for them is anywhere attempted in the pleading; (2) that an allegation of the use of dangerous and deadly weapon was omitted; and (3) that the information is entirely uncertain, as it does not allege that the taking was from the possession or immediate presence of the victims. No demurrer was interposed. The Attorney General cites section 1012 of the Penal Code and contends that the objections presented come too late. The defendant does not claim that in so far as his objections rest on uncertainty that the same can be presented at this time. However, he does claim that the allegations are insufficient except as a statement of larceny. That exception in itself is a public offense, therefore it cannot be said that the information wholly failed to state a public offense. That being so, it follows that no one of the contentions is available to the defendant at this time.

[2] In what we just stated we have considered the rules of pleading in criminal cases as they existed prior to the amendments of 1927; but the statutes adopted in 1927 enacted important amendments regarding the rules of pleading. Section 951 of the Penal Code, as amended (St. 1927, p. 1043), is as follows: "* * * The people of the State of California against A. B. In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the county of ——. The grand jury (or the district attorney) of the county of —— hereby accuses A. B. of a felony (or misdemeanor), to-wit: (giving the name of the crime, as murder, burglary, etc.), in that on or about the —— day of ——, 19—, in the county of ——, State of California, he (here insert statement of act or omission, as for example, 'murdered C. D.')." The enactment of that amendment presents another reason why no one of the objections presented by this defendant is tenable.

[3] The defendant complains of a remark alleged to have been made by the trial court which he sets forth in his brief. He does not inform us as to where the alleged remark is to be found in the record. An examination of the reporter's transcript does not disclose the incident. Neither one of the parties is entitled to go outside of the record and neither is this court entitled to go outside of the record.

[4] The offense alleged in the information consisted of the robbery of an alleged bootlegger's place of business and the persons there present. It was the theory of the prosecution that the defendants formed a conspiracy to commit the alleged offense and to rob such places and persons in general; that because the business of selling intoxicating liquor is proscribed by law persons found in such places could be robbed with impunity and there would be little probability of a prosecution because each individual would hesitate to appear and give testimony. For the purpose of presenting this theory to the trial court the prosecution introduced evidence to the effect that on a different date at a different place the defendants committed a similar offense. It is conceded by the defendant that by a proper instruction the evidence so admitted was duly limited to the proof of the issue of conspiracy. Nevertheless the defendant claims that he should not have been confronted with evidence of other crimes. That contention may not be sustained. People v. Wilson, 76 Cal. App. 688, 245 P. 781. If, at the time the taking of evidence closed, the prosecution had not succeeded in connecting the theory of conspiracy with the main offense on trial, the defendant might have made a motion to strike out, but no such motion was made.

We find no error in the record.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

FOREST LAKES MUT. WATER CO. et al. v. SANTA CRUZ LAND TITLE CO. et al. (Civ. 6654.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 25, 1929.

1. Waters and water courses 🔑156(4)—Reservation in deed of water from stream was exception rather than reservation and operated to withhold right to water so excepted.

In conveying land, reservation in deed of water from certain stream was exception rather than reservation, and operated to withhold from thing granted right to water so excepted and described.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑156(4)—Right to water in certain stream was proper subject for reservation and exception from grant.

Right to water from certain stream flowing through land was proper subject for reservation and exception from grant of land.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑152(3)—Downstream riparian owners held entitled to prevent diversion of water by persons owning land upstream without riparian rights, water having been reserved in deed.

Downstream riparian owners held entitled to prevent diversion of water diminishing natural flow of stream into and upon their lands by owners of land upstream who had no riparian rights owing to reservation in deed to their predecessors in title.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1071(2)—In suit to enjoin diversion of water, finding that plaintiff's lands were riparian, if erroneous because small strip was conveyed without water rights, held not prejudicial.

In suit to enjoin diversion of water from stream, finding that plaintiff's lands were riparian, if erroneous in that 200-foot strip was conveyed without water rights, held not prejudicial, where plaintiffs would still be entitled to injunction on account of other riparian lands many times greater in area than such strip.

5. Appeal and error 🔑843(2)—In suit to enjoin diversion of water from stream, defendants' rights as to land not referred to in judgment held immaterial.

In suit to enjoin diversion of water from stream, whether defendants were owners of land containing uppermost reaches of stream with riparian rights held immaterial, where judgment made no adjudication about water rights of such land.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑152(6)—In suit involving water rights, neither party was required to prove title in common grantor.

In suit to enjoin taking of water from stream and its use on nonriparian lands, in which it was shown that water rights had been reserved when defendants' land was conveyed, and both parties claimed title through common grantor, it was not necessary for either party to prove title in such common grantor.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑152(3)—Conveyance of water rights to water company for purpose of administration did not sever such rights, precluding landowner from restraining diversion by nonriparian owners.

Where water rights were conveyed for purpose of administration to water company, a nonprofit corporation, company was distributing agency and trustee for landowners, and conveyance was not one which would sever and destroy riparian rights, so as to prevent landowner from suing to restrain diversion of water by owners of nonriparian land upstream.

8. Appeal and error 🔑882(18)—Judgment restraining diversion of water, if erroneous in naming water company as though it were party to action, held not prejudicial to landowner alleging company was agent.

In suit against landowner to restrain diversion of water from stream, any error in injunction and judgment in naming water company as though it were party to action was not error of which owner of land could complain, where he had alleged such company was his agent, and he claimed he was not its alter ego.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Suit by the Forest Lakes Mutual Water Company and another against the Santa Cruz Land Title Company and others to enjoin the taking of water and its use on nonriparian lands. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Peck, Bunker & Peck and Clarence M. Hawkins, all of Oakland, and H. H. McPike, of San Francisco, for appellants.

R. T. Harding, of San Francisco, and Maurice Rankin, of San José, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiffs obtained a permanent injunction against defendants enjoining the latter from taking water from Gold gulch, a stream in the Santa Cruz Mountains. Defendants had been conducting it over their lands and into another watershed for use upon lands not riparian to the stream. Defendants appeal upon a reporter's and clerk's transcript.

The defendants own a tract of land lying to the north of a line which runs in a general east and west direction. The plaintiffs own a tract of land lying south of that line. Most of the part of the stream involved here runs parallel to this line from west to east wholly on plaintiffs' land. But the westerly or upper end of this stream flows down from a northwesterly direction through the lands of the defendants before it reaches the land of the plaintiffs. This upper part of the stream was sometimes referred to by some as the Northwest fork of Gold gulch and in more recent years by others as Limestone brook. It is out of this fork that defendants were enjoined from taking water.

Both parties, plaintiffs and defendants, derive title to their respective lands from a common predecessor and grantor, F. A. Hihn, who owned the entire 1,300 acres on and before 1888. Plaintiffs' title to the water rights in question comes from their riparian ownership of lands upon the main part of Gold gulch which flows through their land and from a reservation and grant of the water rights in that part of the stream (the fork or upper part) which flows through defendants' land. When F. A. Hihn conveyed to defendants' predecessor Russell the defendants' tract of land, he reserved and excepted from the land conveyed the said water rights and they were subsequently conveyed to plaintiffs. Hihn, who was plaintiffs' predecessor, remained the owner of the land to the south of that conveyed to Russell, who was defendants' predecessor, and the water thus reserved and excepted flowed in its natural course into what is now plaintiffs' land. Defendants do not expressly admit that they claim title through the said common grantor F. A. Hihn, but we make the statement from the evidence in the record which well establishes that fact and which is also found to be the fact in the findings of the court.

The reservation and exception of water rights which we have referred to is contained in the deed from said Hihn to Wm. Russell, February 23, 1888. It is as follows: "The said Hihn reserving for himself, his heirs and assigns the water of the Gold gulch and of the Shingle Mill creek so called, and the right to take said water out of the beds of the said streams and to conduct it by means of pipes or flume through and over the land hereby conveyed. Also the right to mine in said Gold gulch for gold and silver." This deed also reserved to the grantor the right to construct certain roads and also gave the grantee the right to construct roads.

The evidence also included a certain deed and agreement of 1912 between Holmes Lime Company and F. A. Hihn Company. These two companies were successors in interest to the grantee and grantor, respectively, in the Hihn-Russell deed of 1888 and were predecessors in interest of defendants and plaintiffs herein, respectively. By this agreement plaintiffs' predecessors F. A. Hihn Company conveyed to Holmes Lime Company certain of the rights reserved by the said Hihn-Russell deed, expressly reserving, however, to said F. A. Hihn Company the right to the water of Gold gulch. As part of the same transaction Holmes Lime Company deeded to F. A. Hihn Company a 200-foot strip of land north of the stream in such a way as to move the boundary line between the parties about 200 feet northwardly from the stream. After this only that part of the stream which now is within defendants' land was left within the land of defendants' said predecessor. That boundary line still remains the boundary between the lands of the defendants and plaintiffs.

The appellants contend that the reservation of the water of Gold gulch was not sufficient in description nor in law to have the effect of severing the right of appellants and their predecessors to take the water from that part of the stream from which they were enjoined from taking it. At the trial it was appellants' contention and their allegation in their answer that they were taking water from Limestone brook, and that that was not a part of Gold gulch stream, but should be considered a different stream. The two parts joined end to end and formed physically one continuous stream.

On this appeal appellants now claim that the part of the stream from which they were enjoined from taking water is the Northwest fork of Gold gulch and as such is again a different stream from Gold gulch. This claim is based chiefly upon a certain call of the description in the Hihn-Russell deed. In the said deed the southern boundary line was in part Gold gulch and in part a line which, after running southeasterly down a "steep brushy spur of the mountain," ran thence to a redwood tree "marked 'W' which stands at the mouth of the northwest fork of the said Gold gulch, etc." It is appellants' contention that the reservation in the deed being in terms the water of Gold gulch, it did not reserve the water of the Northwest fork of Gold gulch.

The court took evidence upon these points and found that this part of the stream was not referred to as Limestone brook until 1912; that in 1888, when the reservation of water was originally made, it was known and commonly referred to as Gold gulch; and that this part of said stream was in fact Gold gulch. The evidence sufficiently supports the finding and was properly received. A thing may have more than one name, and when referred to by any of its names the same thing is meant and designated. The names of things often are such that evidence is required to show what thing is meant by the name.

Upon these points the deed and agreement of 1912, above referred to, between the predecessors in interest of the parties hereto contain declarations and recitals which are important evidence in establishing the fact that the reservation of the water of Gold gulch included that part of the stream from which appellants were taking water. By that transaction the southern boundary of the land of appellants' predecessor was moved away from all of Gold gulch stream except from the fork which still remained within its land. In this transaction the reservation of the water of Gold gulch, to be sensible, therefore, must have referred to the upper part or fork of the stream. Furthermore, appellants' said predecessor, while accepting a conveyance of rights with a reservation in respondents' predecessor of the water in "Gold Gulch," made to the latter a deed to the 200-foot strip in which one of the descriptive calls referred to this fork of the stream as "Limestone Brook, known to grantee as Gold Gulch." This transaction amounts to a declaration of the previous owner of appellants' land that the neighboring owners, respondents' predecessors, had reserved the water of Gold gulch, and that the part of Gold gulch called at that time, by some, Limestone brook, was included within the term Gold gulch. By the said transaction of 1912 respondents' predecessors in interest gave up and conveyed to appellants' predecessors the right previously reserved, to take the water out of the stream and conduct it over the Russell lands, but expressly reserved the water of the stream. From this it resulted that the former's right came to be the right to that water which the upper owner must not take, but let flow down the stream to the lower owner, who could there take it. The latter had no right to take the water, because he had never obtained that right, it having been expressly excepted from his deed.

[1-3] Appellants' attack upon the legal sufficiency of the original reservation of water in 1888 is the claim that it was only a personal agreement, by which the grantor reserved to himself alone certain water for his own use, as in the case of Peterson v. McDonald, 13 Cal. App. 644, 110 P. 465. We find no similarity between the facts of that case and this one. Here in 1888 Hihn reserved for himself, his heirs and assigns, in terms, the water of Gold gulch and also the right to conduct it over the lands conveyed. The reservation of the water was an exception rather than a reservation, and operated to withhold from the thing granted the right to the water so excepted and described. 9 Cal. Jur. 323; Van Slyke v. Arrowhead, etc., Power Co., 155 Cal. 675, 102 P. 816. It was a proper subject for reservation and exception from the grant. San Rafael Ranch Co. v. Ralph Rogers Co., 154 Cal. 76, 96 P. 1092; Walker v. Lillingston, 137 Cal. 401, 70 P. 282; Painter v. Pasadena L. & W. Co., 91 Cal. 81, 27 P. 539; Miller & Lux, Inc., v. J. G. James Co., 179 Cal. 690, 178 P. 716.

The transaction of 1912 between the predecessors of the parties to this action also shows that the original reservation of water was not considered to be a personal covenant for personal use. In that agreement all the various reservations and exceptions contained in the Hihn-Russell deed are recited and set forth in full in the following form:

"Whereas, the reservations, conditions and provisions of said deeds from F. A. Hihn to William Russell are as follows:

"The rights, reserved to F. A. Hihn and now vested in his successor in interest are." Here follows the description of each of said rights, including "the right of the water of Gold Gulch."

From a consideration of the evidence, including the declarations of the predecessors in interest of the appellants, we conclude that the water right in dispute had been properly reserved and described and belonged to respondents. Appellants and their predecessors have had no riparian rights upon the stream since 1888, when the reservation severed the riparian rights then appurtenant to the lands described in the complaint as now owned by appellants. As against the nonriparian appellants, therefore, the respondents, who were clearly riparian owners down stream, were entitled to prevent the diversion by appellants which diminished the natural flow of the stream into and upon respondents' land. 26 Cal. Jur. p. 126, § 330; 26 Cal. Jur. p. 538, § 787; 25 Cal. Jur. p. 1067, § 66; Scott v. Fruit Growers' Supply Co., 202 Cal. 47, 258 P. 1095.

[4] In so far as said water right has been effectively reserved, appellants make the technical point that because respondents' 200-foot strip of land lying along the north bank of Gold gulch was conveyed in the Hihn-Russell deed minus the water rights, the said strip thereupon became nonriparian; that because said strip is a part of respondents' present lands, the finding which declares respondents' lands to be riparian is at least in part untrue. This point is of no benefit to appellants, since respondents would still be entitled to the injunction on account of the many acres of their riparian lands abutting the south bank of the stream, which is many times greater in area than this strip. The exact status of the water rights appurtenant to this 200-foot strip of land is a matter which may not require adjudication until some future time. In the meantime it is no concern of appellants, so far as this litigation goes; their lands described in the complaint being nonriparian to the stream by reason of the facts in this case.

[5] Appellants claim to be the owners of land containing the very uppermost reaches of the stream through a patent to J. H. Logan, and that therefore they have riparian rights there not severed by the reservation made by Hihn and his successors. If appellants proved title to the said land, which we cannot determine from their brief, the point is immaterial because the judgment appealed from established respondents' right to the water in that part of the stream which is "within the boundaries of defendants' (appellants') land described in the complaint." It thus goes no further upstream than the land derived by appellants through Hihn and makes no adjudication about the water rights of the Logan land.

[6] Appellants offered in evidence a United States patent to Sansevain dated 1885, but did not attempt to prove a chain of title from said patent to themselves. It seems to be their claim that this evidence made it necessary for respondents to trace their title from Sansevain. As the record clearly shows that both parties to this action claimed title through a common grantor subsequent to 1885, it was not necessary for either party to prove title in the said common grantor. Phillips v. Menotti, 167 Cal. 328, 139 P. 796, and authorities cited.

[7] Up to this point we have referred to appellants and respondents without distinguishing between the two respondents nor between the several appellants and defendants. The respondent Seminary Avenue Land Company, being the owner of the southern tract of land, commenced to subdivide it into lots and sell the same. As a part of the plan Forest Lakes Mutual Water Company, a nonprofit corporation, was organized. To this company the water rights were conveyed for the purpose of administration, the plan being to issue shares of stock in the mutual water company to each lot purchaser so that in this way each lot owner will own his share of water rights. The company was therefore a distributing agency and trustee for the owners of the land, and the court found that said water company was the owner in trust for the Seminary Avenue Land Company of the water rights. Appellants' attack upon this finding is unsupported by the printing of evidence except the deed. The evidence printed by repondent fully supports the finding. The conveyance by Seminary Avenue Land Company to Forest Lakes Mutual Water Company of the water rights was not such a conveyance as severed and destroyed the riparian rights. Appellants' argument is that the land company owned no water rights, having conveyed them, and so was not a riparian owner and that the water company had no land and so could not enforce riparian rights. The argument, of course, falls before the finding and the fact that one company is but the agent and instrumentality of the other. Estate of Thomas, 147 Cal. 236, 241, 81 P. 539; Riverside Land Co. v. Jarvis, 174 Cal. 316, 327, 163 P. 54; 26 Cal. Jur. 449. Some technical points are made concerning the issuance of stock of the Mutual Water Company and the recordation of its by-laws. These points arise from the fact that the arrangement between the two parties plaintiff is in its transition stage. This is an action in equity. The good faith of the plan of the parties plaintiff is not questioned, and no useful result will be obtained by analyzing these points. So long as the plaintiffs are content to maintain this action as joint plaintiffs, no nice distinction need be made as to exactly what rights each plaintiff owns at this particular time. Between the two their rights are complete.

[8] The parties defendant are similarly complicated. Fetherston at first shared ownership with other individual defendants and then became the sole owner. The Santa Cruz Land Title Company is his holding company, holding the land in trust for him. The Felton Water Company is his agent, trustee, and instrumentality. Fetherston owns all the issued shares of the Felton Water Company except a few qualifying shares. The stock ownership and agency of these two companies are directly alleged in the answer filed by Fetherston. Following these facts the court's judgment and injunction ran against "the Felton Water Company, Inc., the agency and instrumentality of George Fetherston." So far as Fetherston had admitted and, in fact, alleged this agency and instrumentality, he as an appellant here cannot complain of this part of the judgment. It is proper and, indeed, usual for an injunction to run not only against the party to the action but also against all his agents, employees, etc. 14 Cal. Jur. 279. The determination of the agency is, of course, binding upon Fetherston. The Felton Water Company was not a party to the suit, however, did not appear therein by any pleading and, of course, is not an appellant here. The determination of the agency, therefore, is not necessarily binding upon that corporation as an entity, although the injunction is binding on every one acting under the named parties to the suit with notice. Granting that the injunction and judgment should not have named the Felton Water Company by name as though it were a party to the action and should have run only against the named parties defendant and their agents, employees, etc., in general terms, yet the error is not one for which appellant Fetherston can complain, unless he is what he now claims not to be, the alter ego of said company. In any event it is binding on him individually. Whether that company has the right to have its name removed from the judgment and injunction is a matter that should not be decided in the absence of jurisdiction of the person of that company.

This disposes of all the points raised by appellants.

The judgment is affirmed.

KREUZER v. STRADT. (Civ. 6480.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1929.

Bills and notes ⚷262—Plaintiff indorsing for own benefit note owned by defendant and profiting thereby could not recover payment of judgment against him as indorser.

Where defendant did not request plaintiff to indorse note transferred as security for machinery purchased by defendant, but plaintiff indorsed note on own account and for own benefit under arrangement with seller of machinery to secure profit out of transaction, and note was not paid by makers, but judgment was taken against plaintiff, payment by plaintiff of judgment whereby he secured transfer of lot exceeding in value amount of judgment and was entitled to assignment of judgment against defendant could not be recovered on ground that it was paid for use and benefit and at request of defendant and that plaintiff indorsed as accommodation to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by William J. Kreuzer against Jean Stradt. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arnold W. Liechti, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Eric Lyders, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This is an action to recover the sum of $600, which is alleged in the complaint to have been paid out by the plaintiff for the use and benefit and at the request of the defendant. This allegation was denied by the defendant in his answer, and upon trial of the issue the court found in favor of the defendant and rendered judgment accordingly, from which this appeal is taken by the plaintiff.

The ground urged by appellant in support of his appeal is that the finding of the court in favor of the defendant is against the evidence. The record discloses little, if any, dispute as to the facts giving rise to the controversy. Kreuzer, the plaintiff, and Stradt, the defendant, were fellow employees and friends. The latter, being the owner of a ranch, desired to purchase some agricultural machinery and enlisted the help of Kreuzer to this end. Stradt was also the owner of an unsecured promissory note in the sum of $500 executed by J. P. Niel, L. R. Ferris, and S. M. Williams, and his wife owned a building lot, and it was understood between Kreuzer and Stradt that this note and lot must constitute the fund for the purchase of the machinery. After some effort Kreuzer entered into negotiations with the Tarantino Produce Company, of which Anthony P. Tarantino was president, which had for disposal a tractor and some farming implements, and Stradt was willing to accept these for the note and lot. Tarantino, however, did not wish to take the lot, and suggested to Kreuzer that he find a purchaser for it. The lot some time before these negotiations had cost $562, and there was evidence in the record from which the trial court could well conclude that it was presently worth the sum of $700. Kreuzer reported to Tarantino that he was unable to find a purchaser for the lot but was willing to take it himself. No valuation had been placed upon it by Tarantino, who was not familiar with it nor its value, and took no pains to acquaint himself with these matters. He thereupon agreed with Kreuzer that the latter might have the lot, paying therefor the sum of $35, but that Kreuzer should indorse the above-mentioned note and allow the lot to stand as security for its payment. This was agreed to. The record does not disclose just how far Stradt was advised of this arrangement between Kreuzer and Tarantino, although, on the other hand, there is no direct evidence that it was concealed from him. In testifying to the transaction Stradt merely states that he gave the lot and the note in payment for the farming machinery. Thereupon a bill of sale of the machinery was made by the Tarantino Produce Company to Stradt, who, together with Kreuzer, indorsed the note to said company, and the lot was conveyed by Stradt and his wife to Mary Lamantia, sister of Tarantino, who at the same time agreed with Kreuzer in writing to reconvey it to him if and when the note should be paid. The note upon becoming due was not paid by the makers, nor is there any evidence in the record that it was ever presented for payment, or nonpayment protested, and notice given to the indorsers; but the Tarantino Produce Company commenced an action against Kreuzer and Stradt as indorsers to recover thereon. Kreuzer allowed default in that action to be taken against him, and paid the judgment, receiving from the Tarantino Produce Company an agreement in writing that the latter would proceed to take judgment against Stradt and assign it to Kreuzer, and also a conveyance from Mary Lamantia of the building lot. This payment forms the basis of the present action; it being the theory and contention of Kreuzer that in indorsing the promissory note at the request of the Tarantino Produce Company he did so purely as an accommodation to the defendant, Stradt, and to enable the transaction of the sale of the machinery to him to be carried through.

The record presents no such situation. The evidence discloses that defendant never requested plaintiff to indorse the note, but that he did so upon his own account and for his own benefit under the arrangement with Tarantino above set forth, his purpose manifestly being to secure a profit out of the transaction. Had the note been paid by its makers, plaintiff would have acquired the lot—which there is evidence to show was of the value of $700—for practically nothing, for his activities in the matter. The note not having been paid, plaintiff nevertheless profited by his acts when he satisfied the judgment recovered against him, for he obtained the lot and in addition thereto was entitled to have assigned to him a judgment against defendant for approximately $600. The facts speak for themselves.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Reuben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action to recover money paid for corporate stock by L. W. Klinker and others against the Guarantee Title Company of Long Beach and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Arthur G. Baker, of Los Angeles, and Joseph Hansen, of Santa Monica, for appellants.

Linnell & Linnell, of Long Beach, for respondents.

McDANIEL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from judgment after demurrer sustained to plaintiffs' complaint. The plaintiffs allege the corporate capacity of the defendant Guarantee Title Company, and of the Milton Realty Company and some fictitious corporations, and that the defendants individually named in the title are stockholders of the Guarantee Title Company of Long Beach, defendant, and were such stockholders when the cause of action of plaintiffs sued upon was contracted and incurred. Three only of the individual stockholders were actually served with summons, viz.: Orson C. Roberts, Charlotte P. Roberts, and Frank P. Cross, and they, with the defendant Guarantee Title Company of Long Beach are respondents herein. The complaint herein was filed on December 30, 1926.

It is alleged that on or about the 24th day of April, 1923, the plaintiff, L. W. Klinker, paid to the said defendant Guarantee Title Company of Long Beach the sum of $50,000 as and for the purchase price of 400 shares of capital stock of said corporation, of which 8 shares at said time were issued direct to defendant Floyd W. Calkins, 2 shares to defendant Lucy A. Calkins, 8 shares to George E. and Lucy A. Calkins, and 4 shares to defendant J. E. Burney; that thereafter, on the 9th day of January, 1924, said L. W. Klinker sold and transferred to Zeno Klinker 176 shares of said 400 shares of capital stock, and on the same day sold and transferred to Rex A. Klinker 200 shares of said 400 shares of stock; that the said sales and transfers of stock were made in good faith; and that the plaintiffs Zeno Klinker and Rex A. Klinker did pay therefor valuable considerations.

It is further alleged in the complaint that the defendant corporation "is now transacting business as a corporation, having its principal place of business in Long Beach, Los Angeles County, California, and at all times, up to on or about the 20th of April, 1924, treated said stock as valid, outstanding and fully paid-up stock of said corporation"; that on or about the 30th of March, 1925, defendant corporation filed two actions in the superior court of Los Angeles county, Cal., "in each of which the defendant Guarantee Title Company, said corporation, was plaintiff, and in one of which Zeno Klinker, one of the plaintiffs herein, was the defendant, and in the other Rex A. Klinker, another of the plaintiffs herein, was the defendant"; the action against Zeno Klinker by said corporation is cause No. 166356, and that against Rex A. Klinker is cause No. 166357.

It is further averred that the said defendant corporation as plaintiff in said actions did seek to cancel the capital stock so transferred, and sold to said Zeno Klinker and Rex A. Klinker by the plaintiff L. W. Klinker: and that on or about the 1st day of November, 1926, the said superior court in said actions did order, adjudge, and decree the stock belonging to the defendants therein canceled, and did order the stock certificates evidencing the said stock delivered up for cancellation; that the certificates were, pursuant to said judgment and order, on or about the 1st day of November, 1926, surrendered and delivered for cancellation, and were thereafter canceled: "that at the time of rendering said judgment, the said court did file its findings of fact, which said findings did expressly provide and state that the said L. W. Klinker did pay as a consideration for said stock the sum of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00); all of which will more fully appear from the records of said causes Numbers 166356 and 166357, which said findings are hereby referred to and by such reference made a part of this complaint as fully as if set out herein."

Paragraphs VI, VII, and VIII are as follows:

"That said L. W. Klinker did pay the said sum of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00) to the defendant Guarantee Title Company of Long Beach for said stock under and by virtue of a mistake of fact, to-wit, under the belief that the said stock was valid. That by reason of said decree so rendered, as aforesaid, in said causes Numbers 166356 and 166357, the said consideration for said fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00) paid as aforesaid has wholly failed and the same has become worthless.

"That said plaintiffs discovered the said mistake after on or about the 1st day of November, 1926, the date on which said judgment was rendered, as aforesaid; that said plaintiffs were without means of knowing that said stock was worthless and invalid until the filing of said judgment and findings as aforesaid.

"That defendants have not nor has any of them paid to these plaintiffs or any of them the said sum of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00) nor any part thereof."

Paragraph IX alleges the demand for the repayment to the plaintiffs of the said sum of $50,000 and the refusal of the defendants and each of them to pay the same or any part thereof. Then follows an averment as to the amount of subscribed capital stock at the time that said indebtedness was contracted and incurred and the number of shares of stock held by each of the named stockholder defendants, referring to schedule annexed, showing said names and number of shares of stock, marked Exhibit A and made a part of the complaint; and alleging "that each of the said defendants were, at the time when said indebtedness was contracted and incurred, and now are, indebted to these plaintiffs in a sum equal to the proportion that the said shares owned by each of them bears to the total number of subscribed shares of capital stock, as aforesaid." Then follows prayer for judgment.

The three defendant stockholders filed a demurrer and motion and to strike out portions of the complaint. The motion to strike was never passed upon and need not be further considered. The defendant corporation also filed a demurrer to the complaint and a motion to strike out certain portions, which said motion to strike was not ruled upon and need not be further considered.

The demurrers were both general and special and were alike in all respects, except that the stockholders' demurrer in paragraph VIII thereof is upon the ground "that said action is barred against these defendants under Section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California"; and the same numbered paragraph in the defendant corporation's demurrer is "that said action is barred against this defendant under Section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California."

The common grounds of both demurrers are stated as follows:

I. That said complaint does not contain facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against these defendants, or any of them.

II. That there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff in said action.

III. That there is a misjoinder of parties defendant in said action.

IV. That several causes of action have been improperly united and not separately stated.

V. That it cannot be ascertained from said complaint how, nor in what manner, said plaintiff L. W. Klinker paid the defendant Guarantee Title Company of Long Beach the sum of $50,000, nor to what officers of said company said $50,000 was paid.

VI. That it cannot be ascertained from the complaint, and particularly from paragraph V thereof, how nor in what manner, nor at what times, the Guarantee Title Company, nor what officers or agents of the Guarantee Title Company, treated the stock of plaintiffs as valid, outstanding, and fully paid up.

VII. That it cannot be ascertained from said complaint, nor any part thereof, why the said plaintiffs did not discover the alleged mistake of fact previous to November 1, 1926.

On submission of the demurrers, the trial court sustained the demurrer to the complaint of the defendant stockholders without leave to amend. The order sustaining the demurrer of the defendant corporation was not so made, but the plaintiffs, as to said corporation, did not file nor offer to file any amended complaint. On March 24, 1927, judgment of dismissal was entered.

Counsel for appellants, with commendable industry and ability, has argued each and every ground of demurrer in support of his contention that the court erred in sustaining said demurrers. With like industry, counsel for respondents contends, of course, that the court's ruling is fully in accordance with correct principles of law involved herein. We recognize that the court's judgment in sustaining said demurrers was based upon the statute of limitations, and, if it appear upon the face of the complaint that the cause of action was barred because of the lapse of time between the time when the cause of action accrued and the filing of the complaint herein, the judgment should be affirmed, and the necessity for consideration of the other grounds of demurrer will be eliminated. We therefore shall consider whether the liability of the corporation on the one hand and the stockholders on the other has been extinguished by sections 338 and 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The action against the stockholders is upon a statutory liability. "It is now well established that, for the purpose of Section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure, prescribing a limitation to actions, the stockholder's statutory liability is a liability created by law." 6 Cal. Jur. 1013, § 393, cited by appellants, who also collate on this point. Royal Trust Co. v. MacBean et al., 168 Cal. 643, 144 P. 139; Jones v. Goldtree, etc., 142 Cal. 383, 77 P. 939.

Appellants correctly state, in consideration of section 359, Code of Civil Procedure, and conceding that actions brought under said section must be brought within three years after the liability was created, as follows: "If this is the correct exposition and interpretation of section 359, we are forced to conclude that limitation is not extended on liability of stockholders beyond three years from the time when the liability was created, or, as has been expressed, when it was incurred or contracted."

Then they quote verbatim 6 Cal. Jur. 1013–1014, and say: "In order therefore for the plaintiffs in this action to maintain suit against the stockholders on the statutory liability, it becomes incumbent upon the plaintiffs to show that the statute did not begin to run in April, 1923 (the date on which the stock was originally purchased), but at some subsequent date, which date must be less than three years next preceding the filing of this action. The analysis heretofore set out has been for the purpose of presenting facts sufficient to distinguish between the instant case and the usual cases wherein the point of accrual of the cause of action is not indeterminate. In the case at bar the liability of the stockholders did not arise at the time the money was paid. This is true for the reason that no liability existed for the repayment of the money delivered to the Guarantee Title Company of Long Beach by L. W. Klinker on or about the 24th day of April, 1923."

Upon the premises contained in the italicized portion of the foregoing, appellants base their argument, in support of which they cite Johnson v. Bank of Lake, 125 Cal. 6, 57 P. 664, 73 Am. St. Rep. 17; 6 Cal. Jur. 1020, par. 398; Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 62 P. 68, 65 P. 1094; Bridges v. Fisk, 53 Cal. App. 117, 200 P. 71; Kempton v. Floribel, etc., Co., 46 Cal. App. 456, 189 P. 478.

We believe that the premises are not sound. When L. W. Klinker paid $50,000 to the corporation, for which he was to receive 400 shares of capital stock, the obligation immediately arose upon the part of both the corporation and the stockholders either to issue to him value received in the shape of valid stock, or, lacking authority or ability to do so, to return to him his money.

The findings further show that this certificate No. 135 was later surrendered by L. W. Klinker, and that thereupon he, assuming to act as president, and P. H. Guy, assuming to act as secretary, issued the respective certificates of stock held by appellants herein, Zeno Klinker and Rex A. Klinker. It is shown by the findings that, at the time of the issuance of said certificates, the said appellants herein knew that the issuance of said stock was not authorized by the said or any permit issued by the corporation commissioner of the state of California; and as conclusions of law in both said cases, the court concluded that said certificates of stock are and each of them is null and void and of no force or virtue whatsoever, and do not in fact or in law evidence the ownership by any person or persons whatsoever of any of the shares of the authorized capital stock of plaintiff corporation, and that the plaintiff, said corporation, was entitled to judgment for the surrender of said certificates to it and for the cancellation thereof. Judgment was entered accordingly.

[3] The appellants are bound by these findings, for they plead them affirmatively, and plead also the fact that judgment of cancellation was rendered. It follows, therefore, that, regardless of what any one may have believed as to the validity of the issue, the stock issued, while apparently regular in form, was, in fact, void, spurious, and worthless, and that L. W. Klinker received nothing of value for his money; with the payment of the money for valid stock to the defendant corporation the liability and obligation eo instanti arose upon the part of both the corporation and the stockholders either to issue, if it could, value in the shape of valid certificates or to return the money. Therefore the statute of limitations, under the authorities cited, would act as a bar, beyond question, after the lapse of three years from the date of payment.

[4] This case is clearly distinguishable from the cases cited by appellants, in that by no possibility could any new obligation have arisen in favor of appellants herein by the decrees rendered in said actions numbered 166356 and 166357. The void certificates of stock were not even choses in action, for, notwithstanding the alleged mistake of belief as to the validity of said certificates entertained by the appellants and acquiesced in by respondent corporation until April, 1924, the said certificates of stock would not have supported an action brought to recover money or value in the event of their transfer by the holder, because they were utterly worthless and invalid.

"A thing in action is a right to recover money or other personal property by a judicial proceeding." Section 953, Civ. Code.

As argued by respondents: "A perusal of said findings will remove all doubt that the stock in question was void ab initio and was issued at the instance of L. W. Klinker, one of the plaintiffs in this case, and a part thereof sold and transferred to Rex A. Klinker, one of the plaintiffs in this case, and a part thereof sold to Zeno Klinker, one of the plaintiffs in this case."

The cases cited by counsel for appellants all rest upon valid contracts, some of which related to services to be rendered, when the statute did not begin to run against the stockholders of the corporation until the rendition of said services; as in Johnson v. Bank of Lake, supra; or upon payments of a note by an accommodation indorser as surety for a corporation, in which case a new cause of action accrued in favor of the indorser against the corporation and the stockholders at the time of payment by the indorser, and the liability of the stockholders for reimbursement would not be barred until three years after date of payment by the indorser, as in Yule v. Bishop, supra; Bridges v. Fisk, supra; or the case of a rescission of a contract of sale of an automobile, when, by reason of the vendor's failure to deliver the automobile, the vendee's right to rescission accrued, wherein it was held: "The stockholder's liability accrues at the inception of the corporation's liability, and it is from that date that the three year period within which the stockholders must be sued commences to run."

The findings show that the suits for the cancellation of stock in the superior court of Los Angeles county were not suits for rescission, but were found to be suits for cancellation. Under section 3412, Civil Code, those certificates, although invalid and intrinsically worthless, because issued contrary to the provisions of law as found by the court, were written instruments, in respect to which there was a reasonable apprehension that, if left outstanding, they might cause injury to the defendant corporation and to the stockholders thereof. They were therefore ordered surrendered and canceled.

[5, 6] The closer and more important question herein is whether or not as to the corporation defendant the action is one for relief on the ground of mistake, wherein the cause would not be barred by subdivision 4 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure, until the lapse of three years after the discovery of the facts constituting the mistake.

It will be observed from the complaint, paragraph VI, supra, that it is alleged that the mistake relied upon is alleged to have been the payment of the said $50,000 to the defendant corporation for said stock, "under and by virtue of a mistake of fact, to-wit, under the belief that said stock was valid," and in paragraph VII it is alleged that plaintiffs discovered said mistake on or about the 1st day of November, 1926, the date on which the judgment canceling the said stock was rendered, and that plaintiffs "were without means of knowing that said stock was worthless and invalid until the filing of said judgment and findings as aforesaid."

It appears to us in view of the findings made a part of the complaint that appellants knew every fact connected with the payment of the money and the issuance of the invalid stock, including the terms of the permit of the corporation commissioner; and that the only mistake was a mistake of opinion or belief which would make it rather a mistake of law than a mistake of fact.

"A mere naked mistake of law, unattended with any such special circumstances as" misapprehension, undue influence or misplaced confidence furnishes "no ground for the interposition of a court of equity." Kenyon v. Welty, 20 Cal. 637, 641, 81 Am. Dec. 137.

"Averment of a mistake of law does not bring the case within that extreme class of mistakes of law from which equity will relieve." Kopp v. Gunther, 95 Cal. 63, 74, 30 P. 301, 303; Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 471, 76 Am. Dec. 540; Burt v. Wilson, 28 Cal. 632, 638, 87 Am. Dec. 142.

"Mistake of law, such as the mistake of legal effects of an instrument, contents of which known to party, will not be relieved against." Martin v. Hamlin, 18 Mich. 354, 100 Am. Dec. 181.

In the light of the facts set out in the findings, the trial court may well have held as to the averment of facts concerning the alleged mistake that the complaint as pointed out by general demurrer failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

It seems obvious to us that no facts were stated sufficient to have tolled the statute of limitations so as to have extended the period of limitation longer than three years from the date the liability of the corporation accrued, and, if the appellants saw fit after April, 1923, to delay action to protect themselves and thus slept on their rights for more than three years, they have themselves only to blame. Furthermore, they were accorded the privilege by the trial court to amend their complaint, but they did not avail themselves thereof.

Respondents have cited a number of cases wherein the cause of action was based upon alleged fraud, and it appears under subdivision 4 of section 338 that such actions must be determined and be governed by principles of law, which by analogy should also apply to actions grounded on mistake.

They cite among other authorities Lataillade v. Orena, 91 Cal. 565, 578, 27 P. 924, 927 (25 Am. St. Rep. 219), to the effect that "a party seeking to avoid the bar of the statute on account of fraud must show that he used due diligence to detect it, and if he made any particular discovery, should state when it was made, what it was, how it was made, and why it was not made sooner; and further, that one will be presumed to have known whatever with reasonable diligence he might have ascertained concerning the fraud of which he complains."

They also cite Burke v. Maguire, 154 Cal. 456, 98 P. 21; Victor Oil Co. v. Drum, 184 Cal. 226, 193 P. 243; People ex rel. Post v. San Joaquin Valley Agricultural Ass'n, 151 Cal. 797, 91 P. 740; section 19, Civil Code: "Every person who has had actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, has constructive notice of the fact itself in all cases in which, by prosecuting such inquiry, he might have learned such fact."

For the reasons stated we hold that the trial court's orders sustaining the demurrers to the complaint were correctly made.

The judgment is affirmed.

DEIST v. BECK (two cases).★
(Civ. 5321, 5912.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 26, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 25, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 24, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Where findings were not attacked on appeal, it must be assumed that they are correct.

Where trial court's findings were not attacked on appeal as not supported by evidence, nor as not supporting conclusions of law or otherwise, it must be assumed that they are correct, and appellant's contentions involving facts not within the findings, and which were directly opposed thereto, could not be sustained.

2. Appeal and error 🔑766—If appellant fails to print in brief or supplement sufficient of record to justify reversal, judgment will be affirmed (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Where appeals were taken under alternative method, appellate court was not required to search record to discover possible grounds for reversal, but, if appellant failed to print in his brief or supplement thereto sufficient of record to justify a reversal, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, judgment will be affirmed on ground that record fails to show error.

time for filing of such brief having long since expired, the appeals were ordered submitted on appellant's briefs.

Each case is an action seeking recovery of payments alleged to be due on the same contract for the purchase of real property, the first seeking recovery of payments claimed to be due up to February 12, 1924, and the second seeking recovery for payments alleged to be in default for the period between March 12, 1924, and May 12, 1925. An examination of the clerk's transcript discloses that the respective complaints allege that about November 12, 1921, F. H. and Ida L. Miller, husband and wife, owned the lot which was the subject of the contract, and agreed to sell the same to Beck for $3,750. The agreement which was in writing is set out in hæc verba and is in the usual form. It acknowledges receipt of a down payment of $200, and provides for payment of the balance at the rate of $40 per month, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum. It is further alleged that certain specified payments have been made by defendant, but that none have been made since February 12, 1923. It is also alleged that about June 5, 1922, the Millers assigned the contract and the property described therein to the plaintiff.

The findings in each case were in accordance with the allegations in the respective complaints, and were followed by the judgments in favor of plaintiff, from which these appeals are taken.

A number of points are attempted to be made by appellant which may be summarized as follows: (1) The contract was breached by respondent's predecessors in interest, the Millers, by conveying the property to one Springer "without subjecting the property to appellant's rights and without giving notice to Springer of said contract of sale." (2) The transfer by the Millers to respondent was ineffective as to appellant, since they were not in a position to convey title to respondent as security to protect appellant in continuing payments on the contract. (3) A subsequent conveyance by Springer to respondent was a nullity, because it contained no description of the property. (4) Any cause of action which might have existed belonged to Springer, since title had been conveyed to her by the Millers, and her conveyance to respondent was void. (5) There was a novation, a new agreement having been entered into between respondent and appellant.

[1] These contentions, however, cannot be sustained, for the reason that the facts involved therein are not within the findings of the court below, and on the contrary are directly opposed thereto. In the first of these cases the findings followed the allegations of the complaint, and in the second case, in addition thereto, the court found as facts: That the Millers assigned the contract to plaintiff; that by grant deed they conveyed the property to Frieda G. Springer, who was plaintiff's daughter and who thereafter deeded it directly to plaintiff; and that the conveyance by the Millers to Frieda G. Springer "was made for the purpose of convenience to Ida Deist and not otherwise and that Ida Deist has been at all times in a position to and has been and is ready, willing and able to convey the title to the said real property." It was further found that defendant was in possession of the property, and that the contract had been recorded. As to the alleged novation, the court found that no new agreement had been entered into, and that there had merely been an attempt to settle the litigation between the parties through an escrow which was never completed, which "proposed settlement was never consummated."

The findings are not attacked on these appeals. Appellant does not urge that they are not supported by the evidence, or that they do not in turn support the court's conclusions of law. He has not even incorporated them in either of his briefs or in any supplement thereto. It must be assumed, therefore, that he makes no contention but that they are supported by the evidence and are correct.

The record on these appeals resembles to some extent that in Estate of Berry, supra, where, as here, the appeal was taken under the alternative method. The court there said: "The nature of appellants' contentions upon this appeal can best be arrived at by a process of elimination. There is no suggestion in their brief of any defect or deficiency in the pleadings, or that the court failed to find upon any issue framed thereby, or that any finding of fact is irrelevant to the issues, or that the findings fail to support the judgment, or that any error was committed at the trial, or that any conclusion of law is erroneous. We are thus brought to the conclusion that the gist of appellants' contention is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of fact, but no such contention is anywhere stated in their brief (except with respect to the so-called 'special findings'). There is no specification of such insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of ultimate facts, and if there were, it could not be reviewed except by reference to the findings themselves, which are nowhere to be found, either in appellants' brief or in the supplement thereto. A proper course to be followed by this court under such circumstances would be to affirm the judgment without further consideration of the appeal. The appellate court is not required to assume the vexatious burden of searching the typewritten transcript for error or for deficiencies therein (Scott v. Hollywood Park Co., 176 Cal. 680 [169 P. 379]; Marcucci v. Vowinckel, 164 Cal. 693 [130 P. 430]; Eddy v. Stowe, 43 Cal. App. 789 [185 P. 1024]; Pasadena Realty Co. v. Clune, 34 Cal. App. 33 [166 P. 1025])."

The judgments are affirmed.

UNITED IRON WORKS v. STANDARD BRASS CASTING CO. (Civ. 6740.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1929.

1. Customs and usages 🔑13—Defendant contracting for castings under contract contemplating rules of Foundrymen's Association held bound to know general custom of foundrymen to replace defective castings without liability for damages.

Where contract for manufacture of castings provided that defendant reserved right to reject all defective castings, and both parties to contract were members of Foundrymen's Association, rules of which were admittedly in contemplation of both parties when making contract, defendant was bound to know of general custom of foundrymen that all defective castings would be replaced without liability on foundry for extra work or damages by reason of defective castings, even in absence of proof of defendant's knowledge of such custom.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1195(4)—Legal rules declared on appeal are binding at subsequent stages of case, and application to evidence is conclusive as to legal effect of evidence except as to new evidence.

Rules of law declared on appeal, whether correctly or incorrectly stated, are binding at subsequent stages of case, and, except as new evidence of different character is offered, as distinguished from evidence which is merely cumulative, application of rules of law to evidence is conclusive as to legal effect of such evidence.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1194(1)—Extracts from former opinion and opinion as whole must be read in light of points urged on previous appeal.

Extracts from former opinion in case, as well as opinion as a whole, must be read in light of points which were uged on previous appeal.

4. Sales 🔑340—Generally parties receiving defective goods may return goods or retain them and sue for damages.

Generally, in absence of express provision in contract, party to whom defective goods are delivered has option either to return them or to retain goods and sue for damages.

5. Sales 🔑340—Under contract permitting purchaser to return defective goods, such remedy was exclusive, and precluded purchaser from retaining goods and claiming damages.

Where contract for manufacture of castings expressly provided that purchaser could reject and return all defective castings, such remedy was exclusive and controlled legal status which otherwise would exist, and purchaser did not have right to retain defective goods and claim damages.

6. Contracts 🔑322(3)—Finding that castings were made in workmanlike manner, and that defects were not due to improper manufacture, held sustained by evidence.

In action to recover purchase price of castings, on ground that castings were defective, evidence that work was done in usual and workmanlike manner, that men engaged in work were competent, that the moulds were made in usual manner and tamped in the usual way, that defendant's representative inspected work as it progressed, that all defects were repaired after they showed up, and that cracks appearing were not caused by poor labor, and that workmen were skilled and used their best efforts, supported finding that castings were made in good and workmanlike manner, and that defects contained in some of them were not due to improper manufacture or workmanship.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Action by the United Iron Works against the Standard Brass Casting Company, in which defendant filed cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, J. Plaintiff sued to recover the purchase price of certain casting work, as to which no dispute exists. By cross-complaint the defendant sought to recover alleged damages for improper performance of the contract. The case has been tried twice At the first trial judgment went for defendant on its cross-complaint, but was reversed by the District Court of Appeal (United Iron Works v. Standard Brass Casting Co., 69 Cal. App. 384, 231 P. 567); a transfer of the case to the Supreme Court for hearing and decision being denied. On a retrial, submitted on the record of the first trial as contained in the bill of exceptions on the former appeal, with some additional evidence, the judgment went for plaintiff, and the defendant was denied any relief under its cross-complaint, and, from such judgment, defendant has appealed.

[1] The contract which is the basis of the action called for the manufacture by United Iron Works of fittings from materials furnished by Standard Brass Casting Company and in accordance with the specifications also furnished by it. The contract specifically provides that all castings not in accordance with specifications should be subject to rejection, and fixes the place of delivery and inspection at the plant of United Iron Works. Standard Brass Casting Company expressly reserved the right in accepting the offer of United Iron Works to reject all defective castings, while the printed rules of the Foundrymen's Association, of which both parties were members, and which admittedly were in the contemplation of both parties when the contract was made, provides: "All defective castings will be replaced and foundry shall not be responsible for any extra machine work or contingent damages caused by reason of defective castings." Even in the absence of proof of appellant's knowledge of this general custom, as a foundryman it was bound to know it. Miller v. Germain Seed Co., 193 Cal. 62, 67, 222 P. 817, 32 A. L. R. 1215.

[2] Respondent urges—and correctly so—that rules of law declared upon appeal, whether correctly or incorrectly stated, are binding at subsequent stages of the case; that except as new evidence of a different character is offered—as distinguished from evidence which is merely cumulative—the application of these rules of law to the evidence before the court is conclusive as to the legal effect of such evidence. 2 Cal. Jur. 944.

In the opinion on the former appeal the court says: "We are satisfied that the judgment must be reversed on the ground that there was no proof of damage complying with the measure prescribed by law. * * * And though it may be true, as the court found, that these defects were not patent on casual inspection, it is admitted that they could have been discovered through water tests made at appellant's plant and that the repairs could then have been made by appellant as "he" was entitled to do under the contract. * * * The written contract called for the manufacture by appellant of the fittings from materials furnished by respondent and in accordance with plans and specifications also furnished by respondent. It specifically provided that all castings not in accord with specifications should be subject to rejection and fixed the place of delivery and inspection at the appellant's plant. * * * The respondent expressly reserved the right in accepting the offer of the appellant to reject all defective castings, while the printed rules of the Foundrymen's Association, of which both parties were members, and which admittedly were in the contemplation of both parties when the contract was made, provided that 'All defective castings will be replaced and foundry shall not be responsible for any extra machine work or contingent damages caused by reason of defective castings.'"

Appellant accepted the castings and shipped them directly from the foundry of respondent in Oakland, Cal., to the New Cordelia Copper Company at Ajo, Ariz., and now claims damages on an amended cross-complaint, in which it alleges that the fittings were not manufactured in accordance with the terms of the contract and in a good and workmanlike manner, in that the same contained cracks, sand holes, and other imperfections, which defects were latent and caused by improper manufacture and workmanship, and that the reasonable cost of remedying these defects was the sum of $7,045.80. This amended cross-complaint was filed to meet the statement in the opinion on the former appeal: "The rights of both parties rest in the written contract, but there is neither allegation nor finding that the terms of the written contract were not observed to the letter by the appellant. Though the respondent might be entitled to damages to the extent of the detriment caused by the defects in the castings, such damages could be recovered only upon allegation and proof that the appellant had failed to perform the contract in accordance with its terms and in a workmanlike manner."

[3, 4] Appellant asserts that on the first appeal the court held that Standard Brass Casting Company in its cross-complaint did not proceed upon the proper theory that this was not a case of implied warranty for the fitness of a manufactured article for a certain purpose, but that the contract in suit was a contract for the performance of work and labor; that the court on the first appeal, in substance, held that Standard Brass Casting Company would be entitled to damages, provided it should both allege and prove that respondent failed to perform the contract in suit in accordance with its terms and in a workmanlike manner. While the court did say "though respondent (appellant here) might be entitled to damages to the extent of the determined cost of the defects in the castings, such damages could be recovered only upon allegation and proof that the appellant (respondent here) had failed to perform the contract in accordance with its terms and in a workmanlike manner," the extracts from the former opinion here quoted, as well as the opinion as a whole, must be read in the light of the points which were urged upon the previous appeal. Under two headings the former appellant and present respondent urged that by the language of the written contract between the parties, supplemented by the undisputed custom of the trade in conformity to which the contract was executed, the contract in legal effect provided that, in the event of delivery of defective castings, the exclusive remedy of the Standard Brass Casting Company was to reject the castings, in which event the United Iron Works was obligated to recast them, and it would seem that the court in the former opinion reached this conclusion, for, in speaking of this particular clause of the contract it says: "It specifically provided that all castings not in accord with specifications should be subject to rejection and fixed the place of delivery and inspection at the appellant's plant." The general rule in California may be stated to be that in the absence of an express provision in the contract a party to whom defective goods are delivered has the option either to return them or to retain them and sue for damages.

[5] However, where the contract provides for such a breach, that remedy is exclusive and controls the legal status which otherwise would exist; if the contract provides that the remedy shall be the rejection and return of the defective articles, no right exists upon the part of the purchaser to retain the goods and claim damages. As is said in Bancroft v. San Francisco Tool Co., 120 Cal. 228, 52 P. 496: "There is no implied warranty created by section 1770 of the Civil Code as to the fitness of this elevator. We again quote it: 'One who manufactures an article, under an order for a particular purpose, warrants by the sale that it is reasonably fit for that purpose.' This section is but the restatement of an elementary principle of law, and does not apply where the manufactured article is furnished under a contract demanding that it be made according to specific plans and specifications." The same rule is announced in Mannix v. Tryon, 152 Cal. 31, 91 P. 983, and in Roebling Construction Co. v. Doe Estate Co., 33 Cal. App. 397, 165 P. 547.

[6] On the question of fact as to whether United Iron Works performed its contract in a workmanlike manner, it may be stated that the court found the fittings were manufactured by plaintiff "in a good and workmanlike manner," and that, although some of the fittings contained defects, "the same were not due to improper manufacture or workmanship of plaintiff." If this finding is supported by the evidence, the judgment must be affirmed regardless of the preceding discussion of points of law. As to the character of the work, George E. Randolph, the superintendent of the United Iron Works, under whose directions the fittings were cast, testified that the work was done in a usual and workmanlike manner; that the men engaged in the work were competent; that the moulds were made in the usual manner and tamped in the usual way; and the work was done in the usual way for work of that class; that the Standard Brass Casting Company, or its representatives, inspected the work as it progressed; that some defects appeared in the castings, but that he checked these every morning and evening, and all of the defects were repaired as they showed up; that none of the fittings were repaired by the "piening" method, and that "piening" was used solely for removing exterior imperfections which did not affect the sufficiency of the castings. There was also testimony that the moulders were competent men; that they prepared the moulds in the proper manner; that all of the moulders were experienced and the moulds were removed promptly and properly. The witness F. Morrill, the foreman on the moulding job, testified that he superintended the labor and that the cracks were not caused by poor labor; that, if cracks were caused, they were caused by something else; that the workmen on the job were skilled workmen and used their best efforts, and the work was carefully done and in a workmanlike manner.

The foregoing testimony sufficiently supports the finding that the fittings were made in a good and workmanlike manner, and that the defects contained in some of them were not due to improper manufacture or workmanship, and the judgment, therefore, should be and it is affirmed.

ANDERSON v. SHAFFER. (Civ. 5207.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 23, 1929.

1. Judgment 🔑910(3)—Limitations began to run against action on judgment after time for appeal had elapsed and judgment attained finality (Code Civ. Proc. § 336).

Five-year limitations of Code Civ. Proc. § 336 commenced to run against action on judgment after time for appeal had elapsed and judgment attained finality.

2. Husband and wife 🔑87(3)—Wife promising that, if husband did not pay his note before death, she would pay it from life insurance, was husband's surety, and her obligation was that of guarantor (Civ. Code, §§ 158, 162, 2787, 2844).

Wife signing written statement to effect that, if husband died before he paid his promissory note, she would pay note out of life insurance on her husband, stood as surety of husband, since debt was not her own and property was her separate property under Civ. Code, § 162, and her obligation was that of a guarantor under section 2787, relating to guaranty, section 2844, providing that sureties have all rights of guarantors, and section 158, relating to rights of married women to enter into engagements.

3. Guaranty 🔑78(1)—Guarantor could avail herself of every defense which principal might have asserted inherent to debt and not of personal nature.

Guarantor was entitled to avail herself of every defense which her principal might have asserted inherent to debt and not of a purely personal nature.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑167(1)—Action against guarantor was barred, where action on judgment against principal was barred by statute of limitations (Civ. Code, §§ 2787, 2808, 2809, 2844; Code Civ. Proc. § 336).

Where judgment against husband became final on September 21, 1913, assuming from failure to allege contrary that no appeal was taken, action commenced in 1925 against wife who was guarantor of husband's debt under Civ. Code, §§ 2787, 2844, was barred, since action on judgment was barred by five-year statute, Code Civ. Proc. § 336, and guarantor's liability was commensurate with that of principal under Civ. Code, § 2808, but could not exceed it under section 2809.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Flo Anderson against Emma C. Shaffer. From a judgment dismissing her action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur Crum, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Adair & Adair, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment dismissing her action, she having failed to amend her complaint after an order sustaining a demurrer thereto.

The complaint alleges the following facts: On April 1, 1912, plaintiff loaned $500 to one Shaffer, accepting as evidence of the latter's indebtedness his note for $500, dated April 1, 1910 (that date having been inserted by mutual mistake, all parties having intended the date to be written 1912), payable three months after date with interest at 7 per cent. per annum. To secure payment of this note Shaffer executed a chattel mortgage on personal property belonging to him. The note not being paid, plaintiff, on October 14, 1912, assigned it to one Snider for collection. Snider brought suit on the same day to foreclose the chattel mortgage, judgment therein was entered March 8, 1913, and on March 17, 1913, the property was sold by the sheriff, bringing the net sum of $138.55, which was credited on the judgment, leaving a balance due of $490.02, which was, on March 21, 1913, docketed as a deficiency judgment against Shaffer. No further amount has been paid on the note or deficiency judgment. On April 13, 1913, Snider assigned the said judgment to the plaintiff, the original payee named in the note.

It is further alleged: That at the time of the making and delivery of said promissory note and chattel mortgage by said F. A. J. Shaffer, and as a part of the same transaction, and in order to assure and secure the payment of said promissory note according to its terms, and for a valuable consideration, defendant made, executed, and delivered to plaintiff an instrument in writing in words and figures following, to wit:

"Los Angeles, California, April 2nd, 1912.

"This is to certify that in case of the death of my husband, F. A. J. Shaffer, before he pays a certain promissory note of April 1, 1912, and payable July 1, 1912, to Mrs. Flo Anderson, that I will then pay the said note out of the life insurance on my husband namely F. A. J. Shaffer.

"[Signed] Emma C. Shaffer."

Shaffer died about September 10, 1921, defendant being his widow, and it is further alleged that he was insured, that defendant was his beneficiary and had collected on his life insurance policy in an amount exceeding the amount due on the note, but had refused payment upon plaintiff's demand therefor.

The demurrer alleged failure to state a cause of action and the bar of sections 336, 337, and 339, Code of Civil Procedure. We think the demurrer was properly sustained.

[1-4] The note was executed April 1, 1912, and became due July 1, 1912. The indebtedness evidenced thereby became merged in the judgment entered March 21, 1913. Haub v. Leggett, 160 Cal. 491, 117 P. 556; Zirker v. Hughes, 77 Cal. 235, 19 P. 423. It is not alleged that this judgment was ever renewed or revived under the provisions of section 685, Code of Civil Procedure. Any action upon it was barred after five years (section 336, Code Civ. Proc.), which would commence to run after the time for appeal had elapsed, and the judgment attained finality (Feeney v. Hinckley, 134 Cal. 467, 66 P. 580, 86 Am. St. Rep. 290; Estate of Woods, 137 Cal. 129, 69 P. 900; Brandon v. Anglo-California Trust Co., 177 Cal. 699, 171 P. 956; Willard v. Dobbins, 191 Cal. 287, 216 P. 1008; Westphal v. Arnoux, 51 Cal. App. 532, 197 P. 395). As the time within which an appeal might be taken was, under section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, as it stood in 1913 and prior to the amendment of 1915, six months after entry of judgment, the judgment of foreclosure became final on the 21st day of September, 1913, assuming, from the failure to allege the contrary, that no appeal was taken. The five-year period of limitation, therefore, expired on September 21, 1918. The complaint herein was filed on July 15, 1925, or nearly six years and ten months after the statute had run upon the judgment.

A married woman may enter into any engagement or transaction with another person respecting property which she might if unmarried (Civ. Code, § 158). The wife in this case, therefore, occupies the same position with respect to the transaction as if she were a stranger. The debt not being her own, and the property being her separate property (Civ. Code, § 162), she stands as surety of the husband for the payment of this debt. McDonald v. Randall, 139 Cal. 246, 253, 72 P. 997. Her obligation was that of a guarantor (sections 2787, 2844, Civ. Code), and as such she was entitled to avail herself of every defense which her principal might have asserted inherent to the debt and not of a purely personal nature (County of Sonoma v. Hall, 132 Cal. 589, 593, 62 P. 257, 312, 65 P. 12, 459; Baldwin v. Gordon (La.) 12 Mart. (O. S.) 378; Jarratt v. Martin, 70 N. C. 459; Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty, § 163), including the defense of the statute of limitations as to the principal debt. Her liability was commensurate with that of her principals (Grace v. Croninger, 56 Cal. App. 659, 206 P. 130; section 2808, Civ. Code), and could not exceed it (section 2809, Civ. Code).

It is true, as appellant urges, that this is an action upon the guarantee and not upon the original debt or upon the judgment in which it has become merged, but it is likewise true that, where the obligation of the principal has been extinguished, that of the guarantor (or surety as the case may be) is no longer enforceable. Some of the earlier decisions in this state expressed a view contrary to that just stated; thus, in Whiting v. Clark, 17 Cal. 407, decided in 1861, it was said: "This suit is brought on a guaranty by defendant of a debt of or for one Porter. The only thing set up in defense which it is necessary to notice is, the plea that no suit has been brought to charge the original debtor, and that the Statute of Limitations bars the claim as to him. But this is no defense. After legally charging the defendant, the plaintiff was not bound to sue the principal; at least, unless requested by the guarantor; and the surety had in his own hands the means of protecting himself from loss by delay, by paying the debt and then suing the principal, or by filing a bill to compel the creditor to sue. By the guaranty the defendant became the debtor of the creditor, and no other limitation could defeat the claim than that prescribed by law for the class of indebtedness evidenced by the paper." But this view was soon abandoned.

In Paige v. Carroll, 61 Cal. 211, the action was against a sheriff, and the sureties on his official bond, for the wrongful seizure of property. The cause of action as against the sheriff had become barred because not brought within two years after the seizure. The court said: "We cannot believe that the object was to allow a longer period for commencing an action against him and his sureties for such liability, than is allowed for commencing an action against him alone for it."

In County of Sonoma v. Hall, supra, the action was against a county recorder and his sureties to recover fees which it was alleged the recorder had collected and failed to turn into the county treasury. The cause of action as against the recorder accrued "on the day after the first Monday in January, 1893." The suit was commenced on March 20, 1896, and the defendants set up the bar of the statute of limitations in their answer. It was held that the cause of action against the recorder (Hall) was one upon a liability created by statute, and hence was barred after three years by section 338, subdivision 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Quoting from the opinion of Department 1 of the Supreme Court, confirmed by the court in bank, it was said:

"It follows, that, independent of the official bond, the cause of action was barred at the time it was commenced as to defendant Hall. If there had been no bond executed by Hall, and this action had been brought against him alone, there would be no doubt but that it was barred at the time it was commenced. Does the statute apply to the sureties on the written undertaking? Or in other words, can the sureties on the official bond plead the statute which has run against the cause of action?

"Sureties are never held beyond the strict terms of their contract, and, in general, they have the right to avail themselves of all the defenses that would be allowed by their principal. The object of requiring a bond from a public officer is, that the county or state may be secured from any injury caused by the neglect of duty or dishonest act of the official. Here the bond was security to the county, and given, among other things, for the purpose of indemnifying the county against the loss that it might suffer by the failure of Hall to pay the amount in controversy. The county had the right to look to the bond as security for the amount of all damages caused by the breach thereof, but it also owed a duty to the sureties. It should have brought the action for the breach before such action had become barred by the statute. The gist of the action is the failure of Hall to pay the moneys to the county. When he failed to do so, he committed a breach of the bond. The defendants, other than Hall, are made defendants for the purpose of securing a judgment against them, in order to collect the amount of damage caused by the breach. The bond is not the cause of action, but collateral thereto, and a means of which the county might avail itself. If the defendant Hall had, instead of giving the bond, given a mortgage upon real estate, properly conditioned, as indemnity for any breach of his official duty, the mortgage would have been an instrument in writing, but it could not be held to give a cause of action to the county after the time had run for commencing an action for the breach. Surely, the sureties cannot be in a worse position than the principal would have been if sued independent of the bond. If defendant Hall could escape liability by reason of the statute, the other defendants are certainly in no worse position. The bond did not impose upon Hall any duties other than or different from those created by the statute. It created no liability upon the sureties, so long as Hall performed his duties as required by the statute. The liability arose only when Hall neglected to make the payment. The bond was collateral security for the liability."

One reason for the rule that when the principal debt has become barred by the statute the guarantor cannot be held is thus succintly stated in Ebner v. West Hollywood Transfer Co., 45 Cal. App. 186, 187 P. 114: "That principle is that the guarantor has certain rights of subrogation against the principal and, therefore, if the creditor allows the obligation of the principal debtor to expire by limitation, he seriously injures the guarantor, who is thus deprived of his remedy against the principal, and for this reason the creditor may not, under such circumstances, enforce the guaranty."

In Stone v. Hammell, 83 Cal. 547, 23 P. 703, 8 L. R. A. 425, 17 Am. St. Rep. 272, the main facts were as follows: The plaintiff, Stone, and three others, Newell, Hamilton, and Hayman, were sureties on a note made by defendant Hammell to one Stevens for $3,000, dated July 1, 1877, and payable one year after date. Newell had paid over $2,000 on the note, and Stone paid to him (by notes) $1,000 as his pro rata contribution share. The action was by Stone to recover this $1,000 payment from Hammell, the principal on the note. In reversing a judgment in favor of Stone, the court said: "Now, in the case at bar, defendant was in no manner benefited by the notes given by plaintiff to Newell, nor was any debt or liability of defendant thereby extinguished; because at the time the notes were given there was no legal liability from the defendant to Newell, for the reason that any cause of action which the latter might have had against the defendant for moneys which he had paid to Byron Stevens had long been barred by the statute of limitations. The last payment made by Newell on the note to Stevens, as averred and found, was on January 10, 1881; and as his cause of action for the payments which he had made was not 'founded on a written instrument,' it was barred in two years—that is, on January 10, 1883. (Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 136). But plaintiff did not give his notes to Newell until March 1, 1884. At that time defendant was under no legal obligation to any one which plaintiff could discharge by giving said notes. The original note given to Stevens had itself been long since outlawed. Therefore by giving said notes plaintiff acquired no cause of action against the defendant herein."

The same rule has been followed in other jurisdictions. Thus, in State v. Conway, 18 Ohio, 234, where the action was against a sheriff and the sureties on his bond, the cause of action as against the sheriff had become barred by the statute of limitations before the suit was commenced. It was claimed that as to the sureties, however, the bond being an instrument in writing, a different period of limitation applied, within which the action had been brought. It was held that "the actual cause of action is not the execution of the bond—that is more in the nature of a collateral security; but the cause of action is the misfeasance, the false return. Without proof of the false return, there could be no recovery. The action is, in effect, although not so in form, an action against an officer for misfeasance in office. So far as actions of this character are concerned, the limitation acts upon the cause, not the form of action."

So here it may be pointed out that without proof of the original debt there could be no recovery. Again the learned chief justice, speaking for the court in the last-cited case, said: "If I am correct in these views, then it follows that had Alden [the sheriff] alone been sued upon this bond, and the breach assigned as it now is, he might have availed himself of the one year limitation provided in the statute. And surely his securities are in no worse situation than he himself would have been. If he could escape liability, they certainly can."

The doctrine announced in State v. Conway, supra, was reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of Ohio a few years later in State v. Blake, 2 Ohio St. 147. We quote from the opinion:

"This suit is brought upon the official bond of Beam as auditor of Knox county. The breaches alleged consist of a great number of misfeasances and nonfeasances in the discharge of his official duties, which it is charged have resulted in injury to the county. To some of these breaches the defendants pleaded the statute limiting actions against officers for these causes to one year. This plea being demurred to by the plaintiff, presents the single question whether it constitutes a sufficient bar to the action. It is not doubted, that this precise question was made and decided affirmatively in the case of the State for the Use of Mount Pleasant Bank v. Conway, 18 Ohio, 234; but the correctness of that holding is denied. We have again carefully examined the subject, aided by the able and thorough discussion of counsel, and a majority of this court are of opinion, that the law was correctly settled by our predecessors. In coming to this conclusion, we might with propriety stop; * * * I shall only notice such further considerations as the course of the present argument has made necessary; and in doing so, it is at once conceded, that the action is in debt, founded upon a specialty, and contains an agreement in writing that Beam should well and truly perform all the duties devolved upon him as auditor of Knox county; and that a failure to do so would be a breach of the bond, for which both principal and sureties would be liable to make reparation to any one injured thereby; and if the statute contained nothing further limiting such liability than the third clause of the first section of the 'act for the limitation of actions,' the liability would be governed by that clause, and would continue for fifteen years. At the same time, it cannot be denied that such a bond is only a collateral security for the faithful performance of the official duties of the officer (Walton v. The United States, 9 Wheat. 651 [6 L. Ed. 182]), and that the defendants are only liable as his sureties; and as such, entitled to all the rights arising from that relation, and growing out of the contract into which they have entered.

"From the first part of this proposition, it necessarily follows, that the collateral obligation can exist no longer than the liability it was created to secure; while upon the last, the universally acknowledged doctrine is, that 'it is of the essence of the contract of suretyship, that there be a subsisting valid obligation of a principal debtor. Without a principal there can be no accessory; and by the extinction of the liability of the former, the latter becomes extinct.' Russell v. Failor, 1 Ohio St. 329 [59 Am. Dec. 631]; Burge on Sur. 3; Theo. on Prin. and Sur. 2.

"Whatever, therefore, amounts to a good defense to the original liability of the principal, is a good defense for the sureties when sued upon the collateral undertaking. Couch v. Waring, 9 Conn. 261.

"Otherwise, the principal would be indirectly deprived of the benefit of a valid defense against the creditor, by being compelled, in effect, to respond through his sureties; or the sureties would be deprived of their right to reimbursement from the principal and thus one or the other be compelled to lose the rights which the law had secured to them.

"For every nonfeasance or misfeasance in office, the officer is liable to the party injured; and this is the liability which the principal has incurred, to which the official bond is accessory, and to which the sureties have undertaken to respond; the object and purpose of the law being, to secure to the party injured, the responsibility of others than the officer; the more certainly to afford him satisfaction for his injury. Does this liability continue against the officer beyond one year? If not against him, it certainly cannot against his sureties."

In Bernd v. Lynes, 71 Conn. 733, 43 A. 189, the defendant was administratrix of the estate of one Lacey. The action was on a written guaranty of the payment of a promissory note which had been indorsed on said note by the decedent in his lifetime. It read: "For value received, I hereby guaranty the payment of the within note until paid." The court said:

"The defendant insisted that the plaintiff's right to recover on the said guaranty was barred by the statute of limitations; and this is the only question in the case. It is admitted that the cause of action against the maker of the note is barred. Counsel for the plaintiff, in their brief, clearly and candidly state the question. They say: 'It may be conceded that, had the guaranty not contained the words "until paid," the statute of limitations would operate as a bar to the present action.' Stated in a little different words, the question is this: Does the cause of action against the guarantor continue after the statute of limitations has run against the principal debtor? The answer to this question depends upon the character of the contract of guaranty or suretyship; and the force of the words 'until paid' to enlarge that contract. What the character of that contract is was discussed by this court in the very recent case of Eising v. Andrews, 66 Conn. 65, 33 Atl. 585 [50 Am. St. Rep. 75]. What we said in that case is applicable in this: 'The rule is that a cause of action cannot exist against a surety, as such, unless a cause of action exists against the principal. Ordinarily, the liability of such a surety is measured precisely by the liability of the principal.' Brandt, Sur. Sec. 125; Seaver v. Young, 16 Vt. 658; Boone Co. v. Jones, 54 Iowa, 709, 2 N. W. 987, and 7 N. W. 155 [37 Am. Rep. 229]; Patterson's Appeal, 48 Pa. St. 345; McCabe v. Raney, 32 Ind. 309. The obligation of a surety is an obligation accessory to that of a principal debtor, and it is of the essence of this obligation that there should be a valid obligation of some principal. Thus, when one agrees to become responsible for another, the former incurs no obligation as surety if no valid claim ever arises against the principal. Chit. Cont. (11th Ed.) 788. If the principal is not holden, neither is the surety; for there can be no accessory if there is no principal. De Col, Guar. & Sur. (Am. Ed.) 39; Add. Cont. Sec. 1111. The existence of a principal debtor is a condition precedent to the operation of the contract of a surety. Hazard v. Irwin, 18 Pick. [Mass.] 95; Swift v. Beers, 3 Denio [N. Y.] 70; Mt. Stephen v. Lakeman, L. R. 7 Q. B. 202; Mallet v. Bateman, L. R. 1 C. P. 163. This is only in accordance with the general law of contracts which prevents a contract from becoming operative unless and until all conditions precedent are fulfilled. Brandt, Sur., sec. 214; [Farmers' & Mechanics'] Bank v. Kingsley, 2 Doug. (Mich.) 379. So, too, in general, whatever discharges the principal debtor discharges the surety. The liability of a surety, as such, on a claim which is good as against the principal, ceases as soon as the claim is extinguished against the principal. The nature of the undertaking of a surety is such that there can be no obligation on his part unless there is an obligation on the part of the principal. 'It is correctly laid down in Chitty on Contracts that the contract of a surety is a collateral engagement for another, as distinguished from an original and direct agreement for the party's own act; and, as is stated in Theobold on Principal and Surety; * * * it is a corollary from the very definition of a contract of suretyship that, the obligation of the surety being accessory to the obligation of the principal debtor or obligor, it is of its essence that there should be a valid obligation of such a principal, and that the nullity of the principal obligation necessarily induces the nullity of the accessory. Without a principal there can be no accessory. Nor can the obligation of the surety, as such, exceed that of the principal. * * * It would be most unjust and incongruous to hold the surety liable where the principal is not bound.' Storrs, J., in Ferry v. Burchard, 21 Conn. 603. The same general doctrine is held in many other cases in this state. Willey v. Paulk, 6 Conn. 74; De Forest v. Strong, 8 Conn. 522; Bull v. Allen, 19 Conn. 101; Glazier v. Douglass, 32 Conn. 393; Candee v. Skinner, 40 Conn. 464. The special claim in this case is that the words 'until paid' operated to enlarge the ordinary contract of suretyship, so as to take this case out of the general rule. We do not think the words as here used can be given that effect. This case is the ordinary one of suretyship, and, when the cause of action has become barred by virtue of the statute of limitations, the cause of action against the guarantor also became barred."

Other cases announcing and affirming the same principle are: Ryus v. Gruble, 31 Kan. 767, 3 P. 518; Commissioners v. Van Slyck, 52 Kan. 622, 35 P. 299; Davis v. Clark, 58 Kan. 454, 49 P. 665; Ware v. State, 74 Ind. 185; Spokane County v. Prescott, 19 Wash. 418, 53 P. 661, 67 Am. St. Rep. 733.

Had defendant in the case at bar actually paid the judgment after the expiration of the five-year period prescribed in section 336, Code of Civil Procedure, she could not have successfully maintained an action against the principal debtors for reimbursement, since such payment would have been a purely voluntary payment. Machado v. Fernandez, 74 Cal. 362, 16 P. 19. In Schlitz v. Thomas, 61 Cal. App. 635, 216 P. 51, the plaintiff had guaranteed payment of a note executed by a corporation. The note and guarantee were both executed on December 1, 1912. The note was due one day after date. July 1, 1918, plaintiff paid the amount of the note to the bank named therein as payee, and on June 23, 1919, began suit to recover the amount of such payment from the stockholders of the corporation which had executed the note. Appealing from a judgment in plaintiffs' favor, the defendants contended "that the liability of the corporation to pay the $4,000 note had been extinguished by the statute of limitations before the alleged payment thereof by plaintiffs and that therefore the payment was voluntary and gave plaintiffs no cause of action against the defendants. This contention must be sustained. To entitle a guarantor or surety to reimbursement, contribution, or subrogation on account of payments made in behalf of his principal it must appear that such payments were made under compulsion, that is, under a legal obligation, and not as a mere volunteer."

The liability of the principal having thus been extinguished by the passing of the statutory period, defendant as guarantor was under no obligation to pay the debt, and the complaint therefore failed to state a cause of action against her, and the demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff, the appellant herein, entered into an agreement with A. S. and C. B. Burrows, both of whom are defendants and respondents herein, whereby he was to endeavor to sell the latter's bank stock and was to receive $10 for each share sold. Plaintiff made certain efforts to secure a purchaser, and in a more or less indirect way these efforts interested parties who actually purchased the stock, whereupon he claimed the commission, which defendants refused to pay, claiming that they had no knowledge that the purchaser came to them through the efforts of plaintiff, and that they sold the stock without making provision for the payment of any commission. This action for the commission resulted, and, at the conclusion of plaintiff's case, he offered to dismiss the action against certain defendants, whereupon the court stated: "I do not believe there is any case made against any one." Counsel for defendants then replied, "I intended to make a motion for a nonsuit as soon as the plaintiff got through," to which the court responded, "The motion will be granted." Judgment of nonsuit was thereafter entered, and plaintiff appeals on the ground that the motion should have been denied on the evidence.

Respondents contend that the judgment should stand, urging that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a finding that appellant actually produced a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy the stock and who in fact did purchase it. We shall not examine the evidence upon this point, as we think the action of the court in ordering a judgment of nonsuit must be sustained independent thereof.

While appellant was on the witness stand, the following questions were asked and answers given: "Q. Did you hold a broker's license from the corporation commissioner of the state of California? A. I have never held but one license in the state of California, and that is a real estate broker's; I had a salesman's license first." Respondents claim that this testimony was a sufficient basis for the court's ruling on the motion for nonsuit, claiming, of course, that the contract for commission was void because the broker was not licensed under the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673). In answer to this, appellant makes two statements as to the law, contending that either one is a sufficient reason why the testimony should have been entirely disregarded by the court. These statements are that "respondents cannot now for the first time raise the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act as a bar to recovery without having pleaded it and raised it as an affirmative defense," and that "appellant is not within the jurisdiction of the Corporate Securities Act." We shall examine these points in the inverse order of their statement.

[1] Subdivision 9 of section 2 of the Corporate Securities Act as amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, c. 50, p. 89) reads as follows: "The word 'broker,' as used in this act, includes every person or company, other than an agent, * * * offering for sale, negotiating for the sale of, or otherwise dealing in any 'security' or 'securities' issued by others, * * * or of offering them for sale to the public." Section 5 of the same act as amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 90) reads as follows: "No person or company shall act as an agent or broker until such person or company shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a certificate, then in effect, authorizing such person or company so to do. * * *"

That appellant was acting in the capacity of broker is certain. He went to A. S. Burrows of his own volition and talked with him about selling the stock. He testified: "And I asked him why didn't he sell his bank? Well, he turned to me and says, 'Why don't you sell it?' I told him I had lost touch with banks; had not dealt in any bank stock for a number of years, but I would keep it in mind." On a later occasion these same gentlemen met, and appellant asked Mr. Burrows if he still desired to dispose of the control of the stock, and the reply was in the affirmative. Mr. Burrows then furnished appellant with a statement of the bank's condition.

"Q. [Propounded to appellant]: Then it was understood that if you did negotiate a purchase of the bank you were to receive ten dollars per share for it? A. Ten dollars per share on all stock that was actually transferred. * * *

"Q. Then he made the condition for the sale of the stock that all stockholders should have the same privilege of selling? A. Yes, it should be optional with them whether they should dispose of their stock or keep it, all or any part of it."

[2] Appellant argues that, since this was to be one transaction in which the control of the bank was to be sold, the transaction does not come under the statute for the regulation of stock sales. We are unable to follow him therein. He also contends that the case of Shaffer v. Beinhorn, 190 Cal. 569, 213 P. 960, is controlling. Again we are unable to agree with him. That case was one where an owner of real estate promised to reward a person not a licensed realtor if he would send some one to him with whom he could negotiate a sale of his property. The person did send a prospect to the owner, and, after negotiating with him, the latter sold him the property. It was held that the reward had been earned and could be collected, since the person was not acting as an agent to negotiate sales of real property. The analogy would have been a reasonable one had the contract herein been to send Burrows some one with whom he could negotiate; but the agreement, as we have seen, went far beyond that, and was no more nor less than a contract to pay commission for the sale of stock.

[3-5] Appellant also contends that bank stock is issued against the assets of the bank, and is exempt from the operation of the statute because it is provided therein that it applies to companies "excepting * * * all corporations organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of conducting the business of banking * * * when such corporations are issuing securities of their own issue against their own assets." It seems too obvious for argument that this means bank notes or other certificates of credit and not the corporate stock of the bank. It appears to us that the contract or agreement which we have here under consideration falls squarely within the terms of the Corporate Securities Act. This being true, does it follow that the agreement for the payment of a commission is void? We think it does so follow.

Laws requiring licenses are generally divided into two classes. Laws enacted for the raising of revenue fall under one class, and contracts made or performed without the license are, generally speaking, valid. Laws for the protection of the public fall under the other class, and contracts in violation of the latter class are invalid if the license had not been procured when performance was had. The Real Estate License Law and the Corporate Securities Law come under the latter classification. Wood v. Krepps, 168 Cal. 382, 143 P. 691, L. R. A. 1915B, 851; Levinson v. Boas, 150 Cal. 185, 88 P. 825, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 575, 11 Ann. Cas. 661; Beebe v. Kistler, 52 Cal. App. 494, 199 P. 537; Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 267, 200 P. 55; Radich v. Cernokus, 65 Cal. App. 452, 224 P. 124. We conclude that appellant is within the jurisdiction of the act.

[6] We shall next consider appellant's second statment, only we shall phrase it differently: In the consideration of this appeal, have we the right to consider the fact that appellant had no broker's license? It is true the amended complaint does not contain an allegation that plaintiff had a broker's license while attempting to sell the bank stock. We note too that the defendants demurred to the two counts of the amended complaint on the ground that in neither were facts alleged which were sufficient to state a cause of action, and that this demurrer was overruled. Upon the opening of the case, defendants objected to the taking of any evidence for the reason stated in the demurrer, and the court reserved ruling. Since no ruling was ever made, and the evidence received under the reservation remained in the case, it will be taken that the court intended the objection to be considered as overruled.

There are cases holding that there can be no presumption that a person has committed a crime or misdemeanor, and for that reason, where the complaint fails to allege compliance with a statute providing a penalty, as the one we here have under consideration, there is no presumption that a license had not been obtained. Harris v. Bucher, 25 Cal. App. 380, 143 P. 796, and cases therein cited. The answer also is silent upon the question of license, and since the rules of pleading in this state require that affirmative defenses shall be set up in the answer (Greiss v. State Investment, etc., Co., 98 Cal. 241, 33 P. 195), we must conclude that the pleadings alone do not present any issue upon the subject of a broker's license. Notwithstanding this situation as to the pleadings, appellant was asked directly by counsel for respondents whether or not he had such a license, and without objection thereto he responded in the negative. Here we find the moving party in a lawsuit raising no objection to the opposite party eliciting the information that the very basis of his action was in direct contravention of a penal statute which was enacted for the protection of the people of the state. It seems to us that the power of the trial judge would be weak indeed if he could not immediately say that no recovery could be had under such circumstances and that therefore it would be purposeless to proceed with the case, notwithstanding the fact that this specific ground was not mentioned in the motion for nonsuit.

The point is well covered in Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 257, where, at page 260, 104 P. 6, 8, the following is found: "Great stress is laid by the appellants upon the point that the court erred in refusing to submit to the jury the issue of undue influence. The ruling was, in effect, equivalent to an order granting a nonsuit as to one of the causes of action. The cases in which a judgment of nonsuit may be entered are set forth in section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the court has authority to grant such judgment only in the cases specified by law. (Hanna v. De Garmo, 140 Cal. 172, 73 P. 830.) There is no provision in our statutes authorizing the court (except under circumstances not appearing here) to grant a nonsuit without any motion to that end by the defendant. It would seem, therefore, that the court below should not, in the absence of any request by the proponent, have taken the issue of undue influence from the jury. But, under the facts disclosed by the bill of exceptions, this error or irregularity was not such as to justify a reversal. The evidence on the issue of undue influence was so conclusive in favor of the proponent that the court would have been bound to set aside a verdict in favor of appellants. When this condition appears the court is 'justified in refusing to submit the case to a jury.' (Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 82 P. 57.) A plaintiff is ordinarily entitled to a motion specifying the grounds upon which a nonsuit is asked in order that he may, by amendment or further proof, have an opportunity to supply any defect suggested. Where such defect is one which might have been cured, if called to the attention of the plaintiff, it would obviously be unjust to permit a defendant to urge it for the first time in the appellate court. (People [ex rel. Dickenson] v. Banvard, 27 Cal. 474; Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 261, 22 P. 195; Palmer & Rey v. Marysville, etc., Co., 90 Cal. 168, 27 P. 21; Durfee v. Seale, 139 Cal. 603, 73 P. 435.) But this consideration has no application to a case where the evidence has been fully presented, and the plaintiff has totally failed to make out a case which would support findings in his favor. Where there is no reason to believe that any additional evidence in support of the complaint could be produced, it is difficult to see what substantial benefit would be derived from a formal motion for nonsuit, based on the insufficiency of the evidence. Such is the situation here. The defect in contestants' case is incurable, and the court will not order a reversal for the mere purpose of having submitted to the jury an issue which could not be decided in favor of contestants. 'Granting,' as was said in Estate of Morey [supra], 'that the course pursued in this case was irregular, it does not follow that it is fatal to the judgment, even on appeal.'"

It cannot successfully be here contended that the license matter was not an issue in the case, for the parties by their actions consented to make it an issue, notwithstanding it was not covered by the pleadings. Illinois T. & Savings Bank v. Pac. Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 285, 297, 47 P. 60. The principle is clearly stated in Ortega v. Cordero, 88 Cal. 221, at page 226, 26 P. 80, 81, where the court, in distinguishing cases, says: "The class of cases cited by counsel for respondent, such as White v. San Rafael, etc., R. R. Co., 50 Cal. 417; Tevis v. Hicks, 41 Cal. 123; Smith v. Penny, 44 Cal. 161, and Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642 [10 P. 186], has no proper application to the facts of this case. In that class of cases it appears of record that the parties have actually tried issues outside of the pleadings without objection, and by tacit consent, as if the issues had been made by the pleadings, and under such circumstances that if one party had objected the other might have supplied or cured the defect by amendment of his pleading, or otherwise mitigated the effect of the objection. The principle upon which these decisions rest is that of equitable estoppel; it being held that a party who acquiesces and participates in the trial of an issue without objection, as if it arose from the pleadings, when he might have objected on the ground that the issue was not made by the pleadings in the trial court, where the objection might have been met by amendment of the pleadings or otherwise, so that it would have operated less injuriously on the other party than if first made on appeal, has thereby waived the objection and misled the other party to understand that the issue was properly made, and therefore should not be heard to make it on appeal." In the instant case, it is clear that an objection to the question regarding the broker's license would have put the defendant upon notice that his answer contained no allegation that the plaintiff had no license, and he could have amended to meet the situation.

[7] We conclude that the contract for the sale of the bank stock was within the terms of the Corporate Securities Act, which act is not primarily an act for the raising of revenue, but is one primarily for the protection of the public; that, during the time appellant was trying to sell the stock and at the time the stock was actually sold, he had no license as required by the act; that the possession of a license became an issue in the case when, without objection, inquiry was made and answer given concerning the possession of a license; that, notwithstanding the technical irregularity of the court's action in granting a nonsuit without a specification of the grounds of the motion, this court will not overrule such action and send the case back to the trial court, when it is certain that no case could ever be made out for the plaintiff in the case. As appellant's case against all other defendants must fall if the contract with Messrs. Burrows falls, it follows that the action of the court in granting a nonsuit against all defendants should be sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

EDSON et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR SISKIYOU COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3797.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 18, 1929.

1. Officers 🔑74—Accusation not showing person sought to be removed from office was acting officer at filing of accusation is insufficient (Pen. Code, §§ 758, 769).

Under Pen. Code, § 758, providing for accusation against public officers for misconduct in office, and section 769, imposing penalty by removal from office, accusation which does not show on its face that person proceeded against is duly elected, qualified, and acting officer, in office from which it is sought to remove him, at date of filing of accusation, does not state cause of action.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑174—Accusation against city trustees for misconduct in office, not charging that trustees are and were such at filing of accusation, held insufficient (Pen. Code, §§ 758, 769).

Accusation against members of board of city trustees, charging them with willful and corrupt misconduct, and alleging that trustees named were and are designated as trustees duly elected and qualified at all times mentioned therein, but not charging that trustees are, and were at time of presenting and filing accusation, members of board of trustees, held insufficient to charge offense, under Pen. Code, §§ 758, 769.

3. Prohibition 🔑10(2)—Prohibition is proper remedy, where trial court overrules demurrer to accusation for removal of officer not stating cause of action.

Prohibition is proper remedy, where trial court overrules demurrer to an accusation which does not state facts sufficient to constitute cause of action.

4. Officers 🔑74—No appeal lies from trial court judgment in proceedings against public officers for willful misconduct in office (Pen. Code, §§ 758, 772).

In proceedings under Pen. Code, § 758, or section 772, against public officers for willful or corrupt misconduct in office, judgment of trial court is final, and no appeal lies therefrom.

5. Prohibition 🔑3(1)—Applicants for prohibition to restrain further proceedings on accusation charging them with willful misconduct in office did not have adequate legal remedy, and could bring prohibition (Pen. Code, § 758).

In application for writ of prohibition to restrain court from proceeding with proceedings based on accusation under Pen. Code, § 758, charging applicants with willful misconduct in office, applicants did not have plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, and prohibition was proper.

6. Officers 🔑74—Accusation to remove public officers for misconduct in office should charge directly, not by way of recital, and allege acts claimed to be basis for misconduct (Pen. Code, §§ 758, 769).

Where accusation is brought under Pen. Code, §§ 758, 769, to remove public officers from office for willful misconduct, charge against officers should be direct, and not by way of recital, and should show what orders, if any, were adopted by officers, and should charge acts claimed to be basis for misconduct.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑174—Accusation charging public officers with collecting money by order of board of trustees and individuals thereof held demurrable for failure to state who individuals were (Pen. Code, §§ 758, 769).

Accusation, under Pen. Code, §§ 758, 769, to remove public officers from office for willful misconduct, alleging that sums of money were collected and paid by order of city board of trustees and individuals thereof, was demurrable on ground of uncertainty as to who individuals were.

8. Officers 🔑74—Accusation to remove public officer for misconduct need not be drawn with particularity of indictment, but must allege all facts necessary to state case (Pen. Code, §§ 758, 772).

Accusation, under Pen. Code, §§ 758, 772, to remove public officers for willful misconduct in office, need not be drawn with all particularity required in drafting indictments and informations, but all essential facts necessary to constitute cause of action must be set forth.

Prohibition by A. G. Edson and others against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Siskiyou and another. Writ granted.

Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, and Annette Abbott Adams, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Charles E. Johnson, of Yreka, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us upon the application of the above-named petitioners, praying for a writ of this court restraining and prohibiting the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Siskiyou, and H. S. Gans, as the judge presiding in said court, in the matter of this cause, from proceeding further in any proceedings based upon a certain accusation filed in said court on the 8th day of December, 1928. Upon the filing of the petition herein an alternative writ was issued, directing the respondents to show cause, if any, why the writ of prohibition prayed for should not be granted.

The record before us shows that on the 8th day of December, 1928, the grand jury of the county of Siskiyou presented and filed in said court an accusation against the above-named petitioners charging them with misconduct in office and asking for their removal. The accusation, so far as pertinent here, is in the words and figures following:

"A. G. Edson, Frank Piluso, Charles Hoffman, and Ephriam Ackley, as councilmen and members of the board of city trustees of the town of Mt. Shasta City, Siskiyou county, California, duly elected, acting and qualified as such city trustees, and acting as such at all times herein mentioned, are hereby accused by the grand jury of the county of Siskiyou, state of California, by this accusation, of willful and corrupt misconduct in the discharge of their duties as said councilmen of the city board of trustees of the town of Mt. Shasta City, in and for the said county of Siskiyou, state of California, said willful and corrupt misconduct as such board of city trustees consisting of the following acts, specified as follows, to wit: That A. G. Edson, Frank Piluso, Charles Hoffman, and Ephriam Ackley, qualified and acting as members of the city board of trustees of the city of Mt. Shasta, at Mt. Shasta City, in said Siskiyou county, California, on or about the 1st day of June, 1928, and 1st day of July, 1928, unlawfully, willfully, corruptly, and under color of official right, did order collected and did collect and have collected and obtained of and from certain persons operating slot machines and houses of prostitution within the city limits of Mt. Shasta City certain fines, fees and licenses, to wit: The sum of five dollars ($5.00) per month for the operation of illegal slot machines, and the sum of twenty-five ($25.00) dollars per month for each house of prostitution, said sums being collected and paid by order of said city board of trustees, above mentioned, and individuals thereof, to the police judge of the city of Mt. Shasta City, which said sums were paid on or about the 1st day of June and the 1st day of July, 1928, and the said members of the said city board of trustees, above mentioned, knowing the same to be illegal and without authority of law."

To this accusation the respondents appeared and demurred, assigning a number of reasons why said accusation was and is insufficient, only two of which we need to consider: First, that said accusation does not state facts sufficient to constitute an accusation for willful and corrupt, or any, misconduct in office, against the defendants, or any of them, or misconduct in the discharge of their duties as members of or as the board of trustees of the town of Mt. Shasta; second, that said accusation does not allege, and it does not appear therefrom, that the defendants, or any of them, now are, or were at the time the said accusation was presented, city trustees of said town of Mt. Shasta. By the charging part of the accusation, which we have set forth, it appears that the petitioners were and are designated as the board of trustees of the town of Mt. Shasta, duly elected, qualified, and acting as such at all the times herein mentioned, and that the times mentioned were and are the 1st day of June, 1928, and the 1st day of July, 1928. There is nothing in the accusation charging that the petitioners are, and were at the time of presenting and filing the accusation, members of the board of trustees of the town of Mt. Shasta, or that any of the petitioners were such members.

[1, 2] This proceeding is based upon section 758 of the Penal Code, which reads: "An accusation in writing against any district, county, township, or municipal officer, for willful or corrupt misconduct in office, may be presented by the grand jury of the county for or in which the officer accused is elected or appointed." Section 769 of the Penal Code provides that "upon a conviction, the court must, at such time as it may appoint, pronounce judgment that the defendant be removed from office," etc. The only penalty provided for is that of removal from office, which, of course, necessitates the fact of the person against whom the accusation is presented, being in office at that date. If the accusation presented does not upon its face show that the person proceeded against is the duly qualified and acting officer at the date it is sought to remove him from office, it is fatally defective in not laying a foundation upon which a judgment of removal can be based. That an accusation which does not show that the person proceeded against is the duly elected, qualified, and acting officer of the office from which it is sought to remove him, at the date of the filing of the accusation, does not state a cause of action, is sustained by the following authorities: In re Stow, 98 Cal. 587, 33 P. 490; Smith v. Ling, 68 Cal. 324, 9 P. 171; Thurston v. Clark, 107 Cal. 285, 40 P. 435; Woods v. Varnum, 85 Cal. 639, 24 P. 843.

The very case upon which the respondents rely is an authority against the sufficiency of the accusation in this cause. We quote from the case of Woods v. Varnum: "As to the point that there is no statement of the time when appellant became tax collector, or when his present term commenced, the averment is that the appellant 'is, and at all times herein mentioned was, the duly elected, qualified, and acting tax collector of said San Diego county.' This was a sufficient averment on that point. Of course, the proceeding lies only against one in office, and not against one whose term has expired; but the accusation sufficiently shows appellant to be in office." Had the accusation in this case read that the persons named "are, and at all times hereinafter mentioned were, the duly elected, qualified and acting trustees," etc., it would have conformed to the case of Woods v. Varnum, supra, and laid the basis for a judgment of removal in the event of the accusation being sustained. The cases which we have cited are conclusive upon these points.

[3] It appears to be well settled that prohibition is a proper remedy, where a trial court overrules a demurrer to an accusation which does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In Rose v. Superior Court, 80 Cal. App. 739, 252 P. 765, it is said in substance that prohibition is a proper remedy, where the accusation does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for removal, or confer upon the superior court jurisdiction to proceed, and is established by a long line of decisions. That prohibition will lie under such circumstances is also supported by the cases of Siebe v. Superior Court, 114 Cal. 551, 46 P. 456; Coffey v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 525, 82 P. 75; Hunt v. Superior Court, 178 Cal. 470, 173 P. 1097. Some of these cases proceed to consider petitions for writs of prohibition, without discussing other decisions holding prohibition to be a proper remedy.

[4, 5] In answer to the foregoing, the respondents insist that "a writ of prohibition lies only when and because the court or tribunal to which the writ is addressed is acting, or is about to act, in excess of its jurisdiction, and there is no plain, speedy and adequate remedy in the course of law," and then add: "It is well established that a judgment is not void if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, irrespective of whether the complaint states a cause of action or not, so long as it apprises the defendant of the nature of plaintiff's demand" (citing in support of this statement the case of Reid v. Superior Court, 44 Cal. App. 349, 186 P. 634). The opinion in the Reid Case, supra, quotes from Brush v. Smith, 141 Cal. 466, 75 P. 55, where it is said: "If the court below should hold the complaint sufficient, when as a matter of law it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, such ruling would be erroneous, but nevertheless the court had jurisdiction. It had jurisdiction to determine the question and to determine it wrong as well as right." The same language is quoted from the opinion in the case of Christerson v. French, 180 Cal. 523, 182 P. 27. The case of Brush v. Smith, supra, was a collateral attack upon the judgment in a civil case. The case of Christerson was an appeal from an order setting aside a judgment entered by default. These cases, while correctly stating the law based upon the facts presented, are not pertinent here, where the petitioners have no plain, speedy and adequate remedy. We do not need to cite the authorities, for it is now the unquestioned law that no appeal lies where the proceedings are based upon either section 758 or 772 of the Penal Code. The judgment of the trial court is final, where the proceedings are based upon either section.

[6-8] As the writ must issue, it does not seem necessary to comment upon other portions of the accusation, except to state that if new proceedings are instituted, the charge against the petitioners should be direct and not by way of recital; that it should show what orders, if any, were adopted by the board of trustees; that if the board of trustees, or the members thereof, as argued by respondents, "went to the violators and demanded fees for the purpose of allowing them to carry on their business in violation of law," such acts should be charged. Likewise that, if the petitioners conspired with the violators of the law to permit them to carry on an illegal business by paying monthly fees, such acts should be charged. We may likewise call attention to the following language set forth as a charge, but which is really recital: "Said sums being collected and paid by order of the said city board of trustees above mentioned, and individuals thereof." The latter portion of this quotation is demurrable on the grounds of uncertainty as to who the individuals were. We do not need to discuss the authorities to the effect that accusations based upon either section 758 or section 772 of the Penal Code need not be drawn with all the particularity and nicety required in the drafting of indictments or informations. All the essential facts, however, to constitute a cause of action must be set forth.

The accusation being fatally defective, for the reasons herein stated, the demurrer of the respondents should have been sustained, and, as prohibition is the proper remedy, it follows that the writ prayed for herein, prohibiting the respondents from further proceeding on the accusation referred to, should be granted, and it is ordered that a peremptory writ to that effect be issued herein.

MARTIN et al. v. BANK OF SAN JOSE.
(Civ. 6751.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 20, 1929.

1. Mortgages 🔑369(7)—Complaint to set aside foreclosure sale and trustee's deed thereunder held insufficient as against demurrer for failure to allege plaintiffs had title.

In action to set aside foreclosure sale under deed of trust and deed given thereunder, for restoration of possession, and for accounting, complaint alleging that defendant agreed that it would foreclose trust deed securing unpaid debt, and after foreclosure defendants and plaintiffs would enter into agreement through which plaintiffs would pay off indebtedness, by an application of income from property and by giving new trust deed for balance, held insufficient, as against demurrer, for failing to allege that title to realty was in plaintiffs at time of alleged agreement.

2. Specific performance 🔑28(2)—Agreement alleged in complaint alleging breach of agreement to permit redemption from foreclosure of trust deed held too indefinite to authorize specific performance (Civ. Code, § 3390).

In action to set aside foreclosure sale under deed of trust and deed given thereunder, for restoration of possession, and for accounting, complaint alleging that defendant agreed it would foreclose trust deed, and after foreclosure defendants and plaintiffs would then enter into agreement through which plaintiffs would pay off indebtedness, first by application of income from property, and that when payments should reduce indebtedness sufficiently a new deed of trust should be given, providing for payment of debt in installments, amount or frequency of which was not stated, held too uncertain, vague, and indefinite to state a cause of action for specific performance, under Civ. Code, § 3390.

3. Pleading 🔑18—Complaint alleging breach of agreement to permit redemption from foreclosure of trust deed held demurrable for uncertainty (Code Civ. Proc. § 430).

In action to set aside foreclosure sale under deed of trust and deed given thereunder, for restoration of possession, and for accounting, complaint alleging that defendant agreed it would foreclose trust deed and after foreclosure defendants and plaintiffs would enter into agreement through which plaintiffs would pay off indebtedness, first by application of income from property, and that, when payments should reduce indebtedness sufficiently, a new deed of trust should be given for balance, held demurrable under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, as being uncertain and unintelligible.

4. Specific performance 🔑116¾—Ruling sustaining demurrer to complaint to enforce agreement to permit redemption from foreclosure sale held not objectionable, as based on technical grounds.

Ruling sustaining demurrer to complaint, seeking to enforce alleged agreement by defendant to permit plaintiffs to redeem property from mortgage foreclosure sale, held not objectionable as based on purely technical grounds.

Action by Helen H. Martin and another against the Bank of San Jose. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Stanley Moffatt and L. N. Barber, both of Fresno, for appellants.

L. L. Cory and W. H. Stammer, both of Fresno, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment for defendant, entered after an order sustaining demurrer to third complaint; the plaintiffs having declined to further amend. The complaint will be referred to simply as the complaint without further reference to the fact that it is a twice amended pleading. The complaint, after preliminary allegations, states as follows:

That on March 15, 1920, plaintiff Helen Martin was the wife of N. H. Yeramian, and that plaintiff John Yeramian is the issue of their marriage. That on said date N. H. Yeramian and Krikor H. Tayian were the owners of certain described parcels of land in Fresno county, California. That on said date, March 15, 1920, the said N. H. Yeramian and his wife and the said Krikor H. Tayian made, executed, and delivered to defendant a certain promissory note in favor of said defendant in the sum of $18,000 payable on March 15, 1923, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and at the same time, and as security for the payment of the said note, according to the tenor thereof, made and executed a certain deed of trust conveying the real property before described to San Jose Abstract Company, a corporation, as trustee, and authorizing the said trustee, upon default in the payment of said note, or of any payment of interest therein specified, to sell the property at public auction for the payment of all sums due on account of said note and paid out and expended under and by virtue of the terms of said deed of trust, and the expenses of said sale. Alleges the death of N. H. Yeramian on September 8, 1920, and thereafter the appointment of plaintiff Helen Martin as administratrix, which appointment is still in effect. Alleges the decree of distribution in the estate of N. H. Yeramian, wherein and whereby all the right, title, and interest of said decedent in and to the property described was distributed to the plaintiffs as tenants in common in equal shares.

That on February 19, 1924, Krikor H. Tayian and his wife executed a deed conveying all their right, title, and interest in and to the said real property to the plaintiff Helen Martin. That at all times hereafter, until ousted by defendant as hereinafter stated, plaintiffs held possession of all of said premises. That at all of the times mentioned one Tackaberry was an attorney at law, duly licensed and admitted to practice in the state, and from September 6, 1920, up to May 8, 1926, was employed as such to represent Helen Martin in the administration of the estate of her deceased husband, and in the matter of the guardianship of the estate and person of the minor plaintiff, and that at all of the times mentioned the defendant knew that Tackaberry was the attorney for plaintiff. That on or about August 2, 1924, an agreement was made and entered into, by and between defendant and plaintiff Helen Martin and her attorney, Tackaberry, whereby it was understood and agreed that the said deed of trust should be foreclosed, that the defendant should buy in the said real property at the foreclosure sale for the amount that should be due and owing to defendant on account of the said promissory note at the time of such sale, including interest and taxes advanced and expenses of sale; and it was further agreed and understood that plaintiff Helen Martin should be permitted to redeem said property from said sale by repaying to the defendant the amount so bid, in such annual installments as said Helen Martin might be able to pay out of the revenue from the property, until the said indebtedness should be reduced to the point where a new loan could be obtained on the security of the property sufficient to pay said indebtedness, and the whole of the same should then be paid, and that for the purpose of securing the performance of this agreement the parties should, within a reasonable time after said sale, execute such instrument or instruments as the said parties might then agree upon, and that such instrument or instruments should take the form of a deed conveying the said property to the said plaintiff, together with a promissory note and trust deed executed by plaintiff, providing for the payment of the amount due to defendant, in installments according to the terms of said agreement, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, or of a contract in writing for the sale of the said property by the defendant, and the purchase of the same by Helen Martin, for a price equal to the total sum due defendant, in such installments and at the same rate of interest, and that the plaintiffs should at all times be entitled to the possession of the said property. That at the instance and request of said defendant the said attorney advised Helen Martin to enter into and perform the said agreement on her part and the said defendant employed the said attorney to conduct the foreclosure in its behalf and to represent and advise the defendant in all matters relating to the same. That defendant and said attorney thereupon foreclosed said deed of trust.

That Helen Martin, at the time of said foreclosure, was able to pay the promissory note and all sums due on account of the said deed of trust, but relied upon the agreement of said defendant and the advice of her attorney, and by reason of said reliance was induced to and did fail to pay such debt, and permitted said property to be sold to defendant at said foreclosure sale. That on January 7, 1925, the trustee, at the demand of defendant, and upon the advice of said attorney, sold said property, and defendant purchased the same for the price of $22,147.92, which said sum was the amount claimed by defendant to be due and unpaid at said time on account of said promissory note, and on January 21, 1925, the trustee executed an instrument purporting to be a deed conveying said real property to defendant, which instrument has been duly recorded in the records of Fresno county. That at the time of said sale, and at all times thereafter, the reasonable value of said property was $40,000. That at the time of said sale a purchaser had been secured who was ready and able to purchase said property for the sum of $50,000. That Helen Martin is, and at all times herein mentioned has been, ready and willing to execute a new note and trust deed, or a contract in writing, according to the terms of said agreement, but defendant has at all times failed and refused, and still fails and refuses, the said property to the said plaintiff or to execute such contract, and on March 12, 1926, repudiated said agreement and notified plaintiff that it would not perform the same, and on or about April 16, 1926, the said defendant, contrary to its said agreement and wrongfully, took possession of said premises and ejected plaintiffs therefrom. That at all times since April 16, 1926, defendant has been and still is in possession of said real property, and wrongfully detains and withholds the same from plaintiffs, and has harvested and sold the crops produced therein during the seasons of 1925–1926 and has received therefor a large sum of money, the exact amount of which is unknown to plaintiffs. That defendant has at all times refused, and still refuses, to account to plaintiffs for the rents, issues, and profits of said property and the proceeds thereof, and claims to be the owner of said property, and entitled to the exclusive possession of the same, and to the rents, issues, and profits thereof, adverse to the plaintiffs and each of them, by virtue of the sale.

The complaint prays: That the foreclosure sale and the deed executed by the trustee be declared null and void, and vacated and set aside. That plaintiffs be restored to the possession of the said property. That an accounting be had of the moneys received by defendant from said property. For such other or further relief as may be just in the premises. To this complaint defendant entered both a general and a special demurrer.

[1] We will take up the points raised by defendant in support of the demurrer, without detailing the various grounds set forth. Respondent contends that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, because there is no allegation showing that either of the plaintiffs had any interest in or right to the possession of the real property involved in this action at the time the alleged agreement was entered into, or at the time the sale was made under the trust deed. This ground was and is urged by defendant in support of its general demurrer, and it was claimed by defendant by way of special demurrer as follows: That said complaint is uncertain in this: That it does not appear therein, nor can it be ascertained therefrom, that plaintiffs, or either of them, since February 19, 1924, have been the owners of any interest whatsoever in or to said real property, or whether the plaintiffs, or either of them, are now the owners of any interest whatsoever in or to said real property, or that the plaintiffs, or either of them, were ever entitled to possession at any time after February 19, 1924, or whether said plaintiffs, or either of them, are now entitled to possession of said property or any part thereof. A reading of the complaint will disclose the omission pointed out. It is alleged that N. H. Yeramian and Krikor H. Tayian were the owners of the property on March 15, 1920. There is no allegation that they or either of them owned the property or had any interest therein at any time subsequent thereto, or that they or either of them claimed any interest therein subsequent to said date. Particularly there is no allegation that the estate of N. H. Yeramian had any interest in or title to this property at the time of his death, or that any title passed through the decree of distribution, other than whatever interest the decedent might have had at the time of his death. Likewise there is no allegation that on February 19, 1924, when Krikor H. Tayian conveyed his interest in the real property to plaintiff that the said Tayian had any interest in or title to the property. And further, disregarding the lack of these allegations, there is no allegation that plaintiffs, or either of them, had any title to or interest in the real estate at the time of the alleged agreement between plaintiffs and the defendant, which agreement is the basis of the action.

It must be conceded, without argument or citation of authority, that if the plaintiffs were strangers to the title there would be no consideration to support the alleged agreement as pleaded. In Vance v. Anderson, 113 Cal. 535, 45 P. 816, plaintiff brought suit in ejectment. She alleged possession of the premises in question on May 1, 1894, and the date she brought suit was May 19, 1894. The court says: "It will be observed that while the complaint avers seisin and possession in the plaintiff on the 1st day of May, 1894, it fails to state that she was so seised at the date of the suit brought, which was May 19, 1894, or at any time after May 1st. This was, we think, a failure of an essential allegation in the complaint." Curtin v. Kowalsky, 145 Cal. 433, 78 P. 962, was an action to recover a sum due upon a money judgment. The complaint alleged an assignment to the judgment, and the court held that it was unnecessary to further allege membership at the time of commencement of the action, saying: "Such ownership and holding was the legal result of the assignment, and, that fact having been alleged, it follows as a matter of law that plaintiff thereby became the owner and holder thereof. This condition of ownership is presumed to continue, and it was not necessary to allege that plaintiff was the owner at the time the action was begun. Such an allegation, or its equivalent, is required in actions to recover the possession of specific property, but not in actions to recover on money demands."

By a greater force of reason it would be held that such an allegation would be necessary where the relief demanded was conditional upon the very fact of ownership at the time the agreement, the breach of which was the cause of action, was entered into between the parties. In Melvin v. Melvin, 8 Cal. App. 687, 97 P. 698, the court says: "It is, of course, elementary and fundamental that the complaint must state facts sufficient to constitute a present cause of action, and to show that plaintiff was entitled to relief as of the time the complaint is filed. In other words, allegations showing only that the cause of action existed some time in the past would be insufficient. * * * We look in vain for any averment in the complaint before us of a present interest in the property in controversy. There is nothing to show that plaintiff has had any title to the land since May 29, 1899 [a date prior to the bringing of the action]. Indeed, it has been held often that the presumption is that the pleader has stated his case as strongly as he can. * * * We have a right to infer, therefore, that subsequent to said date plaintiff parted with all of her title to said property, and at the time she brought the action she had no further interest in the same. She thus failed to state a cause of action, and the demurrer was properly sustained on that ground." See, also, Hildreth v. Montecito Creek Water Co., 139 Cal. 22, 72 P. 395.

The reasoning of these cases applies to the instant case. We are not holding that plaintiffs here were required to allege more definitely their interest in the real property at the time of the commencement of the action. We hold that they were required to allege title in themselves at the time of the alleged agreement respecting the said property. Appellants argue that, irrespective of ownership, they have a cause of action on the agreement; in other words, that the agreement as pleaded is valid and binding, assuming that plaintiffs never did have any interest in the property.

The theory of the claim is that a trust for their benefit was created by the agreement. If there is merit in this contention it would seem only to emphasize the uncertainty complained of.

[2] Respondent makes the further claim: The complaint states no cause of action for the reason that the purported agreement alleged is too uncertain, vague and indefinite to be enforced. We deem it unnecessary to here repeat the allegations of the complaint in this particular, or to detail the arguments of respondents thereon. It is sufficient to say that if, as claimed, the action is one looking toward a specific performance of the alleged agreement, the complaint is not sufficient in any respect. Even if we disregard the relief demanded as being no part of the complaint, we still must consider what relief could be granted, if any, in determining the nature of the cause of action. And it seems clear that no relief of any kind could possibly be given without taking the pleaded agreement as the basis of such relief. That the contract or agreement as pleaded is too indefinite, uncertain, loose, and inexact to support a decree of specific performance we need but to consult the following authorities: Stanton v. Singleton, 126 Cal. 657, 59 P. 146, 47 L. R. A. 334; Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 541, 23 P. 217; Klein v. Markarian, 175 Cal. 37, 165 P. 3; Wood v. Anderson, 199 Cal. 440, 249 P. 862; Civil Code, § 3390. If the relief that might be claimed was damages for the breach of the alleged agreement it must be conceded that no damage is claimed or alleged and no definite agreement pleaded. Dillingham v. Dahlgren, 52 Cal. App. 322, 198 P. 832.

[3] Aside from the claim that the complaint did not state a cause of action in this particular, respondent demurred on the ground that the complaint was uncertain, and on the ground that it was unintelligible, because it does not appear therein, nor can it be ascertained therefrom, "what amount the plaintiff Helen H. Martin was to repay to defendant or what the amount of annual installments under the alleged contract was, or what interest was to be paid thereon, or when said installments were to be paid, or when said indebtedness was to be paid, or how or in what manner any new loan was to be made on the property, or when said new loan was to be made, or what parties were to execute any instrument or instruments to secure the performance of the alleged agreement, or what instruments were to be executed for said purpose, or what installments or how said installments were to be paid, or what terms said instruments were to contain." We think all of these specifications of uncertainty were well taken.

Summing up, plaintiffs, after leave of court to amend, and after the insufficiency of the complaint had three times been pointed out to them, elected to stand or fall upon the complaint now before us. Practically all that can be gleaned from the complaint is that defendant agreed that it would foreclose a trust deed given to secure an unpaid debt, and after foreclosure defendants and plaintiffs would then enter into some indefinite and undetermined agreement through which plaintiffs would pay off the indebtedness, first by an application of the income from the property, which is not alleged to be presently or potentially income producing, and when, if ever, these payments should reduce the indebtedness sufficiently, then a new trust deed should be given, providing for the payment of the debt in installments, the amount or frequency of which is not stated. And nothing in the complaint indicates that the plaintiffs at the time of the alleged agreement had any interest whatever in the estate or property involved.

Section 430, Code of Civil Procedure, particularly specifies uncertainty as a ground of demurrer, and, if we are to hold that the action of the court below in sustaining respondent's demurrer was erroneous, we must hold this section meaningless. That uncertainty is a well-established ground of demurrer needs no citation of authority. Mallory v. Thomas, 98 Cal. 647, 33 P. 757; Hennessey v. Mining Co., 159 Cal. 398, 113 P. 1071; Burke v. Maguire, 154 Cal. 467, 98 P. 21.

[4] Appellants complain that the ruling below was on purely technical grounds, and thus characterizes the argument of respondent here. In Callahan v. Broderick, 124 Cal. 83, 56 P. 783, it is said: "Most rules of pleading are technical, but they are founded in wisdom and justice; and orderly procedure imperatively demands their reasonable enforcement."

Judgment affirmed.

That trial court erroneously granted new trial after sentence was pronounced, and notice of appeal had deprived municipal court of jurisdiction, and that defendant relied thereon, and did not take steps to pursue appeal, did not entitle her to pursue appeal after statutory period, under Pen. Code, § 1468a, as added by St. 1925, p. 951, had elapsed, and appeal had been dismissed.

Function of writ of habeas corpus is to determine legality of detention solely by inquiry into question of jurisdiction of lower tribunal and validity of process by which prisoner is held.

Application by Diana Bathurst, also known as Virginia Bathurst, for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of Los Angeles County. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Benjamin Elconin and George D. Higgins, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Lloyd S. Nix, City Prosecutor, and Joe W. Matherly and F. W. Fellows, Deputy City Prosecutors, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The petitioner was charged in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles with petty theft, was tried by the court without a jury, and convicted. Oral notice of appeal to the superior court was given in open court, and a motion for new trial was interposed after sentence was pronounced and said notice had been given. The motion for new trial was granted, and thereafter on the date set for retrial of the cause in the municipal court, the order granting a new trial was set aside upon motion of the city prosecutor, upon the ground that it had been granted after sentence was pronounced, and a commitment issued. A writ of habeas corpus on behalf of the petitioner was prayed for in this court, and it then appearing that the motion for new trial had been filed and granted subsequently to the oral notice of appeal, and that said appeal had been perfected, though no statement was filed in the superior court, the writ was granted and the petitioner discharged from custody. 271 P. 781. We there said: "It must be obvious from the observations so far made that an appeal, once perfected, is pending in the appellate tribunal until dismissed by that court. The defendant in the action in the municipal court, having given bond to stay the execution of the judgment pending the appeal, is therefore entitled to her liberty until some further step is taken."

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

The city prosecutor thereupon moved the court last mentioned to dismiss the appeal, upon the ground that it had not been brought to a hearing within the time prescribed by section 1468a of the Penal Code, as added by St. 1925, p. 951. This motion was opposed by petitioner upon the grounds that, a new trial having been granted in the municipal court, it was impossible to have prepared a statement upon appeal within 15 days; that, believing the order granting a new trial valid, she relied thereon and prepared for trial, and strenuously endeavored to prosecute her defense of the same to judgment on the day set therefor. The appeal was dismissed upon the ground stated.

Petitioner contended upon the hearing of said motion, and here insists, that the provisions of sections 1466 and 1468 of the Penal Code are merely directory; that the original trial court having determined after careful consideration that she was entitled to a new trial, and having granted the same, she should not be penalized for the error of the court in so making an order as to prevent her from pursuing her right of appeal. It is also argued that, even though the order granting a new trial was late, it was voidable upon appeal by the people, but not void, and that, no appeal having been taken therefrom, it was in force and effect until held otherwise by a court having jurisdiction of the question as to its validity.

[1-3] The sections of the Penal Code principally relied upon provide that either party may appeal from the municipal court to the superior court in like cases and for like causes as appeals may be taken to the Supreme Court or to a District Court of Appeal; that the appellant must prepare and file with the court within five days after notice of appeal a statement of grounds of appeal and so much of the evidence as may be necessary to explain them; the respondent may file proposed amendments within five days thereafter; and such statement must then be settled by the court within ten days from the filing of the proposed statement. "If no statement is filed and served as herein provided, the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose, and shall be deemed dismissed, and the judgment or order appealed from shall be enforced as if no appeal had been taken." Unless good cause to the contrary appears, the appeal must be brought to a hearing within 60 days after it is perfected, or as soon thereafter as the business of the court will permit, and upon a failure in this respect the court shall, upon motion, dismiss the appeal. Pen. Code, §§ 1466, 1468, as amended, and section 1468a, as added by St. 1925, pp. 950, 951.

Regardless of the unfortunate dilemma produced by various steps initiated, but left unfinished, in the case, the petitioner must be presumed to have known the law, and the courts are not excepted from the rule. Not alone was the motion for a new trial filed after judgment, but after notice of appeal had deprived the municipal court of jurisdiction. The defendant in a criminal case may make a motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, at any time before judgment is pronounced. Pen. Code, § 1450; In re Bathurst (Cal. App.) 271 P. 781. It will avail him nothing to make such a motion after judgment. People v. Long, 7 Cal. App. 27, 93 P. 387.

[4-6] We cannot agree with petitioner's contention that, pending the existence of the order for a new trial, she was precluded from filing a statement upon appeal in the superior court within 5 days after having given notice of appeal. Petitioner indicates that the motion for dismissal of appeal, and the granting thereof, were founded solely upon the ground that it had not been brought on for hearing within 60 days. Had either party at any time insisted upon such hearing, there was no record before the superior court from which it might ascertain the grounds of appeal or the evidence upon which the appellant intended to rely as tending to support them. It does not appear that any statement had been prepared, served, settled, or filed on December 14, 1928, when the motion to dismiss was made, or 5 months after judgment was pronounced, and 3 months from the date when a hearing in the regular course should have been available. In that event the appeal must be dismissed. Pen. Code, sec. 1468a, as added. This section insures a defendant the right to demand a hearing within the time prescribed, or to discharge, but its salutary application is predicated upon compliance by the defendant with other indispensable requirements of the same Code. We are not in accord with the petitioner's theory that, because the municipal court favorably ruled upon her application for a new trial, it constituted such error as to inure to her benefit after she chose to rely upon illegal proceedings and sleep on her rights. There remained no alternative for the superior court but to dismiss the appeal, and, there being nothing then before the court, the judgment became final. Code Civ. Proc. § 955; Stowe v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. App. 174, 236 P. 985.

[7, 8] Finally, it is argued that, in order to subserve the ends of justice, the writ should be granted under the provisions of section 4½, article 6 of the Constitution. The petitioner having led the court into making an illegal order granting a new trial, her position is not wholly unlike that of one who attempts to complain of a failure to bring his case to trial within 60 days after a mistrial, when he caused the delay by requesting and obtaining a continuance. People v. Dyer, 26 Cal. App. 429, 147 P. 217. The cited provision of the Constitution permits a modification or setting aside of a judgment by reversal upon appeal, but we are referred to no authority, and are aware of none, authorizing its application in habeas corpus proceedings. The function of that writ is to determine the legality of detention solely by inquiry into the question of jurisdiction of the lower tribunal, and the validity of the process by which the prisoner is held. In re Leonardino, 9 Cal. App. 690, 100 P. 708. The return to the petition herein recites that petitioner is held by virtue of a certain commitment of the municipal court, a copy of which is attached thereto, and it does not appear upon its face to be defective.

The writ is discharged and the petitioner remanded.

Zoning ordinance of city of Burlingame held void as to plaintiff, on ground that classification of his property as residence property only was arbitrary, oppressive, and void, where plaintiff's property was used for sale and storage of lumber, and on one side, across the street, was right of way of main line of railroad, and on another side was lot used wholly for business purposes, and on another side was block used wholly for business purposes, including a lumber yard, storage tanks, gravel bunkers, and elevators, and on the other side were three unoccupied lots.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action to enjoin the enforcement of a zoning law by R. W. Hurst against the City of Burlingame and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; CURTIS, J., dissenting.

Fletcher Cutler, of Burlingame, and John F. Davis, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Kirkbride & Gordon, of San Mateo, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to enjoin the enforcement of a zoning ordinance of the city of Burlingame.

The plaintiff is the owner of lots 21 and 22 in block 20 of the Lyon and Hoag subdivision of the city of Burlingame. The defendants are the city of Burlingame, its board of trustees, and the executive officers thereof. At a special election held for that purpose on September 17, 1923, the electors of said city, acting under the initiative provisions of the Constitution and laws of the state, approved an ordinance, No. 162, and entitled "An ordinance regulating and establishing the location of residences, apartments, trades, industries and business buildings, and establishing the boundaries for said purposes, providing for the creation of a city planning commission, and providing penalties for the violation of its provisions." For more than six years prior to the filing of the complaint on February 5, 1926, the plaintiff was continuously engaged in the business of the retail sale and distribution of lumber, mill work and other building materials in said city. The property described in the complaint and owned by the plaintiff has been and is improved by fencing the same and the construction thereon of driveways, platform, and other structures, adapting the same for use as a lumber storage yard, and as a place for the storage and sale of lumber and other building materials. The zoning ordinance in question so classified the plaintiff's property as to prohibit the use thereof for any purpose, except the erection, alteration, and maintenance of a building or buildings pertaining to the housing of persons and places of abode. The purpose of the ordinance was, and its effect, if valid, is, to prohibit the use of said property for commercial purposes, a use to which the plaintiff is devoting the same. The city authorities threatened to prosecute the plaintiff for alleged violation of said ordinance, whereupon this action was brought.

The complaint alleged that the entire ordinance was and is invalid for failure of the city authorities to comply with the requirements of the Zoning Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1419), and further by reason of the inclusion therein of section 12, which provides for a reclassification of any of the property in the city only with the consent of a majority of the owners of property within 500 feet outside of the exterior boundaries of the area sought to be reclassified, and that with such consent, and not otherwise, the board of trustees would submit the question of such reclassification to a vote of the people of the city at the next general or a special municipal election. The complaint alleges in detail the situation of the property surrounding the lots in question and in the same neighborhood, and the nature and character of the use thereof. It was alleged and proved that immediately to the west of the plaintiff's property, across an intervening street, is the right of way of the main line of the Southern Pacific Railroad, over which more than 73 regularly scheduled passenger and freight trains are operated daily; that along the easterly boundary of said right of way for several blocks northerly and southerly are spur tracks, railroad structures, and business establishments, all of which property is by said ordinance zoned for commercial purposes; that immediately to the north of plaintiff's property is lot 20 in block 20, which is, and was at the time of the approval of said ordinance, improved and occupied wholly for business purposes; that to the south of the plaintiff's property is block 19, which was and is wholly used for business purposes, including a lumber yard, material distributing yard, storage tanks, gravel bunkers, and elevators, and an oil distributing plant; and that just to the east of said property are three unoccupied lots.

In response to appropriate issues raised by the pleadings and the proof adduced, the court found that the provisions of the Zoning Act were not complied with in the enactment of said ordinance. It was also found that the zoning of the plaintiff's property for residential and apartment house purposes and the restriction against the use of said property for commercial purposes was arbitrary, oppressive, discriminatory, and void. The first and a vital point raised on the appeal is whether the conceded failure of the city to comply with the requirements of the Zoning Act renders the ordinance void in its entirety.

[1-5] The city of Burlingame is a city of the sixth class organized and existing under and by virtue of the provisions of the General Municipal Corporations Act (Stats. 1883, p. 93, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto). As such the city is limited in the exercise of its powers by the Constitution and general laws. It has only the powers expressly conferred and such as are necessarily incident to those expressly granted or essential to the declared objects and purposes of the municipal corporation. Its powers are strictly construed, and any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the exercise of a power is resolved against the corporation. These rules are elementary. Egan v. San Francisco, 165 Cal. 576, 133 P. 294, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 754; 18 Cal. Jur. pp. 797, 801, and cases cited. Section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution contains a broad grant of police power to municipalities. A zoning ordinance falls within the classification of police measures. Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A. L. R. 1479; Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U. S. 365, 47 S. Ct. 114, 71 L. Ed. 303, 54 A. L. R. 1016. But an ordinance adopted by a city organized under general law is subject to and controlled by general law. Const. art. 11, § 11; Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, 41 Cal. App. 522, 183 P. 230.

The Zoning Act of 1917 is a general law of the state and the method prescribed by that law for the enactment of a zoning ordinance is binding on the city of Burlingame. Section 1 of the act contains the general grant of power to enact a zoning ordinance. Section 2 provides, among other things, that in the enactment of such an ordinance the legislative body of the city "shall give reasonable consideration, among other things, to the character of the district, its peculiar suitability for particular uses, the conservation of property values and the direction of building development in accord with a well-considered plan." Section 3 enjoins on the legislative body reasonable regard for the value of the land and the uses to which it may be put to the end that regulations may promote public health, safety, and welfare. Section 4 provides that in municipalities having a planning commission the legislative body shall require said commission to recommend the boundaries of the districts to be established and the appropriate regulations and restrictions to be enforced therein; that the planning commission shall make a tentative report and hold public hearings thereon at such times and places as the legislative body shall require before submitting its final report; that the legislative body "shall not hereafter determine the boundaries of any district or impose any regulations until after the final report of the city planning commission is filed with the city clerk"; that upon receiving such report the legislative body "shall afford persons particularly interested, and the general public, an opportunity to be heard, at a time and place to be specified in a notice of hearing to be published in a newspaper to be designated for that purpose. Said newspaper to be a local newspaper, if there be one, otherwise a newspaper of general circulation within the municipality, and to be published not less than three times in any daily, or not less than once in any other newspaper of general circulation within the municipality, and, within the week within which said meeting is to held." Section 5 provides that in municipalities where there is no planning commission the legislative body may proceed in the manner provided in section 4 and "shall make the tentative report, arrange for and hold such public hearings, make such final report and afford all persons particularly interested and the general public, an opportunity to be heard at the time and place and in the manner prescribed in section four hereof."

It appears beyond dispute in this case that there was not, at the time the ordinance under attack was prepared and submitted to a vote of the electors of Burlingame, a regularly constituted planning commission. It is also an undisputed fact that there was an entire failure on the part of the legislative body of the city and of the electors of the city to comply with the requirements of sections 4 and 5 of the Zoning Act. It appears that factional differences developed in said city with reference to a comprehensive zoning plan. One faction furthered one plan and caused an ordinance to be drafted in conformity therewith. Another group furthered another and different plan and likewise caused the same to be incorporated in a proposed ordinance. Each proposed ordinance was incorporated in an initiative petition. These petitions were signed by the requisite number of electors, and upon certification of their sufficiency they were submitted to the legislative body in pursuance of the initiative law, with the request that said ordinances be passed by the legislative body without alteration or amendment or that the legislative body call a special election and submit the approval or rejection of said ordinances to a vote of the electorate of the city. The board of trustees took no official action with reference to the enactment of said ordinances, except to call the special election, as it felt itself bound to do under the law relating to the initiative. At the special election held on September 17, 1923, the ordinance now under attack was approved and the other proposed ordinance was disapproved.

[6-8] It is the established law of this state that an ordinance proposed by the electors of a county or of a city in this state under the initiative law must constitute such legislation as the legislative body of such county or city has the power to enact under the law granting, defining and limiting the powers of such body. Newsom v. Board of Supervisors (Cal. Sup.) 270 P. 676; Galvin v. Board of Supervisors, 195 Cal. 686, 235 P. 450. See, also, Hopping v. Council of City of Richmond, 170 Cal. 605, 150 P. 977; Hyde v. Wilde, 51 Cal. App. 82, 196 P. 118; State ex rel. Davies v. White, 36 Nev. 334, 136 P. 110, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 195. It is too clear for controversy that, if the board of trustees of the city of Burlingame had adopted the ordinance in question without compliance with the requirements of the Zoning Act above outlined, said ordinance would have been inoperative and void. It is equally clear that the infirmity would not be cured by the purported adoption of the ordinance by the electors of the city under the initiative law. The Zoning Law vests in the legislative body of the city broad discretionary power, but when the method for the exercise of the power is prescribed by the statute such method is the measure of the power to act. Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 81 Am. Dec. 96. The Legislature may have considered, and very properly so, that in the enactment of a zoning ordinance property rights might be seriously affected. While the detriment flowing from a validly enacted zoning measure would be damnum absque injuria, the requirement of notice and hearing provided by the statute may not be treated lightly or at all disregarded. When the statute requires notice and hearing as to the possible effect of a zoning law upon property rights the action of the legislative body becomes quasi judicial in character, and the statutory notice and hearing then becomes necessary in order to satisfy the requirements of due process and may not be dispensed with.

[9] Whether the requirements of the Zoning Act as to notice and hearing could be complied with in the enactment of an ordinance by the board of trustees pursuant to the demand of the initiative petition that the proposed ordinance be passed without alteration or amendment need not be passed upon. It would seem to be an idle proceeding for the board of trustees, after an initiative petition is presented to it, to enter upon an investigation as to a proper zoning plan, give notice and conduct hearings for the benefit of interested property owners and the public in general and at the conclusion of its deliberations have no power to change the terms of the proposed ordinance. The initiative law and the zoning law are hopelessly inconsistent and in conflict as to the manner of the preparation and adoption of a zoning ordinance. The Zoning Act is a special statute dealing with a particular subject and must be deemed to be controlling over the initiative, which is general in its scope.

The appellants cite and rely upon the case of Dwyer v. City Council, 200 Cal. 505, 253

P. 932, as direct authority for the proposition that the initiative and referendum law may be applied to zoning ordinances and when so applied the Zoning Act of 1917 would be superseded. The case relied upon is not controlling nor applicable for at least two reasons. The zoning ordinance of the city of Berkeley there involved was adopted by the legislative body of the city pursuant to the provisions of the charter and ordinances of said city specifying the mode and manner for the adoption of such an ordinance. It appeared that the city was operating under a freeholders' charter and had fully complied with the Constitution to the end that the matter of zoning was a municipal affair as contemplated by section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution. The Zoning Act of 1917 was therefore not controlling.

It also appeared that the city council had taken all of the requisite preliminary steps in order that the measure might become a valid city ordinance and had actually adopted the same. Its effective date was suspended by the filing of a petition under the law relating to the referendum. The city authorities contended that the referendum did not apply to such an ordinance and this court held that the contention was without merit. The question of the operation of the initiative law to such local legislation was not involved in the Dwyer Case, and therefore no necessity arose to distinguish between the effectiveness of the initiative and the referendum in zoning cases. If the point were involved, it would undoubtedly be conceded that, had the board of trustees of the city of Burlingame adopted a zoning ordinance, as provided by the statute, its final action would be subject to the referendum provisions of the Constitution and laws of the state, for the obvious reason that there is embodied in the enactment of a zoning ordinance such elements of legislative action as to subject the ordinance when adopted to the reserved legislative power of the electors of the city, when properly invoked, to approve or reject it. We therefore conclude that the ordinance under attack is void in its entirety, for failure to comply with the requirements of the Zoning Act.

[10] It is contended by the respondent that the entire ordinance is void for the further reason that in section 12 thereof the power to reclassify any of the property in the city is made contingent upon the consent of a majority of the owners of property within 500 feet of the property sought to be rezoned. Such an attempted suspension of legislative power has been held ineffective, and such an attempted delegation of power to be an unauthorized interference with the rights of property owners adversely affected. Ex parte Sing Lee, 96 Cal. 354, 31 P. 245, 24 L. R. A. 195, 31 Am. St. Rep. 218, and cases cited. A late pronouncement on the subject is State of Washington v. Roberge, 278 U. S. 116, 49 S. Ct. 50, 73 L. Ed. —— (November 19, 1928). But the invalidity of said section 12 would not necessarily strike down the entire ordinance, for the reason that the provisions of said section are readily severable from the remainder of the ordinance and could be eliminated without disturbing the remainder if the latter were otherwise operative.

[11] There is much force in the contention of the respondent that the ordinance, if otherwise valid, is void as to him for the reason, as concluded by the trial court, that the classification of the respondent's property as residence property only was arbitrary, oppressive, discriminatory, and void. In addition to the findings and conclusions of the court on the evidence presented, the court also declared with reference to the plaintiff's property: "A mere inspection of the property would present to the dullest of minds the impracticability of maintaining the portion left in this block for residential purposes."

An inspection of the record before us leads us to the same conclusion and satisfies us that the question of whether the respondent's property was or was not properly zoned as residential property is not fairly debatable; that no consideration of public health, peace, safety, morals, order, or welfare required that the respondent be prohibited from using his property for commercial purposes; and that the ordinance, if otherwise valid, would be void as to him. We might well rest our decision on the point last mentioned, were it not for the fact that the ordinance is clearly void in its entirety, and the city authorities should be so advised.

The judgment is affirmed.

JEAN v. JEAN et al. (L. A. 9640.)★

Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 23, 1929.

1. Gifts 🔑4—Intent to give and delivery are necessary elements of "gift inter vivos."

Intent to give and a delivery of the gift are necessary elements of a "gift inter vivos."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Gift Inter Vivos.]

2. Gifts 🔑49(6)—Evidence held to warrant finding of donors' intention to make irrevocable gift of stock to children and of sufficient delivery.

Evidence that husband and wife, in order to avoid probate proceedings and inheritance taxes, conveyed hotel property owned by them as tenants in common to corporation and thereafter had secretary issue five certificates transferring to each of their five children equal shares of stock received for such property of which certificates were delivered by husband to one of sons and kept by latter in his safe deposit box to which he alone had access, held to warrant finding that they intended to make irrevocable gift of such stock, subject only to income therefrom during their natural lives and of a delivery necessary to pass title free from power of donors to exercise jus disponendi.

3. Corporations 🔑94—Shares of stock are incorporeal right, of which certificate is merely evidence not necessary to ownership of stock.

Shares of stock are incorporeal right, not susceptible of transfer by manual delivery, certificates being only evidence of the shares, and not the shares themselves, and a duly registered stockholder may exercise all rights of owner without certificate.

4. Gifts 🔑49(6)—Notation of transfer of stock on corporation's books by issuance of new certificates makes prima facie case of transfer and delivery necessary to gift (Civ. Code, § 324).

Under Civ. Code, § 324, relating to transfer of corporate stock, notation of transfer of stock on books of corporation by issuance of new certificates makes at least a prima facie case of transfer sufficient to create a legal delivery of the shares necessary to constitute a gift thereof, and fact that donor retains certificates does not necessarily overcome this prima facie showing.

5. Gifts 🔑48—Testimony of statements by alleged donors that stock had been delivered to one child to be surrendered to children on donors' death held competent on issue of delivery.

In action to establish ownership of corporate stock, testimony that original owners during a period of several years told their children and others that the stock had been delivered to one of children to hold during owners' lifetime and then to be physically surrendered to children held competent on issue of delivery necessary to establish gift.

6. Gifts 🔑48—Evidence that donors owned as their separate property realty converted into stock of corporation held admissible on issues of intent to make gift of stock and delivery.

In action to establish ownership of corporate stock through gift from plaintiff's parents, evidence tending to show that plaintiff's parents owned the real property converted into stock of corporation as their separate property held admissible on issues of intent to give and delivery.

7. Gifts 🔑51—Instruction that issuance of new certificates to donor in name of donors' children completed delivery held unobjectionable, where gift intent existed.

Instruction that, if alleged donors with intent to give corporate stock to their children indorsed stock certificate for transfer and delivered it to proper officers of corporation, requesting them to reissue stock to their five children in equal shares, and officers did issue said certificates as requested, on which such new certificates were delivered to one of donors, delivery of stock was complete, held unobjectionable, where intent to make gift and all other elements of gift were present.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by John E. Jean against F. O. Jean and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bernard F. Potter, Earle M. Daniels, G. C. De Garmo, and H. B. Cornell, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. The judgment is affirmed. Whether respondent owns without restriction certain shares of stock in a family corporation as a gift inter vivos from his father and mother, or whether he owns a life interest in the income of their equivalent as a legacy under the will of his father, is the foundation of this proceeding. The control of this corporation is perhaps involved also in the result of this action. The discussion of counsel is voluminous and covers a wide field, but the reasons impelling our conclusion may be confined to a comparatively narrow space. As we have determined that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict and judgment, we shall emphasize only that evidence favorable to respondent's contentions, as it may be freely admitted that the evidence is in sharp conflict.

On June 8, 1914, and for many years prior thereto, F. A. and Mary Jean, husband and wife, and owned as tenants in common, and not as community property, a certain lot on Flower street in the city of Los Angeles, upon which was situated on the above date the Jean Hotel, a hostelry of some 100 rooms. The couple had five children, four sons and a daughter. Having reached an advanced age in life, they began to consider the disposition of their property. Acting under legal advice, they caused to be incorporated under the laws of California the Jean Investment Company, with a capital stock of 25,000 shares of the par value of $1 each. Certificates of stock numbered 1, 2, and 3 were issued to F. A. Jean, the father, Mary L. Jean, the mother, and F. O. Jean, one of the sons, for one share each, respectively, qualifying them as directors of the corporation; said F. A. Jean being made president thereof and said F. O. Jean, secretary. The husband and wife then deeded to the corporation the said real property above mentioned in exchange for 24,997 shares of the capital stock of said corporation, which was evidenced by certificate No. 4 issued in their joint names and delivered to them.

The avowed object of this couple was to so arrange their affairs as to fix the descent of their property and yet to retain the income therefrom during the remainder of their lives. They further desired to dispense with all probate proceedings and to avoid inheritance taxes. Accordingly, on the 9th day of June, 1914, the said couple indorsed said certificate No. 4 and delivered it to the secretary of the said corporation with instructions to issue five certificates of 4,999⅖ shares each to each of the following named children, as follows: Certificate No. 5 to W. L. Jean; certificate No. 6 to plaintiff J. E. Jean; certificate No. 7 to Walter Jean; certificate No. 8 to Mamie Jean Wyman; and certificate No. 9 to F. O. Jean. Said certificates were duly signed by the president and secretary and the seal of the corporation was affixed thereto, all in the presence of the alleged donors. The company had no stock book, having only loose leaves with stubs attached in lieu of a certificate book, which stubs were not detached from said certificates so made out, with the one exception of that issued to F. O. Jean.

The evidence is in sharp conflict at this point, and happenings for the ensuing eight years will be reverted to later. On the 15th day of August, 1922, said F. A. Jean, the father, undertook to cancel said five certificates of stock, by writing across the face of each thereof these words: "Aug. 15 22 cancelled," signed "F. A. Jean." Accordingly there was issued on the same day in lieu of said five certificates, certificate No. 10 for 24,997 shares to F. A. Jean. The record shows that at this time Mary L. Jean, the wife, was living, but was incompetent, and a few months later she died. Later, and on the 21st day of August, 1922, the said F. A. Jean made and published his last will and testament, in which he conveyed his entire estate to the son F. O. Jean, in trust, the whole thereof to remain in trust until the death of his wife, Mary L. Jean, and upon her death the interests of F. O. Jean and Mamie Jean Wyman were to be released from the trust, but the interests of plaintiff and his other two brothers continued thereunder, each to receive the income of a one-fifth interest in said estate during his lifetime, the remainder upon his death to vest in other persons according to the existing contingency therein provided for.

Mary L. Jean died in 1922. F. A. Jean died in 1924. F. O. Jean, as executor of his last will and testament, claimed all of said shares of stock represented by said certificate No. 10 as part of the estate of F. A. Jean, whereupon plaintiff brought this action to establish his ownership of the shares of stock represented by said certificate No. 6 and to recover the said certificate from defendants. To that end he filed a complaint, which later was amended to conform to proof. The issues tendered by the amended complaint were traversed by the answer of defendants. The cause was submitted to the court sitting with a jury. As a result the jury returned a general verdict in favor of plaintiff as well as answering certain special issues propounded to them in his favor. Judgment followed for the plaintiff. Defendants have appealed.

[1] As above noted, the chief contention centers around the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict of the jury. The two necessary elements of a gift inter vivos involved here are intent to give and a delivery of the gift. We need not pause for an extended citation of authorities upon the necessary elements of such a gift. See Lefrooth v. Prentice, 202 Cal. 215, 259 P. 947, and Code sections therein cited. Further portions of the evidence will now be considered bearing upon these two questions.

[2] It was the testimony of Bernard Potter, the attorney for the donors and the corporation and the present attorney for the defendants, that it was the intention of the husband and wife to avoid probate proceedings on their death. This, of course, could not be lawfully done unless the title to the stock passed to the children named in the five certificates. He testified that, as their legal representative, he thought that these shares of stock would, upon the death of F. A. Jean, pass to the children upon the theory that no one would question the delivery thereof. F. O. Jean testified that he could not remember what his father and mother said to him at the time the five certificates above referred to were made out and signed. He testified that the father took said certificates home, but admitted that a short time later they were handed to him by the father and by him kept in his own safe deposit box to which he alone had access for a period of about one year; that later they were returned to the father, who kept them a short time, and still later a box was rented in the name of the Jean Investment Company, wherein the stock remained for a period of about eight years; that during this interval upon request of the father from time to time the stock was returned to his residence and there kept by him for varying periods, being always thereafter returned to the safe deposit box of the company.

It seems that the father did not have access to the box in the company's name, although he paid the rental charges upon it. The father and mother repeatedly told the children, and others also, that they had fixed their property so that it could not be changed and that the children would receive it share and share alike at their death, and many other expressions of similar import. Upon one occasion, at the request of the father, the daughter went down to the safe deposit box and the brother F. O. Jean exhibited the stock to her. The father said that everything was fixed as he wanted it and that all the children would be treated fairly and right. Upon another occasion the son Walter inquired of his father about the stock and was directed to seek F. O. Jean and to have him exhibit the stock to him, which was done. This was in June or July, 1922. On this day a family meeting was held, at which practically all the children were present and at which, also, the attorney attended and the existence of the stock and the purpose of its issuance were the subjects of discussion. While the reports of this interview vary, testimony favorable to respondent was adduced to the effect that, at the request of the father, the attorney explained that the stock was so made out that the children would receive it share and share alike and that this arrangement was final and could not be changed and that upon death of the parents the physical possession of the stock would result. From the circumstances of the surrender of certificate No. 4 and the issuance of the five certificates of stock above referred to and from the above set forth facts shown by the record, the jury was amply warranted in finding that said F. A. and Mary L. Jean intended to give irrevocably to their children these shares of stock, subject only to the income therefrom during their natural lives; in fact, it can hardly be doubted that this was their intent at that time.

The next question that presents itself is: Does this evidence warrant the finding of the jury that a delivery, either actual or symbolical, was made of the stock? At the threshold we find a compliance with section 324 of the Civil Code, which reads in part: "Whenever the capital stock of any corporation is divided into shares, and certificates therefor are issued, such shares of stock, except as hereinafter provided, are personal property, and may be transferred by indorsement by signature of the proprietor, his agent, attorney, or legal representative, and the delivery of the certificate; but such transfer is not valid, except as to the parties thereto, until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the names of the parties by whom and to whom transferred, the number of the certificate, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer. * * *"

[3, 4] Shares of stock are an incorporeal right and are not susceptible of transfer by manual delivery. The certificates, indeed, are not the shares, but only evidence of them. A duly registered stockholder may exercise all the rights of an owner without a certificate. Under the above section the notation of the transfer upon the books of the corporation by the issuance of the new certificates certainly made at least a prima facie case of transfer, sufficient to create a legal delivery of the shares. Hotaling v. Hotaling, 187 Cal. 695, 203 P. 745; Bacon v. Traders' Oil Corp., 52 Cal. App. 172, 201 P. 477; 6 Thompson on Corporations (3d Ed.) § 4317, p. 168; Thomas v. Thomas, 70 Colo. 29, 197 P. 243; Roberts' Appeal, 85 Pa. 84. A case strikingly similar in principle and in its facts to the case before us, wherein a delivery of stock was found to have been made, is Jones v. Jones (Mo. App.) 201 S. W. 557. See, also, to the same effect, Whitney v. Whitney, etc., Co., 121 Misc. Rep. 461, 200 N. Y. S. 792.

The fact that the donors or one of them may have retained the certificate does not necessarily overcome this prima facie showing Stone v. Daily, 181 Cal. 571, 581, 185 P. 665; Coward v. DeCray, 38 Cal. App. 290, 176 P. 56.

[5] But we need not rely altogether upon the records of the corporation. The father and mother repeatedly, during the years intervening, told their children and others as well that the stock had been delivered to F. O. Jean to hold during their lifetime and then to be physically surrendered to them. This is competent evidence of an important character where delivery is the issue. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 652, 151 P. 1 (Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703).

As above noted, the son F. O. Jean had in reality practically exclusive control of these certificates. They were in his safety deposit box, or in a box to which alone he had access for practically all the subsequent years after their issuance. It was to him that the other children were directed by the father when inquiries were made as to their existence and contents, and to him they repaired for this information. This, coupled with the final observation that to carry out the admitted design of the parents to avoid probate proceedings it would be necessary that delivery be made, we do not hesitate to declare evidence ample both to warrant a finding of the intent to give and the delivery necessary to pass the title free from the power of the donors to exercise jus disponendi.

[6] We see no error in permitting the evidence which tended to show that Mary L. Jean and F. A. Jean owned the real property converted into the stock of this corporation as their separate property, nor in the instructions based upon this assumption. The fact that the wife owned one-half of the real property and one-half of the stock thereafter converted to the names of the children threw some light at least upon the issue of an intent to give and delivery, as she was equally interested in the whole matter, and her conduct, whether by action or inaction, was not without material bearing upon those issues.

[7] The only other assignment which we think requires consideration is the instruction to the jury to the effect that, if the alleged donors, with intent to give said shares of stock, indorsed said certificate for transfer and delivered it to the proper officers of the corporation, requesting them to reissue said stock to said five children, and said officers did issue said certificates in equal shares as requested, and thereupon the original certificate No. 4 and the said five new certificates so issued were delivered to said F. A. Jean, then delivery of said stock was complete. This instruction is without objection where the intent to make and deliver a gift of shares of stock is found to exist. If this intent is assumed to be present and all other elements of a gift are likewise present, then a transfer upon the books of the corporation is sufficient delivery and the matter no longer rests upon a presumptive or prima facie basis; hence the instruction as applied to this case is without objection. The charge to the jury was full and covered every material question contained in the requested instructions that were refused.

After careful examination of the cause we adhere to the conclusion above announced.

Supreme Court of California. April 29, 1929.

1. Homicide ⇐238—Evidence, though showing defendant had been drinking just before commission of crime, held sufficient to support conviction of first degree murder (Pen. Code, § 22).

Evidence held sufficient to support conviction of murder in first degree, notwithstanding that defendant had been drinking intoxicating liquor just prior to commission of crime, and was under its influence to some extent when he fired shots; such facts furnishing no legal excuse, notwithstanding Pen. Code, § 22.

2. Homicide ⇐294(2)—Statute providing that jury may consider intoxication in determining intent is inapplicable in murder case, where defendant did not claim he was intoxicated when he planned or executed crime (Pen. Code, § 22).

Provision of Pen. Code, § 22, that, when intent is necessary element to constitute degree of crime, jury may consider fact of intoxication in determining intent with which act was committed, is inapplicable in prosecution for murder, where there was no evidence of intoxication, and where no claim was made that defendant was intoxicated when he planned or executed crime.

3. Homicide ⇐294(2)—In prosecution for murder, instructions as to intoxication held properly refused under evidence.

In prosecution for murder, trial court under evidence properly refused to instruct that jury should consider whether defendant was intoxicated to such extent at time of crime as to be incapable of forming specific intent, and that, if defendant was intoxicated when crime was committed, that fact should be taken into consideration in fixing degree of crime.

Jack H. Price was convicted of murder in the first degree, with sentence of death, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frederic H. Vercoe, Public Defender, and Franklin Padan, Chief Deputy Public Defender, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, J. The defendant was found guilty of murder in the first degree, without recommendation, and the death penalty was imposed. He has appealed from the judgment, asserting that the trial court erred in refusing to modify the verdict and judgment and fix the degree of the crime at second degree murder, as moved by appellant and authorized by subdivision 6 of section 1181, Penal Code (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1037), and in refusing to give certain instructions requested by appellant with reference to intoxication.

[1] Both of appellant's contentions are based upon his position that he was intoxicated at the time the crime was committed, and that he was incapable, therefore, of premeditation. We have examined the record in the case, and find that it supports the verdict of murder in the first degree. It is true that the record shows defendant had been drinking intoxicating liquor just prior to the commission of the crime, and that he was under its influence, to some extent at least, when he fired the shots at his victim; but this fact furnishes no legal excuse. Section 22, Pen. Code. The evidence shows that, for several years, the defendant had been living with Maurillia Adame. She had previously been married, and was the mother of two children by this marriage. She was generally reputed to have been the wife of defendant, although they were not legally married. Defendant, according to some of the testimony, was engaged in the illegal sale of intoxicating liquor, and, according to his own account, he had been confined in jail for a time shortly before the crime we are considering was committed, for drunkenness. After his release, Maurillia Adame left him and went to live in another apartment. Defendant watched her movements and associations, telephoned to her, and attempted to persuade her to return to him. Upon her refusal, he secured a revolver from one of his associates, by representing that he could sell it at a good price. He then wrote a letter to the men with whom he was living, in which he stated: "When you come home, you may find me in the can (meaning jail). * * * I hope you will bring me something to smoke. * * * Come down and see me. I may want you to bring some clothes back. * * * I have a watch. You come down. I will tell you where it is." He then wrote to Maurillia Adame: "I ask you to come to me, but would not listen to me. It is too late now. I love you more than any one; so goodby." The deceased was working in a laundry, and defendant came up to her on the street, as she was leaving for her luncheon. He had obtained some whisky that morning and had consumed some of it. At the time this was done, however, his plans seem to have been very definitely made.

[2] The provision of section 22 of the Penal Code, to the effect that, when purpose, motive, and intent is a necessary element to constitute the degree of crime, the jury may take into consideration the fact of intoxication in determining the purpose, motive, and intent with which the act was committed, is inapplicable here, because, as stated by the trial judge, there was no evidence of intoxication, and no claim made by the defendant that he was intoxicated at the time he planned or executed the crime. It is true, as considered by the trial court, that the defendant said he had drunk some whisky in the morning, and that the detective said he showed evidence of drinking at the time he was brought to the police station, but the claim of defendant at the trial was that he had secured a revolver for the purpose of committing suicide, and that he had started out at noon to send a note to the deceased, and had accidentally met her on the street; that he attempted to hand her the note, and she repulsed him in a manner which so angered and distracted him that, in a sudden rage, he shot her. This theory of the defense was before the jury, and they rejected it. There was insufficient evidence in the record regarding intoxication to warrant the giving of the instruction on this subject requested by the defendant.

The record shows a jealous man, who determined to kill his common-law wife when she refused to return to him, because he wished to prevent any one else from having any relations with her. There is nothing in the record which would justify a jury in believing that this purpose was conceived during a period of intoxication. Appellant would have us take the view that no purpose of killing deceased existed in the mind of defendant until the moment he encountered her on the street, at which time he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. Apart from the fact that the record is unsatisfactory as to the fact of intoxication at the time of the killing, it also appears that the defendant secured, cleaned, and prepared a revolver, with which the crime was committed, at a time when there is no evidence of intoxication. He also wrote the letter from which quotation is made herein, which also shows premeditation, and, armed with a loaded revolver, he went to the place where he knew he would find the deceased at the hour for her luncheon. Under the circumstances, we think the conclusion of the trial judge was correct: That the record did not warrant a finding of intoxication at the time of the crime, or at the time of its conception.

[3] The trial court properly refused to instruct the jury to the effect that it should consider whether the defendant was intoxicated to such an extent at the time the crime was committed as to be incapable of forming any specific intent, and that, if defendant was found to have been intoxicated at the time the crime was committed, that fact should be taken into consideration in fixing the degree of the crime.

What we have said with reference to the evidence disposes of the contention that the trial judge should have reduced the degree of the crime. The judgment is affirmed.

Action for partition by Catherine E. Lahaney against Ivy L. Lahaney and others. From an interlocutory judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an interlocutory judgment in an action for partition, determining the respective rights and interests of plaintiff and defendant Ivy L. Lahaney, in four parcels of real estate, situate in the city and county of San Francisco, and formerly owned by one Joseph F. Lahaney, a brother of plaintiff and husband of said defendant, and who is now deceased. Joseph F. Lahaney and the defendant Ivy L. Lahaney were married on June 29, 1908, and remained husband and wife thereafter until the husband's death in 1922. Of the four parcels of real estate in question, one was acquired by Joseph F. Lahaney in the year 1908, another in 1909, another in 1913, and the last in 1917. The title to these four properties was taken in the name of Joseph F. Lahaney alone, but it is a conceded fact that each and all of them were community property. On January 27, 1919, Joseph F. Lahaney executed a deed describing these four properties, which was in form a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, with a recited consideration of $10, wherein he was named as grantor, and wherein Catherine E. Lahaney, his sister, and Ivy L. Lahaney were named as grantees, and whereby he granted to each of said grantees an undivided one-half interest in said four parcels of land. It is conceded that this deed, in form a grant, bargain, and sale deed, with a nominal consideration of $10, amounted in fact to a deed of gift of said properties in undivided interests to the grantees named therein. This deed was delivered to the appellant herein on December 27, 1921. The respondent herein did not join in said conveyance as a grantor therein, and according to her testimony did not know of its existence until her husband's death intestate in September, 1922.

The plaintiff commenced this action for the partition of said properties on October 17, 1922, against the defendant Ivy L. Lahaney, individually, and also as administratrix of the estate of Joseph F. Lahaney, deceased, and against certain other defendants, whose relation to said properties is not material upon this appeal. In her complaint she alleged herself and the defendant Ivy L. Lahaney, individually, to be the owners in fee simple and as equal tenants in common of said four parcels of land as described in her said complaint, and prayed for a partition thereof accordingly in kind, or, if that were not practical, then for a sale of said properties and a division of the proceeds thereof according to the aforesaid equal interests of said parties therein.

The defendant Ivy L. Lahaney appeared and filed an answer, and also a cross-complaint, in the former of which she denied that the plaintiff was the owner of any interest whatever in said parcels of land, or any of them, but, on the contrary, alleged that all of said properties were the community property of herself and Joseph F. Lahaney, and so continued to be up to the time of his death. In her cross-complaint the said defendant repeated these averments, and further averred that the document by the terms of which the plaintiff claimed to have some right or title or interest in said properties, or any of them, was void or voidable as against the community interest of the said defendant and cross-complainant therein. She prayed affirmatively that it be so decreed, and that the said plaintiff be required to execute a conveyance transferring to the estate of Joseph F. Lahaney, deceased, all of whatever right, title, or interest she alleged in her complaint to have in said properties.

The plaintiff answered said cross-complaint, by repeating substantially the averments of her original complaint. Thereafter the said defendant presented and filed an amended cross-complaint, setting forth with somewhat more of detail her contention that the conveyance upon which the plaintiff relied was in fact a deed of gift in which she had not joined, and to that portion thereof purporting to convey any portion of the community property to any other person she had not consented. She further alleged that said Joseph F. Lahaney was not of sound mind at the time of making said conveyance. The plaintiff answered this amended cross-complaint with full denials.

The cause came on for trial upon the issues as thus framed, and upon its submission the trial court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, wherein, briefly stated, it found that the properties in question were the community property of Joseph F. and Ivy L. Lahaney; that Joseph F. Lahaney had made and executed the conveyance as set forth in the plaintiff's complaint, and that the same was in fact a deed of gift to the grantees named therein; that Ivy L. Lahaney had not joined in nor consented to the execution of said deed; that at the time of the execution thereof Joseph F. Lahaney was of sound mind. As a conclusion of law from the foregoing findings of fact, the trial court found that the plaintiff and the defendant Ivy L. Lahaney were the owners and tenants in common of each and all of said properties, in the proportions that the plaintiff was the owner of an undivided one-fourth thereof and that the defendant Ivy L. Lahaney was the owner of an undivided three-fourths thereof. An interlocutory decree of partition was ordered and entered accordingly. It is from such decree that the plaintiff herein has taken and prosecutes this appeal.

It is the contention of the appellant herein that the conveyance made and executed by Joseph F. Lahaney on January 27, 1919, is to be interpreted as a single instrument, whereby the grantor named therein intended to transfer to the grantees named therein the entire community ownership and interest in each and all of the properties described therein. We are satisfied that this contention is sound and constitutes the only rational interpretation to be placed upon said instrument and upon the intent of Joseph F. Lahaney as embodied in its terms. This being so, we are led to the other and equally irresistible conclusion that it was the grantor's intention to convey to his wife by his said deed of gift that undivided one-half of each and all of said properties which was represented in her theretofore inchoate community interest therein, and thus to constitute her the owner thereof in the sense that the same was to become and be thereafter her sole and separate estate. Such is the usual interpretation which has been placed upon gifts of the community property when made by a husband to his wife. Marlow v. Barlew, 53 Cal. 460; Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 20 P. 715, 3 L. R. A. 781, 12 Am. St. Rep. 58; Carter v. McQuade, 83 Cal. 274, 23 P. 348; Hamilton v. Hubbard, 134 Cal. 603, 65 P. 321, 66 P. 860; Estate of Klumpke, 167 Cal. 415, 139 P. 1062.

If such is to be the interpretation and effect to be given the aforesaid conveyance of Joseph F. Lahaney, in so far as the same relates to the undivided one-half interest in the properties in question which he thus transferred to his wife, it would seem with like conclusiveness to follow that as to the other undivided one-half thereof, which constituted his (husband's) share of the said community property, he was thus set free to make such disposition thereof as he might be minded to do, untrammeled by the provisions of section 172 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 425). Such, as we read it, is the effect of the decision of this court in the case of Dargie v. Patterson, 176 Cal. 714, 718, 169 P. 360, 361, wherein, in directly dealing with this precise question, it was stated: "During his lifetime the husband, notwithstanding the statutory limitation upon his power of disposition, is the owner of the community property. The proviso attached to section 172 does not impair his right to dispose of the property, so far as concerns his own interest, and that of those claiming under him. If he had made no conveyance, the widow would, upon his death, have been entitled to one half of the property in question, as of all other community property. The other half would have passed to his heirs or devisees, and the widow, as such, would have had no interest in it. His heirs or devisees are bound, as he himself was bound, by the conveyance made. Why, then, should the widow's claim extend to any more than the one-half which would pass to her as survivor of the community? The privilege of avoiding the gift is conferred upon her as a means of protecting her interest in the community property. We see no reason why, in assailing the gift, she should enjoy greater rights than she would have had if the gift had never been made."

The foregoing statement seems to us conclusive of the instant case. The husband having by a single stroke disposed of the entire community interest in the properties in question by giving to his wife that which must in reason be held to have been her whole community interest and estate in these properties, and having thus entitled himself to dispose by grant or gift of his own entire interest in the remaining undivided one-half interest therein, and having exercised that right by the grant or gift thereof to his sister, the plaintiff herein, it follows that she became entitled thereto as the grantee thereof by virtue of said deed as fully as the defendant Ivy L. Lahaney, the grantor's wife, became entitled to her undivided one-half of these theretofore community properties as her sole and separate estate by the terms of the same identical instrument. Such properties must be held to have thereby ceased as a whole, and as to every portion thereof to be community property in which the grantor thereafter had no interest, and in which, upon his death, neither his heirs nor his widow, as such, succeeded to any interest or estate. It follows that the trial court was in error in its legal conclusion, and in its decree based thereon, in holding that the interest of the plaintiff herein was to be limited to a one-fourth interest in the aforesaid properties, and that the interest of the defendant Ivy L. Lahaney amounted to an undivided three-fourths interest therein.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to set aside its conclusions of law and decree heretofore made and entered herein, and in the place and stead thereof to adjudge and decree that the plaintiff and the defendant Ivy L. Lahaney are the owners and entitled each to an undivided one-half ownership and interest in the properties in question, and that, having done so, the court shall make such disposition of the rights and claims of the other defendants herein as may be meet in the premises and as are not involved in this appeal.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; CURTIS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LANGDON, J.

PRESTON, J. I dissent. The deed in question was a voluntary conveyance during coverture of the community property of the grantor and his wife. The delivery of the deed was to the sister alone, the wife being in ignorance both of its contents and existence. The grantor did not deliver the deed to the sister until a short time before his death, and more than two years after execution of the instrument. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone, and these facts appear from it. The main opinion construes the deed as an effort on the part of the husband to destroy inter vivos and during coverture community property, by converting the wife's inchoate interest into a vested right therein as her separate estate, and the conveyance of the other one-half to the sister.

The misconception of the situation taken by the main opinion is in holding that on the face of the deed the husband must be said to have been dealing exclusively with the inchoate right of the wife in making her a grantee thereunder. I see no reason whatever for this conclusion. The only conclusion I can draw therefrom is that the husband, assuming to own the whole estate in all the property, undertook to divide it half and half between his wife and sister, without any thought of the nature or extent of the wife's right therein. Under the doctrine in the case of Dargie v. Patterson, 176 Cal. 714, 718, 169 P. 360, relied upon in the opinion, the wife had, after the death of her husband, the undoubted right to pursue the identical property into the hands of the grantee and to secure one-half thereof. There is no reason why the wife may not have this right accorded her, notwithstanding a deed to her was also at the same time and as part of the same instrument made to an interest in the same property. If a third party had been substituted for the wife as grantee in the deed, the wife could have undoubtedly gone by a separate action into court and secured half of the property transferred to each of said grantees. The wife might also have pursued her right against the one and waived it as against the other. It is plainly a discrimination against her to hold that she got nothing under the deed. Moreover, during the lifetime of the husband, the wife could doubtless have set the deed aside in toto under section 172 of the Civil Code, and, as to one parcel of the property, under section 172a thereof.

Furthermore, I think the situation is in reality akin to the principle announced in the line of cases holding that, where the husband attempts to make testamentary disposition of the whole of the community property, the wife takes half in her own right and half of the remaining half by the law of descent. Estate of Rossi, 169 Cal. 148, 146 P. 430; Estate of Prager, 166 Cal. 450, 137 P. 37; Estate of Gilmore, 81 Cal. 240, 22 P. 655; Robbins v. U. S. (D. C.) 5 F.(2d) 704. I cannot bring my mind to any interpretation of said sections of the code or of the case of Dargie v. Patterson, supra, which will discriminate against the wife under the facts shown by this record. In other words, the main opinion imputes an intent to the husband that is unwarranted in my view of the matter by anything appearing in the deed. The opinion reasserts the interest of the wife in the community during coverture to be nothing, and yet at the same time attributes an intent to the husband to confirm in her, when it is to her disadvantage, the very right that has been consistently denied her for all these years.

I think the judgment of the court below is correct, and should be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Neil McAllister, Dist. Atty., of Sacramento, for the People.

PRESTON, J. The defendants and appellants Anthony Brown, Roy Stokes, Walter E. Burke, James H. Gregg, and James Gleason and defendant Albert M. Stewart, convicts in the Folsom penitentiary, were jointly charged and tried for the murder of a fellow convict, George Baker. All the defendants were convicted of murder in the first degree without recommendation. Motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment were made and denied. All the defendants have appealed, but the appeal of defendant Stewart, taken separately, is not yet before us.

This charge grew out of a bold and desperate plan of escape from said prison, a plan which involved the use of force to the extent of taking the life, if necessary, of any person who stood in the way of its accomplishment, or who might by accident or for some other reason be within the line of march of the revolt.

On Thanksgiving morning, November 24, 1927, at about 10 o'clock, defendants began the execution of their well-planned scheme of escape, Stokes armed with a gun, afterwards carried by Brown, Burke with a hatchet, and the others with razor and knives. They first rounded up some five or six convicts who were trusties, and a guard, and locked them in cell 239 in the back alley of the prison. Thereafter they proceeded to the rotunda and attacked the guard and others in an attempt to gain entrance through the door leading to the warden's office. Failing in this, they took guards Neal and Gorahnson, the latter being already wounded by them, and proceeded to the rear of the prison, where there is an inner gate and passageway or tunnel, with counting booth therein, leading to the outer gate, captain's office, and the yard.

This passageway is about 50 feet long and about 15 feet wide; the captain's office is located just west of the outer gate at the north end leading to the yard; said counting booth, about three and a half feet wide by seven feet long and seven feet high, is located at the northeast corner of said passageway and is usually occupied by a convict counter, who assists the guard stationed just outside the outer gate in keeping and checking the count of the convicts going in and out thereof. On said morning, during the hour or so prior to said time, deceased, George Baker, was seen by several witnesses in said counting booth. A small stove was lighted inside and, having recently been let out of the hospital and being sensitive to the cold, he had stopped therein to get thoroughly warm, but was not on duty as a counter.

Upon reaching said inner gate located at the south end of said passageway, said escaping convicts, with said guards, ordered them to have the gate opened. As the prisoner on the other side opened the gate, guard Neal stepped through and attempted to close it after him. Not succeeding, he ran through the passageway, toward the outer or north end, whereupon, in furtherance of the plot to escape, two shots were fired; one hit him and the other is claimed to be the shot which killed said Baker while in said counting booth. Defendant Brown is identified by the witnesses as the convict who carried the gun and fired the two shots. The other defendants were present with weapons aiding and abetting him. There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether the first or second shot hit the deceased. Certain it is that one of the shots passed through a pane of glass in the window of said counting booth and could have hit any person therein within its line of travel.

Guard Neal dragged himself on through the passageway and outer gate to the captain's office. Guard Gorahnson was hit over the head with a hatchet and left lying in the passageway inside said inner gate. The inner gate was closed, and evidently remained so until early the next morning. Said escaping band, still in mutiny and acting in concert for said deadly purpose, then proceeded to the schoolhouse, where they imprisoned other guards and some 1,400 convicts and kept them as prisoners until about 6 or 7 o'clock the next morning, November 25th, when, seeing their plan had failed, they capitulated. There is testimony that the two gates opening upon said passageway were locked immediately after the above incident of the firing of said two shots and remained locked until about 7 o'clock the next morning, at which time the body of decedent, Baker, was found in said counting booth. We shall now discuss such of the assignments of error urged by appellants as appear important.

[1] The first is the attack upon the sufficiency of the evidence. In our opinion this assignment requires but little consideration. In reality the argument on the evidence is not so much with respect to its alleged insufficiency as to the alleged discrepancies therein and the incredibility of portions thereof. The chief reason for the attack made upon it seems to be to strengthen the other assignments of error. However, the desperate and determined attempt to escape by force of arms is admitted, as is also the participation therein by each of the appellants. The firing of the two shots into the tunnel or passageway by the defendant Brown is also conceded to be shown by the evidence. The presence of the other defendants aiding and abetting his act is also conceded. The wounding of turnkey Neal by one of the shots is likewise conceded. The finding of the body of the deceased Baker in the counting booth at 7 a. m. on the morning of November 25th is also admitted; that he was killed by a bullet entering just below the left nipple and passing entirely through his body, nicking his heart, is also admitted. A bullet hole in the glass of the counting booth was also found, which could well have been made by the same bullet that hit the deceased, and the same is true of a dent on the outer gate found in the line the bullet could have traveled after piercing the glass and penetrating the body of the deceased. The admitted armed mutiny in which all the defendants were engaged, the admitted firing of the two shots, which all the defendants aided and abetted, and the physical evidence on the premises as well as the evidence upon the body of the deceased furnished itself ample and sufficient evidence that one of the two shots fired by Brown killed Baker.

But, aside from this, there is in the record ample testimony given by eye-witnesses, which the jury was warranted in crediting, to the effect that Brown fired the two shots and that one of them at least hit and killed the deceased, Baker. In fact, Stewart, the sixth defendant in the revolt testified himself that he saw the convict in the counting booth and saw him go down at the time of the shooting, but could not tell whether he was hit or was hiding to escape danger. In this state of the record it is a useless consumption of time to argue discrepancies in the evidence, such as whether shot 1 or shot 2 hit Neal or whether shot 1 or shot 2 hit the deceased, Baker; as is also true as to whether Neal called upon the convict Taylor to open the gate or whether Taylor opened it himself; or whether Neal, after being wounded, dragged himself alone to the captain's office or was assisted by guard Thompson; or whether the captain of the guard was at a place where he could see any of the shooting; or whether Thompson was unworthy of belief because, if he saw the deceased fall, he should not have neglected looking after him until 7 a. m. the next day. The defendants' testimony offered no reasonable explanation of any kind of the death of Baker consistent with their innocence, and we are entirely satisfied with the finding of the jury in this behalf.

[2] The next assignment is that the acting court reporter was not a qualified court reporter pro tempore because he had not been regularly appointed and had not subscribed to an oath of office. We can discover no merit whatsoever in the contention that this situation could have been in anywise prejudicial to the rights of appellants. Franklin had acted for three and one-half years in the capacity of court reporter and was thoroughly competent and faithful in his work. No effort is made to show that his transcript of the proceedings was in any way untrue or incorrect. This is but a collateral attack upon his status as an adjunct or employee of the court. The court reporter is not among the list of county officers under section 4013 of the Political Code. We know of no constitutional or statutory provision which requires a court reporter to be an indispensable ingredient of a court. The object of having a reporter is to be able to secure an accurate transcript of the proceedings taken in the court. If appellants were enabled to receive and did receive a correct transcript of the proceedings had and taken at their trial, the ends of the law have been satisfied. If, however, they were unable to secure a record upon appeal or suffered any other material injury, we might be inclined to view their contention as having force. But we have here what purports to be and, in fact, what must be a full, true, and accurate reproduction in full of all the proceedings had and taken upon the trial. Even were a reporter given the status of an officer of the court, nevertheless, in view of this collateral attack, we would be required to hold in an instance of this kind that he had at least the status of a pro tempore reporter de facto. In re Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 431, 108 P. 322; People v. Kempley (Cal. Sup.) 271 P. 478.

[3] Appellants next contend that the trial court unduly restricted the examination of jurors upon their voir dire. Scarcely any specific instances are pointed to, but we are enjoined to read the whole transcript upon this subject in order to discern the attitude of the court in this respect. The court himself conducted the examinations, permitting the attorneys to suggest questions, as well as also permitting some of the individual defendants to do so. When a challenge was interposed and denied, the examination of the talesman was taken over by the attorney making the challenge. We have examined the entire transcript of these proceedings, which covers some 400 pages, and in our opinion the examination of each talesman was full, fair, just, and proper, and no substantial right of any kind was denied defendants or any of them. This method of examining jurors has been provided for by the recent statute (section 1078 of the Penal Code, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039), and where fairly conducted has been approved by this court. People v. Estorga (Cal. Sup.) 273 P. 575. Appellants particularly stress the contention that the court permitted juror Dawson to serve as such in violation of law, in that the record shows that on his voir dire he answered "Yes" to the following question: "Have you any conscientious opinions which would preclude you from returning a verdict of guilty, where the charge involved the death penalty?" The record shows the following questions and answers preceding this question: "The Court: Q. Mr. Dawson, I take it you have heard the questions we have been asking here all day, more or less? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Is there anything in any of those questions which you think would disqualify you, or prevent you from sitting fairly and impartially in the case? A. No, sir."

Also the following, among many other questions, were subsequently asked him:

"Q. Are you prejudiced in any way against circumstantial evidence? A. No, sir.

"Q. If you were sworn as a juror in this case, could you try it fairly and impartially to both sides? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Have you any preconceived notion or idea which way you would like to have the verdict go, or is your mind open and free? A. No, sir; my mind is open."

Whereupon at the close of the examination the following occurred:

"The Court: Either side any further questions from this gentleman? Hearing none, we will pass on to challenges.

"Mr. Johnson: We will pass the juror."

Neither the prosecution nor any of the defendants interposed a challenge for cause against this talesman. At the time this examination occurred some 77 proposed jurors had been examined, each of whom had been asked questions in substance the same as the questions above set forth upon the subject of conscientious scruples against capital punishment. Upon the day of the occurrence in question at least 4 had answered in the affirmative and had been excused. Indeed, the prospective juror who was questioned immediately preceding Mr. Dawson, one Mrs. Bender, answered that she was prejudiced against capital punishment, was challenged for cause by the district attorney, and the challenge was allowed by the court. Taking the context of this examination, together with the proceedings preceding it, coupled with the reference thereto by the court in its questions, and supplementing it with the fact that this jury rendered three verdicts as to each of these appellants, to which juror Dawson assented and signified his assent openly six times when polled by the clerk, we have no hesitancy in concluding that said answer "Yes" is a clerical misprision and does not represent the state of mind of said juror, but, on the contrary, the answer "No" was intended. It is conceded that neither the district attorney nor the trial judge would have thought of compelling or permitting a juror to serve who entertained the state of mind referred to in section 1074, subd. 8, of the Penal Code. Had the juror answered "Yes," the prosecution would have immediately interposed a challenge or else the court would on its own motion have excused the talesman for cause. The motive for silence in such a situation existed only upon the part of appellants themselves. This holding renders it unnecessary to pass upon the motion for diminution of record made by the people to correct the record in this particular, and the motion for this reason alone is denied.

[4] The contention that the indictment was based solely upon hearsay evidence is unfounded in fact, and were the assertion true, the law wisely affords no review of such a situation. An indictment is only an accusatory paper, and at most is to be considered as nothing more than part of the method of putting the defendant on trial for the charge made therein. It is not of itself considered as evidence against him upon the trial.

The form of the verdict was proper and the instructions of the court as to fixing the punishment were in harmony with the holding of this court in People v. Hall, 199 Cal. 451, 249 P. 859.

The numerous assignments of error directed at the statements in the argument of the district attorney have been examined, and in view of the facts of the record, but little serious objection could be urged to them, but in all cases where the proper bounds were exceeded, the court was prompt in its admonishment, relieving any cause for prejudicial results.

The two pages, consisting merely of page and line references, where alleged errors on the part of the trial judge may be found, we consider not in proper shape for review. However, we have read enough of them to convince us that the criticisms are entirely groundless. In most instances they are comments or questions by the court to which no objection was made.

This cause was heard by the trial judge under trying and at times exasperating conditions, but, notwithstanding this fact, the record is singularly free from error. The judgment of conviction and order denying motion for a new trial as to each of the five appellants first hereinabove named, but not as to defendant Albert M. Stewart, is hereby affirmed.

Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1929.

1. Carriers 🔑12(6½)—Railroad commission may waive requirements as to form in which complaints against carriers must be presented (Public Utilities Act, § 60).

Rules of railroad commission as to form in which complaints against carriers, under Public Utilities Act, § 60 (St. 1915, p. 157), must be presented, may be waived.

2. Carriers 🔑12(6½) — Failure of railroad commission to serve copy of complaint presented to it upon carrier will not prejudice complainant's rights (Public Utilities Act, § 60).

Failure of railroad commission to serve copy of complaint on carrier as required by Public Utilities Act, § 60 (St. 1915, p. 157), does not prejudice rights of complainant, if legal complaint is presented to commission.

3. Carriers 🔑12(6½)—Letter to railroad commission setting forth claim against carrier for refund, and requesting commission to refer matter to carrier for purpose of bringing about informal adjustment, held not complaint avoiding limitation statute (Public Utilities Act, § 60, and § 71, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 648).

Shipper's letter to railroad commission setting forth demand for refund of freight charges, amount claimed, and facts out of which claim arose, and closing with request that complaint be referred to carrier informally in hope that shipper and carrier might reach amicable settlement through an informal adjustment, held not to constitute complaint under Public Utilities Act, § 60 (St. 1915, p. 157), providing for filing of complaint with commission, so as to avoid defense of railroad that action was barred under section 71, subd. b (St. 1915, p. 165, as amended by St. 1925, p. 648), requiring complaints to be filed with commission within two years, where the commission declined to take up the matter with the carrier but returned the papers.

4. Carriers 🔑12(6½)—Reference in letter filed with railroad commission to avoidance of limitation did not make letter legal complaint within limitation statute (Public Utilities Act, § 60, and § 71, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 648).

Provision in letter written railroad commission setting forth nature of complaint against carrier for refund of freight charges, requesting that commission return papers after registering freight bills to prevent operation of statute of limitations, did not have effect of making the letter a legal complaint within Public Utilities Act, § 60 (St. 1915, p. 157), so as to avoid defense that complaint was not filed within time required under section 71, subd. b (St. 1915, p. 165, as amended by St. 1925, p. 648).

5. Carriers 🔑12(6½)—Practice followed before railroad commission of filing informal complaint against carriers preceding formal complaint did not avoid effect of limitation statute, where no legal complaint was filed within time (Public Utilities Act, §§ 53, 60, and § 71, subd. b, as amended by St. 1925, p. 648).

Where letter sent railroad commission complaining of railroad's overcharge in freight rates did not constitute formal complaint under Public Utilities Act, § 60 (St. 1915, p. 157), practice of filing informal complaint and thereafter filing formal complaint on same claim or demand, though followed before commission and acquiesced in by shippers and carriers, did not avoid effect of section 71, subd. b (St. 1915, p. 165, as amended by St. 1925, p. 648), requiring complaints to be filed within two years, notwithstanding section 53 (St. 1915, p. 153).

6. Public service commissions 🔑8—Rules of practice of railroad commission must conform to provisions of statute (Public Utilities Act, § 53).

Rules of railroad commission, under Public Utilities Act, § 53 (St. 1915, p. 153), empowering it to adopt rules of practice and procedure, must conform to provisions of act.

Application by the Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company for writ of certiorari to review an order of the Railroad Commission directing refund of freight charges. Order annulled.

Fred E. Pettit, Jr., and E. E. Bennett, both of Los Angeles, F. G. Athearn, of San Francisco, and Harry B. Ellison, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Carl I. Wheat, Reginald L. Vaughan, and Roderick B. Cassidy, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This proceeding was instituted by the petitioner to have reviewed and annulled by this court an order and decision of the respondent, the railroad commission of the state of California, authorizing and directing petitioner to refund to the Van Camp Sea Food Company, referred to herein as the complainant, a certain sum of money which the commission found was the difference between the freight charges actually paid and those legally collectable by petitioner on certain shipments of merchandise involved in said proceeding before said commission. One of the defenses interposed by petitioner in the proceeding before said commission was that "complainant's cause of action is barred by reason of that portion of section 71 of subparagraph (b) of the Public Utilities Act of the State of California (St. 1915, p. 165, as amended by St. 1925, p. 648) reading as follows: 'All complaints concerning unreasonable, excessive or discriminatory charges shall be filed with the Commission within two years from the time the cause of action accrues.'"

The complaint in said proceeding showed that the cause of action involved therein resulted from shipments of merchandise made by Van Camp Sea Food Company between April 13, 1923, and October 24, 1923, and, therefore that the causes of action accrued not later than the last-named date. The so-called formal complaint therein was filed with the commission on January 30, 1928, four years, three months, and six days after the date of the last of said shipments of merchandise. Notwithstanding this fact, the commission held that the filing with the commission of an "informal complaint covering said charges on the 21st day of September, 1925," tolled the statute of limitations, and entered its order referred to above against petitioner. Hence this proceeding in this court.

There is no dispute as to the date of the shipments on which it is claimed that an excess freight charge was made by the petitioner against the shipper, the Van Camp Sea Food Company. The record discloses the fact that a letter written on the letterhead of the Carmichael Traffic Corporation, and signed by said corporation, was, on the 21st day of September, 1925, received by the commission. On receipt of this letter by the commission the same was filed or registered by the commission and the number I. C. 33274 assigned to it. The letters "I. C." stand for and mean "informal complaint." It does not appear that any action was taken by the commission upon this so-called informal complaint except to acknowledge its receipt and to return to the writer thereof certain freight bills which had been inclosed with the letter written to the commission. No notice of the filing of said letter, or informal complaint, was ever given to the petitioner, and no hearing was ever had on said so-called informal complaint. This "informal complaint" sets forth the nature of the demand of the complainant, the Van Camp Sea Food Company, against petitioner, the amount thereof, and the facts out of which it arose. It closed with the request that the commission "refer our complaint to the carrier informally for an expression of their attitude towards an informal adjustment, returning papers to us after registering the freight bills, to prevent operation of the statute of limitations, in order that we may take the matter up with them direct." The sending of this letter, and its receipt and assignment to it of a number by the commission as an informal complaint were in accordance with a practice followed by the commission for many years, and which appears to have been acquiesced in both by shippers and carriers in proceedings before said commission. The purpose of this procedure was to stop the running of the statute of limitations by the filing of the informal complaint, and thus permit the shipper and the carrier to arrive at an amicable settlement of their controversy, subject to the approval of the commission, without the necessity of a hearing before the commission, or, as stated in a letter of September 21, 1925, to arrive at an "informal adjustment" of their differences. Just what efforts were made by the parties interested in the present proceeding, after the filing of said "informal complaint," to arrive at an amicable adjustment of the claim of the Van Camp Company, is not disclosed by the record. The next action taken before the commission by either of said parties was the filing by the Van Camp Company of a so-called formal complaint, in which it asked that "defendant may be required to answer all charges herein; that after due hearing and investigation an order be made commanding said defendant to pay to complainant, by way of reparation for the unlawful charges hereinbefore alleged, the sum of $743.67," etc. Upon the filing of this complaint the commission caused a copy thereof to be served upon the carrier, the petitioner herein, and in other respects complied with the requirement of the Public Utilities Act providing the procedure to be followed in such proceedings. This procedure is to be found set forth in section 60 of said act (St. 1915, p. 158), and is as follows: "Upon the filing of a complaint, the Commission shall cause a copy thereof to be served upon the corporation or person complained of. Service in all hearings, investigations and proceedings pending before the Commission may be made upon any person upon whom a summons may be served in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state, and may be made personally or by mailing in a sealed envelope, registered, with postage prepaid. The Commission shall fix the time when and place where a hearing will be had upon the complaint and shall serve notice thereof, not less than ten days before the time set for such hearing, unless the Commission shall find that public necessity requires that such hearing be held at an earlier date."

By section 60 of said act (St. 1915, p. 157) it is also provided that: "Complaint may be made * * * by any corporation or person, * * * by petition or complaint in writing, setting forth any act or thing done or omitted to be done by any public utility including any rule, regulation or charge heretofore established or fixed by or for any public utility, in violation, or claimed to be in violation, of any provision of law or of any order or rule of the Commission." Then follows the provision already quoted, requiring the commission to give notice to the "corporation or person complained of," after which the commission shall fix the time and place of a hearing on said complaint and shall serve notice thereof not less than ten days before the date of hearing. It is admitted that none of these steps was taken by the commission upon the filing of the letter of September 21, 1925. However, after the filing of the complaint on January 30, 1928, referred to as a formal complaint, the same was served on the corporation complained of, and in all other respects the provisions of section 60 of the act, above quoted, were complied with.

[1-4] The question, therefore, presented for decision is whether the letter of the Carmichael Traffic Association, received by the commission on the 21st day of September, 1925, was a valid and legal complaint within the provisions of the Public Utilities Act of this state. No question is made as to the authority of the Carmichael Traffic Association to write said letter in behalf of the Van Camp Company. It may not comply in form with the rules of the commission, but these may be waived. Ghriest v. Railroad Commission, 170 Cal. 63, 148 P. 195. It was in writing, as provided by section 60 of said act. We have already referred to the nature of its contents, including the prayer or request made upon the commission regarding the action which the sender thereof desired to be taken by the commission in response to the letter. We may assume that it stated the necessary facts required to be alleged in a complaint of this nature. If it were a legal complaint under said act, it was the duty of the commission to serve a copy upon the carrier, the petitioner herein, to fix a time and place for a hearing thereon and to give the parties notice of said hearing. This was not done by the commission, but its failure to do so would not prejudice the rights of the complainant. The commission, however, took no steps to hold a hearing on the so-called informal complaint, for the reason, no doubt, as it appeared to the commission, and as it appears to us, that the letter was not written for any such purpose, but it was written for the purpose, as stated therein, that the complainant might secure an informal adjustment of its claim. This it desired to accomplish either by the commission informally obtaining an expression from the carrier as to its attitude towards an informal adjustment, or, in case the commission did not care to act in the matter, to return the papers to the complainant "in order that we may take the matter up with them (the carrier) direct." It is not claimed that there is anything in the Public Utilities Act providing for an informal adjustment of claims of this nature, nor is it contended that there was any legal requirement on the part of the commission to act in such a proceeding in any manner. It seems that the commission declined to accede to the request of the writer of the letter to take the matter up with the carrier, but returned the papers as requested. It probably never occurred to the commission to treat said letter as a complaint, or else no doubt it would have followed the provisions of the statute and would have taken steps to hold a hearing thereon. We think that there can be no question as to the correctness of the conclusion reached by the commission in this regard. The letter on its face showed that it was not written for the purpose of having it serve as a complaint upon which a hearing might thereafter be held for the purpose of determining the merits of the complainant's claim, but in the hope that the shipper and the carrier might reach an amicable settlement of the controversy through an "informal adjustment" of their differences. This conclusion is fortified by the practice or custom, which appears to have been acceded to by the commission, of filing what has been referred to as an "informal complaint," after which the shipper and carrier would attempt to adjust their differences, and if this failed, a "formal complaint" would then be filed, under which a hearing would be held for the purpose of determining the merits of the claim of the shipper. Under this practice the "informal complaint" is not filed for any purpose contemplated by the statute. It cannot, therefore, have any legal effect as to the rights of the parties under the Public Utilities Act. So, in the proceeding now before us, the letter of September 21, 1925, asked for no relief in the power of the commission to grant. It cannot, therefore, be considered or held to be a complaint as contemplated by the terms of said act. We have not overlooked the following statement in said letter in reference to the statute of limitations: "Returning papers to us after registering the freight bills, to prevent operation of the statute of limitations." We confess we are in doubt as to the meaning or purpose of this statement except it be that, in the opinion of the writer of said letter, the sending thereof to the commission would stop the running of the statute. If such was his opinion, we think he was in error, as the letter without this reference to the statute of limitations was not a legal complaint as contemplated by the State Utilities Act, the mere statement of the opinion of the writer thereof that it might have such effect, and was written and filed with the commission for that purpose, would not change its legal effect.

We have but to look at the result of following such a practice to see how it circumvents the provisions of the act limiting the filing of a complaint to two years after the cause of action accrued. Under the practice followed by the complainant, a shipper, having a claim for excessive freight charges against a carrier, just prior to the date his claim would be barred by the statute of limitations, writes a letter like that written by the Carmichael Traffic Corporation to the commission, or files an informal complaint with the commission. No steps are taken to hold a hearing before the commission on this letter or informal complaint, and none has been asked for or contemplated by the terms of the letter or the informal complaint. No notice is given of the writing of such letter or the filing of said informal complaint to the shipper. Two years thereafter, and it might just as well be five or ten years thereafter, the shipper files a so-called formal complaint, setting up the facts upon which he bases his claim, and asks for a hearing thereon to determine the question on its merits. Under the contention made by respondent herein the plea of the statute of limitations would be unavailing to the carrier for the reason that the shipper, before the tolling of the statute, had written this letter or filed this so-called informal complaint with the commission, of which the carrier never had any notice or knowledge. Surely such a practice would be against both the spirit and the letter of the act which bars proceedings before the commission two years after the action accrues.

[5, 6] The fact that the practice of filing an informal complaint and thereafter filing a formal complaint upon the same claim or demand has for some considerable time been followed before the commission and acquiesced in by both shippers and carriers cannot affect the result of this proceeding. It cannot find sanction in the statute, and for that reason it cannot be upheld in a legal proceeding. It may be true that a larger number of claims may be handled in this manner by the commission with but little expense, labor, or trouble, and that in the past this practice has been followed in many cases without objection from the parties thereto, but it does not follow that in those proceedings where an objection is made, the party objecting is not entitled to the legal rights afforded him by the act. We are loath to make any ruling which will interfere with the prompt and efficient dispatch of the large and increasing number of matters coming before the commission for its consideration and determination. We appreciate the heavy burden that this important branch of our state government is being called upon to bear, and the necessity for it to adopt a procedure that will enable it to expeditiously handle and dispose of the large volume of business demanding its attention. Nevertheless, the Constitution of the state and the statutes passed in accordance therewith are the measure of its power, and the procedure followed by the commission must conform to the constitutional and statutory requirements. If the present law is not feasible nor practical, and a longer period than two years should be provided by statute, after the accrual of a cause of action, in which the parties might endeavor to arrive at an informal adjustment of their differences, then resort should be had to the Legislature for the purpose of amending the statute in that respect. Neither the commission nor the courts can render this relief. While the commission, under section 53 of the act (St. 1915, p. 153), has power to adopt rules of practice and procedure, such rules must conform to, and not be in conflict with, the provisions of said act. We think therefore that the commission did not regularly pursue its authority in said proceeding when it made its order under the circumstances related herein, directing petitioner to refund to the Van Camp Sea Food Company the amount of said excess charges upon a complaint which was filed over four years after the cause of action alleged therein had accrued.

Said order for that reason is therefore annulled.

MAXWELL HARDWARE CO. v. FOSTER et al. (S. F. 12783.)★

Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 29, 1929.

1. Mechanics' liens ⚷61—Realty is not subject to lien for materials used in construction of building without owner's knowledge (Code Civ. Proc. § 1192).

In absence of evidence that contractor was authorized by owner of realty to construct building thereon or purchase materials therefor, or that owner had any knowledge that it was being constructed, realty is not subject to lien for materials under Code Civ. Proc. § 1192.

2. New trial ⚷99—Denial of new trial for newly discovered evidence is largely in trial judge's discretion.

Denial of motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence rests largely in the discretion of the trial judge.

3. New trial ⚷103—Denial of new trial for newly discovered evidence of lease, as to which lessee did not testify, held not abuse of discretion.

Where building contractor, who was witness for plaintiff in trial of action to foreclose materialman's lien, did not testify that he had lease contemplating making of improvements on demised premises by him, Supreme Court cannot hold that trial court abused his discretion in denying plaintiff's motion for new trial on ground of newly discovered evidence of such lease.

★Rehearing denied.

4. Appeal and error ⚷1041(2) — Refusal of leave to amend complaint held not prejudicial error, in absence of sufficient evidence to support judgment for plaintiff.

Where evidence was insufficient to support judgment for plaintiff establishing materialman's lien, plaintiff was not prejudiced by court's refusal to permit filing of amended complaint supplying material facts lacking in original complaint.

5. Appeal and error ⚷1033(7)—Plaintiff appealing from judgment denying foreclosure of materialman's lien cannot complain of personal judgment against contractor.

Plaintiff appealing from judgment denying foreclosure of materialman's lien cannot complain of personal judgment against contractor for value of materials furnished him on ground that no process was served on him; plaintiff not being aggrieved party.

6. Appeal and error ⚷151(5)—Only aggrieved party can appeal from judgment, unless amount thereof is less than that demanded.

An appeal from a judgment can be taken only by an aggrieved party thereto, not by party in whose favor it was rendered, unless amount thereof is less than that demanded.

Preston, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by the Maxwell Hardware Company against E. H. Foster and others. From a judgment for defendant E. Kates, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; PRESTON, J., dissenting.

L. L. Steele, of Oakland, for appellant.

C. A. Odell, of Richmond, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. [1] Action for the foreclosure of a materialman's lien for building materials furnished defendant Foster in the construction of a building upon real property belonging to the defendant Kates. The court gave judgment in favor of defendant Kates. The plaintiff has appealed. The evidence fails to show that Foster had any authority from Kates to purchase said materials, or to construct said building, or that Kates had any knowledge that the building was being constructed. Without evidence showing that defendant Kates had knowledge of the construction of said building, the real property owned by him and upon which said building was constructed would not be subject to a lien for materials used in its construction. Code Civ. Proc. § 1192. The judgment, therefore, denying plaintiff a lien upon the property of the defendant Kates was properly entered.

[2, 3] After judgment plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, and among the grounds upon which said motion was based was that of newly discovered evidence. The court denied said motion. That the action of the trial court in denying a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is a matter largely in the discretion of the trial judge is so well settled in this state that a citation of authority upon the subject is unnecessary. At the hearing of the motion for a new trial the plaintiff presented an affidavit to the effect that Foster had, at the time the materials were furnished him, a lease upon the real property on which the building was constructed, and that said lease provided for, or at least contemplated, the making of improvements thereon by Foster. Under these conditions the plaintiff contends that Kates, the owner of the property, was charged with constructive notice of the making of said improvements. Foster was a witness at the trial of this action on behalf of the plaintiff. He testified to the existence of no such lease, and the trial court may well have concluded that the plaintiff failed to exercise proper diligence in eliciting evidence from Foster regarding the existence of said lease, at the time Foster was being examined by plaintiff at the trial of this action. Under these circumstances we are not warranted in holding that the trial court abused its discretion in denying said motion.

[4] Another ground upon which the plaintiff based its motion for a new trial was the action of the court in denying its application to amend its complaint. The original complaint was fatally defective in a number of material respects. After the submission of the case to the court, but before decision, the plaintiff presented to the court, without notice to the defendant, an amended complaint and asked leave to file the same. This request the trial court denied. The amended complaint supplied the material facts lacking in the original complaint. Assuming that the court should have permitted the filing of said amended complaint under the conditions under which it was presented, it would not have availed anything to the plaintiff in view of the state of the evidence which we have before referred to. As the evidence was insufficient to support a judgment in favor of the plaintiff establishing his lien, plaintiff was not prejudiced by the action of the trial court in refusing to permit the filing of said proposed amended complaint.

[5, 6] While the court gave judgment denying plaintiff the right to foreclose its lien against the defendant Kates' property, it did render a personal judgment against the defendant Foster for the value of the materials furnished the latter. The plaintiff now claims that this judgment is void for the reason that no process was ever served upon said defendant Foster. The judgment, however, was in favor of the plaintiff, and even if the same were void, that fact cannot be taken advantage of on an appeal therefrom by the plaintiff in whose favor the judgment was rendered. An appeal from a judgment can only be taken by an aggrieved party thereto, and the plaintiff herein does not sustain that relation to said judgment. A party cannot appeal from a judgment in his favor. Estate of Funkenstein, 170 Cal. 594, 150 P. 987; United Railroads v. Colgan, 153 Cal. 53, 94 P. 245. This is the general rule. There may be exceptions to this rule, but the present appeal does not come within any of such exceptions. A plaintiff may appeal from a judgment in his favor, when the amount of said judgment is less than the amount demanded and to which the plaintiff considered himself entitled. But in such a case the appeal is not from that part of the judgment in plaintiff's favor, but is from the provisions of the judgment denying him the full relief demanded. In the present action on this appeal the plaintiff seeks to object to any judgment in its favor and against the defendant Foster.

The judgment is affirmed.

PRESTON, J. I dissent. The amount involved in this cause is small. Errors of judgment were perhaps made by counsel for plaintiff upon the trial, but rules of law should, if possible, be applied to promote justice. Here, in my opinion, justice has been denied, although it could have been granted without violence to any rule of law.

The majority opinion is predicated upon the absence of pleading and proof that the owner of the real property knew that defendant was erecting a building thereon. An examination of the record shows that defendant's counsel did make the point that the above mentioned pleading and proof was not present, but the court below several times expressly stated that this was not necessary, amplifying it by the further statement that, unless the owner posted the notice required by statute, he would be held liable for the material that entered into the construction of the building. It was not pleaded by the defendant, nor contended by him, that he did not have full knowledge of the erection of this building, nor did he plead or claim that he had not authorized its erection. The court below apparently ordered the findings in favor of defendant upon the ground that the complaint showed that there was no agreed price for the material, and that there was a large amount of material included in the claim of lien which did not enter into the construction of the building. However, when the findings were made up, all the material allegations of the complaint, including the regularity of the claim of lien, were found to be true, said findings covering substantially all the allegations in the first seven paragraphs of the complaint—but the court added a final finding which read as follows: "That at the time defendant E. H. Foster purchased and ordered the materials described in plaintiff's complaint he had no authority from E. Kates to purchase or order the materials described in the complaint or any other material for or in behalf of said Kates and at the time said materials were ordered and purchased as aforesaid the said E. H. Foster was not acting by the authority of or under the direction of the defendant E. Kates either as contractor or otherwise."

The materiality of the above mentioned omitted allegations and proof, theretofore declared unnecessary by the court, became the sole ground for the judgment, whereupon plaintiff made a motion for a new trial and supported it by an affidavit which set up the fact that he had offered to file an amended complaint to cover this defect, and a copy of said complaint was made an exhibit to the affidavit. Further, he showed and made an exhibit to said affidavit, a lease between the landowner and the tenant which expressly authorized the tenant to cause the building in question to be erected, setting forth therein, also, copies of documents which showed that certain of the material that entered into said building was receipted for by the owner and transportation charges thereon were paid by him. Against this showing of the plaintiff, defendant offered absolutely nothing. There was, therefore, no room whatever for the exercise of discretion by the trial court in denying the motion for new trial. This is doubly true because of the attitude of the court himself as to the materiality of this showing during the trial of the cause. Plaintiff, without substantial fault on its part, has suffered because of the trial court's change of attitude, and has never had an opportunity to introduce the uncontradicted proof within its possession which would remove the ground upon which the court predicated its judgment.

That the judgment should be reversed is, to my mind, too clear for controversy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Isadore F. Grigsby against H. C. Davey and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed in part and in part reversed with directions.

Thomas, Beedy, Presley & Paramore, of San Francisco, and Benjamin C. Jones, of Lakeport, for appellants.

Tum Suden & Tum Suden, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Plaintiff is the owner of the south 10 acres of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 11, township 11 north, range 8 west, Mount Diablo base and meridian. The defendant Camp Calso Company is the owner of the north 30 acres of said quarter section above described, and also the north 35 acres of the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 10, said township and range. Said 35 acres in section 10 join on the east said 30 acres in section 11. All of said lands are situated in Lake county. The other defendants are officers of the defendant Camp Calso Company. Houten creek is a small perennial rivulet flowing between 15 and 18 miner's inches of water, having its source in large springs on the lands belonging to the Camp Calso Company and flows through said 30-acre tract belonging to said defendant and then into and across plaintiff's said land. After leaving plaintiff's land it makes an abrupt turn to the south and flows into Kelsey creek. The defendant company some time prior to the commencement of this action constructed a dam in the bed or channel of said creek at a point some distance above the land of the plaintiff where said stream enters plaintiff's said land, and by means of said dam and a two-inch pipe line connected therewith diverted a portion of the waters of said stream from their natural channel and conveyed the same in a westerly direction for use upon lands belonging to said defendant corporation. A portion of the land to which said water was conveyed by said defendant was included within the boundaries of said 30-acre tract, and a portion thereof was within said 35-acre tract.

Plaintiff brought this action to restrain defendants from maintaining said dam in said stream and from diverting any of the waters of said stream from its natural channel for use upon said lands of the defendants. The trial court in its decree adjudged that the lands of the defendant corporation were nonriparian to Houten creek, and that defendants were not entitled to divert any of the waters of said stream for use upon any of said land belonging to said defendants and situated in said sections 10 and 11. We will assume that the judgment is supported by the findings, and will direct our attention to the findings with the view of ascertaining whether the evidence is sufficient to support the judgment. There is no question but that the lands of plaintiff are riparian to Houten creek and that plaintiff as the owner thereof is entitled to all rights and privileges which an owner of riparian lands may possess and enjoy in a stream to which his lands are riparian. We will therefore proceed to the consideration of the evidence produced at the trial and which the court held was sufficient to establish that the lands of the defendant Camp Calso Company were not riparian to Houten creek.

[1] As to said 35 acres situated in section 10, the principal, if not the only, basis upon which the defendants make the contention that said tract or any part thereof is riparian to said stream, is that Houten creek had been diverted from its original channel some years previous to the trial of said action and that but for said diversion said stream after leaving plaintiff's land would flow in a westerly direction through said 35-acre tract. At present said stream, after entering plaintiff's land along its north boundary line and a short distance from the northeast corner thereof, runs in a generally southwesterly direction through the lands of plaintiff and leaves the same at the south boundary line and near the southwest corner thereof. Said stream while flowing in its present channel does not, therefore, enter said 35-acre tract, but after leaving plaintiff's land flows away and in an opposite direction from defendants' land situated in said 35-acre tract. There was some evidence to support defendants' claim that said stream originally flowed through said 35-acre tract in said section 10. The engineers employed by defendants testified that they found traces of an old bed of a stream leading from a point in the present stream before it leaves plaintiff's land, and extending in a westerly and a northwesterly direction through said 35-acre tract. There were also witnesses who for many years prior to the trial of said action were acquainted with the locality where the lands of the parties hereto are situated, and who testified that the waters from said stream ran across the county road, which county road is now and was at the time covered by the testimony of these witnesses located some distance west of the present channel of said stream, and only a short distance from said 35-acre tract, and that for the purpose of protecting said road said stream had been diverted from a westerly course, where said stream had been accustomed to flow, to a more southerly course, as it now flows or as it flowed at the time of the trial. It may well have been inferred if this were the only evidence before the court that a change had been made in the location of the channel of said stream, and that before said change had occurred said stream had run through said 35-acre tract. But there was evidence on behalf of plaintiff which undoubtedly negatived this claim of the defendants. We need only briefly refer to a portion of this evidence to show that upon the question as to the location of the original bed of the stream the evidence as a whole presents a substantial conflict. The witness Max Hoberg, who lived in the neighborhood of plaintiff's property, testified that he was acquainted with the location of the channel of Houten creek for over 40 years, and that said stream during the years he had known it ran in the same channel as it did at the time of the trial. He further testified that the water therefrom crossed the county road, but at a point some distance south and below where the defendants claimed that the old bed or channel of the creek was located, and far below said 35-acre tract. Another witness for the plaintiff was Rodney Smith. He also had been acquainted with the property for over 40 years. His father had owned the land lying to the south of plaintiff's land, and only separated therefrom by a 10-acre strip of land lying immediately south of plaintiff's land. He testified that when he was a small boy, so small that he was unable to assist his father, that Houten creek, at a point considerably east of the point where the defendants claim that the old abandoned channel of the creek began, ran almost due south through plaintiff's property and the intervening 10-acre tract upon the lands of his father; that during the winter the waters of the stream brought down driftwood upon his father's land, and for the purpose of keeping this driftwood from his land his father constructed a dam across Houten creek at the point just mentioned and diverted the water in a westerly direction so that from that time on it ran in its present channel. He further testified that the waters of said stream never ran any further west than the present channel except in time of high water. We might mention other evidence in the record to the same effect, but that already referred to is sufficient to warrant the implied finding of the court that the course and channel of Houten creek did not and never did lie through defendants' 35-acre tract. As already stated, the only basis upon which defendants can claim that said 35-acre tract, or any part thereof, was riparian to said creek, rested upon their ability to prove that the original channel of the stream ran through said tract. The finding of the trial court upon conflicting evidence was against this claim of defendants. This, we think, disposes of said 35-acre tract in so far as its riparian character is concerned.

[2] Coming now to the land of the defendants referred to as the 30-acre tract and situated in the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 11, we have an entirely different situation. As we have seen from the statement heretofore made, Houten creek for some considerable distance before it enters plaintiff's said land runs directly through said 30-acre tract in section 11. There is no evidence that the lands of the defendant through which said creek runs have ever been deprived of their original riparian character. There are undoubtedly portions of said 30-acre tract which are not riparian to said stream. In fact, there is a substantial showing in the record that much, if not all, of the land in said 30-acre tract upon which the defendants had conveyed water from said stream through the two-inch pipe line is not riparian to said stream. Had plaintiff confined her efforts in this action to restraining defendants from diverting the waters of said stream for use upon these portions of said 30-acre tract, she may have secured a judgment which would have been supported by the evidence. But she did not stop there. On the other hand, in her complaint she alleged that none of said 30-acre tract was riparian to said stream, and that the defendants were without any right to use the waters of said stream upon any part of said 30-acre tract. The findings and judgment followed her complaint, with the result that the present judgment was rendered whereby all of said 30-acre tract is adjudged to be nonriparian to said stream and the defendants are enjoined and restrained from using any of the waters thereof upon any of said land. This judgment is against the undisputed evidence in the case, and therefore cannot be upheld.

In her complaint plaintiff set up two certain judgments, one in action No. 2460 and the other in action No. 2586, and alleged that the judgment in action No. 2460 was a full and complete determination and adjudication of the water rights of the defendant Davey (one of the defendants in the present action and the predecessor in interest of the other of said defendants) and the plaintiff in this action. Plaintiff further alleged that by the judgment in action No. 2586 the said Davey was permanently enjoined and restrained from maintaining any dam in Houten creek above the lands of plaintiff for the purpose of diverting any of the waters therefrom for use upon lands belonging to said Davey. As to these allegations the findings of the trial court follow the complaint.

In our opinion neither of said judgments determined any of the issues involved in the present action. In the action No. 2460 the facts briefly related show that the defendant Davey, together with two associates, owned all of the land now owned by the parties to this action. Davey and associates sold to the plaintiff herein and a Mrs. Fields the land now owned by the plaintiff and the 10-acre tract immediately to the south of plaintiff's said land, and the plaintiff and Mrs. Fields owned and held the same as tenants in common. Thereafter Davey and associates instituted said action No. 2640, claiming that the plaintiff and Mrs. Fields had agreed to relinquish to him and his co-owners all water rights belonging to the land conveyed to them; that they refused to make or sign said relinquishment; that upon said refusal he had demanded a reconveyance to him and his associates of the land conveyed to plaintiff and Mrs. Fields and had tendered back to plaintiff and Mrs. Fields the consideration paid by them for said land. In said action Davey and his associates sought a decree compelling plaintiff and Mrs. Fields to reconvey to him and his associates the said land. The court denied the plaintiffs in said action any relief and held that the plaintiff herein and Mrs. Fields were the owners in fee simple of said land "together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging." It is apparent that this judgment does not purport to determine any issue involved in the present action. By the judgment in action No. 2640 the plaintiff herein and Mrs. Fields were confirmed in their ownership of the land purchased by them from Davey and associates, and their riparian rights to the waters of said stream as against Davey and his associates were also, we think, established by said decree. But said judgment went no further. It did not attempt to adjudicate the rights of the plaintiff with reference to the claims of the upper riparian proprietors on said stream. These upper riparian proprietors were Davey and his associates, the predecessors of the present defendants; but their rights as such upper riparian proprietors were not involved in action No. 2640, and the judgment rendered in said action did not in any way affect said rights.

The same conclusion must be reached in reference to the judgment in action No. 2586. At the time this action was commenced the defendant herein, H. C. Davey, had become the owner of the Smith property situated just south of the property purchased by the plaintiff and Mrs. Fields from Davey and his associates. In that action he claimed the right to maintain a dam in Houten creek above the point where the same enters the land of plaintiff, and by means of said dam and a ditch, constructed by Smith before he sold his land to Davey, to divert the waters from said creek and to convey the same across the land of the plaintiff herein and the 10-acre piece lying south thereof for use upon the land purchased by him from Smith. The court held that he had no such right. That action was entitled Davey v. Grigsby. From the judgment rendered therein Davey appealed, and the decision affirming the judgment is found reported in 51 Cal. App. 220, 196 P. 296. That action, however, did not in any way involve the right of Davey and his associates to use the waters of Houten creek upon lands owned by them in the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of said section 11. While the judgment in each of these actions was properly admissible in evidence as showing or tending to show the past transactions between the parties hereto, neither of them was a conclusive determination of any of the issues involved in the present action.

That portion of said judgment restraining defendants from diverting the waters of said stream and using the same upon said thirty-five acre tract in section 10 is affirmed. That portion of said judgment, based upon the finding that no part of said thirty acre tract in section 11 is riparian to said stream is reversed, with directions to the trial court to ascertain and determine upon the evidence already adduced, and upon such other evidence as said court may deem necessary for the decision of said issue, what portion of said thirty acre tract is riparian to said stream.

Rehearing Denied May 29, 1929.

1. Taxation 🔑314—Statute was substantially complied with where oath signed did not contain name of office, but was attached to certificate of election showing office (Pol. Code, § 904).

Where blank in form of oath for name of office was not filled in, but oath which assessor signed was preceded on same sheet of paper by certificate of election, showing that person signing oath had been elected to office of county assessor, there was substantial compliance with Pol. Code, § 904, relating to oaths.

2. Taxation 🔑549(4)—Tax assessor held not entitled to 6 per cent. commission on taxes collected by him on property classified by statute as real property (Pol. Code, §§ 3617, 3820, 4290).

Under Pol. Code, § 4290, providing that assessor is entitled to 6 per cent. commission on personal property tax collected by him as authorized by section 3820, assessor held not entitled to retain 6 per cent. of taxes collected by him on possession of, claim to, or right to possession of land, together with chattels real and leasehold interests in and to real property, together with all rights and privileges appertaining thereto and improvements thereon, which are classified by section 3617 as real estate, even though such taxes are collected in manner provided by section 3820.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Fred A. Treat, Judge.

Action by Ventura County against Jasper Barry and another to recover money retained as commissions on the collection of taxes. From judgments for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Judgment as to one cause of action affirmed, and judgments as to the other causes of action reversed.

J. C. Hollingsworth, Dist. Atty., Don. R. Holt, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., and Blackstock & Rogers, all of Ventura, for appellant.

Clarke & Bowker, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the county of Ventura from a judgment sustaining demurrers without leave to amend to the first and second causes of action set forth in the county's complaint, and from a judgment in favor of respondent Barry as to the third cause of action set forth in the county's complaint. Separate appeals were taken from these judgments, but upon stipulation they were consolidated in this court.

[1] The first cause of action is based upon the theory that respondent Barry wholly failed, refused, and neglected to take his oath of office, as prescribed by section 904, Political Code. The form of oath prescribed by said section leaves a blank line for the insertion of the name of the office. Respondent Barry signed and filed an oath, which was in the exact language of the form prescribed by section 904 of the Political Code, but the blank in the form was not filled in. The oath, however, is preceded on the same sheet of paper by the certificate of election, signed by the county clerk, from which it appears that the person signing the oath had been elected to the office of county assessor. We are of the opinion that there was a substantial compliance with the statute under the rulings in the cases of State of Minnesota ex rel. Edward T. Young v. Ladeen, 104 Minn. 252, 116 N. W. 486, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1058; People ex rel. Finigan v. Perkins, 85 Cal. 509, 514, 26 P. 245. We think the demurrer to the first cause of action was properly sustained.

The second cause of action was based upon the theory that the respondent, while acting as assessor of the county of Ventura, collected and received certain sums of money as taxes in the said county; that the sums of money so received and collected by the respondent were collected and received by him as taxes on real property situated in the county of Ventura, and consisting entirely of the possession of, the claim to, or right to the possession of land, together with chattels real and leasehold interest in and to real property, together with all rights and privileges appertaining thereto, and improvements thereon, as defined in section 3617 of the Political Code of the state of California, and that the said taxes so collected and received were collected and received by the said Jasper Barry under and by virtue of section 3820 of the Political Code of this state. It is further alleged that the amount of taxes so collected amounted to $990,736.76 from which the respondent deducted 6 per cent. thereof amounting to $57,792.99, which he failed to pay over and deliver to the county treasurer of the county of Ventura, and further alleging that demand was made of respondent for the said sum of $57,792.99, but that the respondent failed to pay the same over to the county, etc.

The issues raised here are twofold: (1) Whether taxes upon "possession of, claim to or right to the possession of land, together with chattels real and leasehold interests in and to real property, together with all rights and privileges appertaining thereto and improvements thereon," are taxes upon real estate to be assessed, levied, and collected in the same manner as taxes upon other real estate mentioned in section 3617, Political Code, or whether such taxes are to be collected under sections 3820, 3821, and 3822, Political Code; (2) if such taxes are collectible under the latter sections, whether they lose their identity as taxes upon real estate as defined by section

3617, Political Code, and become subject to 6 per cent. compensation for the assessor under the provisions of section 4290, Political Code, allowing him 6 per cent. of "all personal property taxes."

It is insisted by respondents that the questions are concluded in this state by the case of Mohawk Oil Co. v. Hopkins, 196 Cal. 148, 236 P. 133. In that case an injunction was sought by the plaintiff, a corporation, owner and holder of certain oil and gas leases, to prevent the assessor from assessing and collecting taxes upon such interests under the provisions of section 3820 et seq. The claim was that such possessory rights and leasehold interests were real property, and that whatever taxes were to be imposed upon them should be assessed, levied, and collected in the same manner as taxes upon other real estate. It was alleged that the defendant assessor was claiming the right to demand and collect county taxes upon the plaintiff's possessory rights on oil and gas leases upon said lands, and to have the same paid in conformity with section 3820 of the Political Code and in default of the payment, to have the possessory and leasehold rights seized and sold under the provisions of sections 3821 and 3822 of the said Code. A general demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and upon appeal it was held that the nature and character of the property generally denominated as an oil and gas lease is such that it must be subjected to the method of assessment and collection of taxes as provided by section 3820, Political Code.

The court used the following language: "The present contention of the plaintiff and appellant herein is that since possessory rights and leasehold interests in lands are real estate under section 3617 of the Political Code as interpreted in the foregoing cases, no reason exists for the application to these forms of real estate of a different principle and method of assessment and of the payment of taxes than that which under the general laws relating to taxation of real property is provided for the assessment and collection of the taxes upon the land out of which these lesser interests therein have been carved. This contention was answered in part by this court in the case of Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara [155 Cal. 140, 99 P. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211] supra, wherein Mr. Justice Shaw pointed out certain essential differences between possessory rights under leases for the extraction of oil and like substances from the land and ordinary possessory interests under leases for the purpose of usufructuary production which import to the former a character resembling that of a servitude or chattel real. There are yet other differences easily to be discerned. The operations of lessees under oil leases contemplate the erection of derricks and other structures of an impermanent character and the sinking of deep wells at large expense, but which derive their main value not from the expenditure necessary to their creation but from the oil content of the land into which they penetrate. If oil or other mineral substance or essence is found and extracted, these immediately become personal property upon their severance from the soil, the value of which is to be realized only by their removal from the place of their extraction to near or distant markets."

The case proceeds upon the theory that oil leases are essentially different from ordinary agricultural leases with reference to the incidents to be considered by the assessor and it decides only that a tax upon oil leases is collectible under section 3820 et seq. of the Political Code.

The pleading of the second count in the instant case does not mention oil leases, but refers to "possession of, claim to, or right to possession of land, together with chattels real and leasehold interest in and to real property." We think, therefore, it was not subject to demurrer under the rule of the Mohawk Oil Case and other cases involving oil leases, even though we were to concede, which we do not, that taxes collected upon such leases are subject to the 6 per cent. charge of the assessor.

However, the record indicates a disposition on the part of counsel for all parties to have the case decided upon its merits, and the omission to plead that the possessory rights in land involved here were oil leases is unimportant, because, in the offer of proof under the third count, it is admitted that the leases were oil leases, and whether they were oil or agricultural leases becomes immaterial, in view of our conclusion as to the law of this case.

The third cause of action was to quiet title to personal property. It was alleged that the county was the owner and entitled to the possession of that certain personal property consisting of the said sum of $57,792.99 on deposit in the defendant bank, and that the respondent Barry claimed some right, estate, or interest in and to said sum of money adverse to the county, and it was further alleged that the claim of Barry was without right, etc. The general demurrer interposed to this cause of action was overruled. An answer was filed, in which, among other defenses, Barry claimed the money in controversy as representing 6 per cent. of the personal property tax collected by him as such assessor, as authorized by section 3820, Political Code.

Upon the trial the county, in support of the allegations contained in its third cause of action, offered to prove the matters pleaded in its first and second causes of action. The offer was in the language of the pleading, and to the effect that the defendant had collected certain moneys on personal and real property, and that a specified portion of it was collected upon possessory rights and leasehold interests in land, under section 3820, Political Code. The attorneys, in stipulating as to what plaintiff's proof would show, agreed that the taxes in dispute are taxes on leasehold interests in and to real property, consisting of oil leases or leases in oil-producing territory of the county. The offer of proof was objected to on the ground that it showed that the taxes were all collected under and by virtue of section 3820 of the Political Code. It was conceded that the facts offered could be proved, but it was objected that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

But it is the contention of appellant that, even though it be admitted that the tax was properly collected under the provisions of section 3820 et seq. by the procedure employed for the collection of taxes upon personal property, nevertheless, the compensation of 6 per cent. allowed to the assessor does not apply to such taxes, which are assessed and collected against property which is classified by section 3617, Political Code, as real property. This last point is a novel one in this state. The Mohawk Oil Case merely decides that taxes upon oil leases may be collected under the provisions of section 3820, Political Code, which reads: "The assessor must collect the taxes on all property when, in his opinion, said taxes are not a lien upon real property sufficient to secure the payment of the taxes." The succeeding sections provide for seizure and sale in cases covered by section 3820.

But let us return to a consideration of section 3617, Political Code, relied upon by appellant. It is contained in chapter 2, part 3, title 9, on Revenue. Chapter 2 deals with definitions, and section 3617 therein declares that real estate includes: "The possession of, claim to, ownership of, or right to the possession of land," etc. Clearly, the case pleaded and the offer of proof are within the above definition of real estate. We then turn to section 4290, Political Code, for the law with reference to the compensation of the assessor, at the time the collections in question were made. We find: The salaries and fees provided in this title shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers named in this title either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies and assistants. * * *"

"Assessor. Provided and except, that the assessor shall be entitled to receive and retain for his own use, unless in this title otherwise provided, six per cent. on personal property tax collected by him, as authorized by section 3820. * * *"

Appellant's position is well stated in its own language, as follows: "If a tax on leasehold interests and possessory rights as defined in section 3617 of the Political Code is a personal property tax as defined in section 4290 of the Political Code, then we concede that respondent Barry is entitled to receive and retain 6 per cent. of said taxes so collected by him. Upon the other hand, if the definitions as set forth in section 3617 of the Political Code are to be followed and adhered to in the decision of this question, then it must be held that a tax on leasehold interests and possessory rights is a tax on real estate as defined by section 3617 of the Political Code, and that, regardless of the manner or method in which a tax on leasehold interests or possessory rights is collected, an assessor making this collection would not be entitled to receive and retain for his own use 6 per cent. thereof, for the reason that he is collecting a tax on real estate and not on personal property."

In the case of People v. Smith, 123 Cal. 70, 55 P. 765, it is said: "Section 3617 of the Political Code defines the terms used in the assessment of property for the purposes of taxation, and these definitions must control in matters relating to taxation, whether they conform to the definitions used in the law for other purposes or not." And again, in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Modesto Irr. Co., 149 Cal. 662, 87 P. 190, 9 Ann. Cas. 1190, it was said: "Moreover, we think that, for the purpose of the revenue to the district, the definition of real property and personal property in the general revenue and taxation laws of the state, as found in the Political Code, must prevail."

In the case of San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 18, 179 P. 393, it was said: "If, then, the Legislature had not provided any mode for the assessment of leasehold estates, it might well be said, as was said in the former opinion, that such an estate is not 'property for the purposes of taxation,' under our fiscal laws. But there does not appear to be any such deficiency in our revenue laws. Section 3617 of the Political Code declares that the term 'property' includes 'all matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership,' and that the term 'real estate' includes 'the possession of, claim to, ownership of, or right to the possession of land.' A leasehold estate carries a right to the possession of the land leased. Civ. Code, § 819. It is, therefore, real property within the above definition. Other sections of the Political Code provide for the listing of real property, the description and valuation thereof, and contain a complete scheme for the assessment of the property, and the levy and collection of the taxes. This scheme is as readily adaptable to an estate for years as to a freehold estate."

[2] We conclude that section 3820, Political Code, while providing a special method and manner for the collection of the tax upon all property, when in the opinion of the assessor said tax is not a lien upon real property, does not extend, either expressly or impliedly, to the assessor, the right to receive and retain 6 per cent. of the taxes collected by him upon such property as has been classified by section 3617 as real estate. It follows that the judgment for defendant Barry upon the third cause of action, in which the county sought to quiet its title to the money in question was erroneous, as was also the judgment sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend upon the second cause of action. Both causes of action involve the same legal principles. Such judgments are reversed.

The judgment in favor of defendants, upon plaintiff's alleged first cause of action, is affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; CURTIS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.

PRESTON, J. I dissent from the conclusion announced above because I cannot accept the construction given by the court to that portion of section 4290 of the Political Code, which refers to compensation of county assessors for extra work done by them under section 3820 of the Political Code, which said work is not within their general duties as defined by section 4125 of the Political Code. The paragraph in question reads: "Provided and except, that the assessor shall be entitled to receive and retain for his own use, unless in this title otherwise provided, six per cent. on personal property tax collected by him, as authorized by section three thousand eight hundred twenty. * * *"

Pol. Code, § 3820, reads: "The assessor must collect the taxes on all property when, in his opinion, said taxes are not a lien upon real property sufficient to secure the payment of the taxes. The taxes on all assessments of possession of, claim to, or right to the possession of land and the taxes on taxable improvements located upon land exempt from taxation, shall be immediately due and payable upon assessment and shall be collected by the assessor as provided in part III, title IX, chapter VIII of this Code. * * *"

It is held in the majority opinion that the words "personal property," as found in said first quoted section, must be denied their ordinary meaning and be limited by the special provisions found in section 3617 of the Political Code, relating to taxation, which said section in this connection reads: "Definitions. Whenever the terms mentioned in this section are employed in this act, they are employed in the senses hereafter affixed to them: * * * The term 'real estate' includes: 1. The possession of, claim to, ownership of, or right to the possession of land. * * *"

In other words, the holding is that oil leases, and all such property as possession of, claim to, or right to the possession of land, shall not be classified as personal property under section 4290. But at the outset we are met with the fact that, under said section 3820, the assessor must assess and collect taxes upon this species of property as though it were personal property. It is only upon the theory that it is in legal effect personal property that the summary method of assessment and collection of taxes thereon may be lawfully applied. This is the undeniable construction of the opinion of this court in the case of Mohawk Oil Co. v. Hopkins, 196 Cal. 148, 236 P. 133.

The construction given said section 3820 in the Mohawk Oil Case and the construction here given it by our court cannot be harmonized. It was because oil leases partook of the nature of personalty rather than realty that they were classified as personalty and this classification justified under the Constitution, article 4, § 25, which prohibits special laws for the assessment or collection of taxes. If this class of property is not personal property, then so much of said section as provides for the assessment and collection of taxes upon it is void under said provision of the Constitution. It is thus seen that there is a lack of harmony between sections 3617 and 3820.

The truth is that this kind of property is classified as personal property in certain instances, even in the tax laws of the states themselves. Observe article 13, § 9a, of the Constitution, adopted in 1924, which reads: "The taxes levied upon personal property for any current tax year where the same is not secured by real estate shall be based upon the tax rate levied upon real property for the preceding tax year. Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the equalization each year of the assessment on personal property in the manner now or hereafter provided by law." If these words "personal property" do not include all species mentioned in said section 3820, then what rate of taxation shall the assessor apply to oil lease properties?

Again, take section 3824 of the Political Code, which provides for a rebate where excess taxes have been collected, and the following language is found; "Such warrant shall state that it is for refund of excess county tax on unsecured personal property collected by the county assessor and shall state the year for which the tax was collected and the number of the assessment." If unsecured personal property does not include oil leases, then no provision for a refund has been made for an overpayment of tax on this species of property and again the Constitution is violated.

But from another angle the matter seems clear. The assessor under his general duties assesses, but does not collect, taxes. For pursuing and obtaining taxes, where unsecured, the law intended to give him compensation. This statute allowing it is in another part and title of the Political Code from the one on taxation. Is it reasonable to suppose, therefore, that the Legislature meant to give him compensation for one duty performed under section 3820 and to deny him compensation for another duty performed thereunder by the selfsame process and in the selfsame manner? A leasehold estate is personal property. Jeffers v. Easton, Eldridge & Co., 113 Cal. 345, 45 P. 680; Summerville v. Stockton Milling Co., 142 Cal. 529, 76 P. 243; Guy v. Brennen, 60 Cal. App. 452, 213 P. 265. Why, then, may not these words in section 4290 be allowed their ordinary significance, or, if this may not be done, why may not the phrases "personal property tax," "authorized by section 3820," be held to cover any tax collected under said section, as all such taxes are in fact collected in the same manner and by the same process as taxes upon personal property?

To my mind, section 4290 of the Political Code is in no way restricted by section 3617 thereof. Moreover, the plain intent of the Legislature was to give the assessor 6 per cent. of all taxes collected by him pursuant to said section 3820. The result of this decision, if it is allowed to stand, is that many of the county assessors of the state will be required to perform difficult and exacting services without compensation. Lack of incentive will cause a loss of revenue. It is unfortunate if an unusual situation in one county causes a mistaken interpretation of a statute of general application.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

LANGDON, J. This matter comes before us upon a petition for a writ of supersedeas to restrain the enforcement of a judgment in favor of defendant and respondent, Jasper Barry, pending the appeal of plaintiff and appellant herein from said judgment. Said appeal has been determined by this court this day (No. 11120 of the records of this court) 277 P. 333, and the judgment in favor of the defendant and respondent has been reversed. The question of the right of appellant to the restraining writ sought becomes, therefore, a moot question.

The petition for the writ of supersedeas is denied.

Attachment will issue under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 537–540, in favor of defendant filing a counterclaim stating a cause of action on express contract for direct payment of money within state; the word "plaintiff" as used in the statute meaning the claimant or moving party or any party to the action seeking affirmative relief, rather than being limited to party designated as plaintiff therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by Leslie Allers against the Beverly Hills Laundry, Inc., wherein defendant filed a counterclaim. From an order refusing to dissolve and attachment issued in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hays & Jacobson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Walter H. Hewicker and William B. Neeley, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment issued in favor of defendant.

The plaintiff, Leslie Allers, brought this action against defendant, Beverly Hills Laundry, Inc., a corporation, alleging in his complaint: "That between the 20th day of January, 1925, and the 16th day of March, 1927, * * * the plaintiff performed work, labor and services in the capacity of manager of the construction of the building, the installation of the machinery therein, and manager of the business of running the laundry, for the defendant at its special instance and request. * * * That the services were reasonably worth the sum of $100 per week, making a total of $10,960. * * * That the same has not been paid * * * except the sum of $5,381. Wherefore, plaintiff demands judgment against defendant for $5,579. * * *"

The defendant filed an answer in which it denied any indebtedness to plaintiff and also alleged, among other defenses, that all sums due or owing from it to plaintiff for labor or services had been fully paid.

The answer also contains this allegation: "Admits that it has paid to plaintiff the sum of four thousand six hundred forty ($4,640.00) dollars, as salary for the period from August 22, 1925, to March 16, 1927, the day on which the employment of plaintiff with defendant was terminated. That plaintiff accepted said sum in full satisfaction of all claims and demands against defendant for services rendered to defendant during said period. Admits that it has paid to plaintiff the additional sum of seven hundred forty-one ($741.00) dollars, but that said sum of seven hundred forty-one ($741.00) dollars did not represent salary paid plaintiff, but represented money advanced to plaintiff."

At the time of filing the answer, defendant also filed what is designated "Counterclaim," which is in part as follows:

"That within two years last past, plaintiff became indebted to defendant in the sum of seven hundred forty-one ($741.00) dollars for money advanced to plaintiff's use by defendant. That plaintiff agreed to repay the same to defendant prior to the 16th day of March, 1927. That no part of said sum of seven hundred forty-one ($741.00) dollars has been paid, and that the whole thereof remains due, owing and unpaid.

"For a second, separate and distinct counterclaim defendant alleges as follows: That within two years last past, plaintiff became indebted to defendant in the sum of seven hundred forty-one ($741.00) dollars on an open book account. That said sum of seven hundred forty-one ($741.00) dollars became due and payable prior to March 16, 1927. That no part of said sum of seven hundred forty-one ($741.00) dollars has been paid, but that the whole remains due, owing and unpaid."

After the answer and so-called "counterclaim" was filed, and on April 26, 1927, the defendant filed its affidavit for attachment against the property of plaintiff. The affidavit was made by the attorney for defendant, and states "that the plaintiff herein is indebted to defendant in the sum of $741.00, lawful money of the United States, over and above all legal setoffs and counterclaims, upon an express contract, for the direct payment of money, to wit: for money advanced, and that such contract was made or is payable in this state, and that the payment of the same has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real estate or personal property, or any pledge of personal property. * * *"

An undertaking was duly filed by defendant, and the clerk issued a writ of attachment, which in due time was levied by the sheriff on 15 shares of the preferred stock of the said Beverly Hills Laundry, Inc. Thereafter, and on April 28, 1927, the plaintiff made a motion to dissolve said attachment on the ground "that said attachment was erroneously and illegally issued. * * *" The court, on May 21, 1927, made the following order: "Motion to release attachment heretofore submitted is now by the court denied."

From this order plaintiff Leslie Allers prosecutes this appeal.

Appellant contends that said attachment was erroneously issued and that the trial court erred in refusing to dissolve it. This contention is based upon the claim that sections 537, 538, 539, and 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure do not permit an attachment to issue on a "counterclaim." No attack is made upon either the affidavit or undertaking.

[1] Defendant has stated in its pleading a cause of action against plaintiff on an express contract for the direct payment of money in this state. It is therefore, by virtue of having stated said cause of action against plaintiff, entitled to make, through its officers or attorney, the affidavit required by section 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and receive the benefits of the statute relating to attachments. If defendant Beverly Hills Laundry, Inc., had brought an independent action, stating the same facts in a complaint that it has in the pleading designated "counterclaim," and had made the same affidavit and filed the same undertaking, there could have been no question but that it would have been entitled to have an attachment issued. Defendant having already been brought into court by the act of plaintiff himself to litigate their conflicting demands, we are unable to perceive why defendant Beverly Hills Laundry, Inc., in order to secure the benefits of the statute on attachments, should be required to go to the trouble and expense of bringing an independent action against plaintiff, simply in order to be able to designate him in the complaint as "defendant" and itself as "plaintiff."

In sections 537 and 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure the legislative intent, it must be conceded, is not made as clear as might be desired. It is, however, safe to assume, in view of the purpose intended by the Legislature, that it was not intended to afford one party a remedy not open to the other. We think it not unwarranted to assume that by the word "plaintiff," as used in these sections of the Code, the Legislature intended to mean the claimant or moving party; or, in other words, any party to the action seeking affirmative relief, who had brought himself within the provisions of said sections on attachments, whether he be designated in the complaint as plaintiff or defendant. We do not believe the Legislature intended to limit the operation of the statute on attachments solely to the party designated in the complaint as "plaintiff."

If appellant's contention be sound, and only the party designated as "plaintiff" can receive the benefits of the statute on attachments, then any debtor could absolutely deprive a just creditor of his right to an attachment by being the first to institute suit against the just creditor on an insignificant claim, and thereby become the plaintiff in the action, and defeat the just creditor's right to an attachment. Certainly, this was not the intention of the Legislature when it enacted sections 537 and 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] The appellant has discussed at some length the distinction between counterclaims and cross-complaints. We do not consider a discussion of the difference between a counterclaim and a cross-complaint at all essential to a proper disposition of this appeal, because it is immaterial how defendant designates its pleading. The allegations of a pleading determine its nature. Here the pleading in question is in the nature of a cross-complaint.

We think the case of Interlocking Stone Co. v. Scribner, 19 Cal. App. 344, 126 P. 178, supports the conclusion that we have reached in this case.

We think the order refusing to dissolve the attachment was proper and should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

description of the case and of the proceedings leading up to said judgment and order will be found in the decision of this court wherein we denied a motion to dismiss the appeal from part of the judgment. City of San Diego v. Cuyamaca Water Co. et al., 80 Cal. App. 599, 251 P. 341.

In considering these appeals we shall first dispose of the questions relating to the order granting a new trial. The verdict of the jury determined that the value of the property sought to be condemned was, at the date of the trial, $600,000; that the damages accruing to the remaining portion of the entire parcel, to wit, the 130 acres lying west of the 190 acres sought to be taken, of which the property taken is a part, by reason of its severance from the land condemned and the construction of the improvement in the manner proposed by the plaintiff, is the sum of $2,000; and found that the portion of the entire parcel not sought to be condemned will be benefited by the construction of the improvement proposed by the plaintiff in the sum of $3,000. Upon the motion for a new trial as submitted, the court made its order as follows: "The verdict of the jury herein is vacated and a new trial is granted to the issues heretofore submitted to the jury only, and upon all the grounds specified in plaintiff's notice of intention to move for new trial." The grounds of the motion were: (1) Irregularity of the proceedings of the adverse parties, to wit, the defendants, by and through their attorneys, by which the plaintiff was prevented from having a fair trial; (2) an excessive verdict, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice; (3) insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict of the jury, and that said verdict is against law; (4) errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the plaintiff. The motion was based upon the minutes of the court, and upon affidavits.

The case came on for trial on the 15th day of June, 1925, before the superior court of the county of Orange, to which court the cause had been transferred from the superior court of San Diego county. A jury having been duly impaneled and sworn, the jurors were excused until the 22d day of June, and thereafter until the 30th day of June, and during their absence the court proceeded with the trial of the issues which were to be tried without a jury, including the issue relating to the existence of any necessity that the land sought to be condemned be taken by the city for the purposes alleged in its complaint. Upon the return of the jury into court on June 30th the trial proceeded before the jury for the purpose of determining the issues involving the value of the property sought to be condemned, and the damages which would accrue to the remaining portion of the entire parcel of which the property taken is a part, by reason of its severance from the land condemned and the construction of the improvement in the manner proposed by the plaintiff. The verdict of the jury was received and entered on the 9th day of August, 1925, and thereafter on the 22d day of August, 1925, the findings of fact and conclusions of law were signed and filed. Subsequently such proceedings were had that the motion for a new trial was granted as heretofore stated.

The trial court held, in effect, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict; and more particularly that the verdict was so excessive that it appeared to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice.

[1, 2] Insufficiency of the evidence, before it will justify a court of appeal in refusing to accept and follow a finding of fact, must amount to a complete absence of any substantial evidence in support of the finding. A common statement of the rule on appeal is that if the evidence is conflicting, the finding will not be disturbed. But it is not so with a trial court in passing upon a motion for a new trial. The trial judge should not grant a new trial unless he is clearly satisfied that the verdict or other decision is wrong. "But in considering the question upon the motion he must act upon his own judgment as to the effect of the evidence. The parties are entitled to the judgment of the jury in rendering a verdict, in the first instance; but upon a motion for a new trial they are equally entitled to the independent judgment of the judge as to whether such verdict is supported by the evidence." Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 103, 78 P. 337, 340.

[3] In the case at bar there was a wide diversity of opinion of witnesses concerning the value of the land sought to be taken. The value stated in the verdict, though less than that shown by the testimony of some witnesses, is many times the value given by other witnesses. Counsel for defendants were deeply dissatisfied with the announcement of the intention of the court to decide that the right to condemn the land had been established. To such decision they had the right of exception, and the right to have the matter reviewed upon appeal, but upon that issue they had no right of appeal to the jury. Nevertheless, on numerous occasions, and apparently with a studied intention, they expressed this dissatisfaction in the presence of the jury, and endeavored to emphasize and impress upon the minds of the jurors the fact that the land was being taken away from the defendants against the will and contrary to the desire of the defendants. If this overpressed insistence of the defendants that the court was erroneously permitting their land to be taken away from them caused the jury to increase the amount of the compensation award and to raise it above the value which normally would have resulted from the testimony of the witnesses, this easily might have produced an excessive verdict. For the standard of measurement of value of the land about to be taken did not in any way depend upon the fact that the defendants were objecting to the condemnation. The plaintiff was entitled to have the actual market value established in accordance with law, unaffected by any belief or suggestion that the property was being wrongfully condemned and taken. It is apparent that the court in ruling on the motion for a new trial had reached the conclusion that the jurors, in arriving at the amount of compensation given by their verdict, had improperly allowed themselves to be influenced by these contentions of the defendants, and that the verdict so obtained was excessive. We are of the opinion that the order granting a new trial of the issues tried by jury should be affirmed.

The condition of the record in relation to the judgment and the appeal therefrom has been set forth in our decision of the motion to dismiss the appeal from part of the judgment. City of San Diego v. Cuyamaca Water Co. et al., 80 Cal. App. 599, 251 P. 341. This appeal is from "that certain portion of the judgment * * * which adjudges that the plaintiff is entitled to condemn the lands described in its complaint as amended, subject to the reservations and restrictions contained therein and the further restrictions in the findings of fact and conclusions of law specified."

By its complaint, filed on the 20th day of May, 1924, plaintiff stated certain facts concerning its existence and powers as a municipal corporation. The complaint then alleged the due enactment of an ordinance whereby the city council determined and declared that the public interest, convenience and necessity of the city of San Diego and the inhabitants thereof, for public use and for the impounding, conserving, and delivering of water to said city for municipal purposes, required the construction of a dam and reservoir on, over, and across certain lands in the county of San Diego; that by said ordinance the council further determined and declared that the taking and acquiring by the city of the lands, property, and rights described in the ordinance is deemed necessary for the acquisition and completion of additional water impounding and conserving facilities to be used for the purpose of impounding, conserving, and delivering water to the city of San Diego and the inhabitants thereof for municipal purposes, etc. The ordinance characterized the interest to be acquired in the land sought to be taken as being "the fee simple of the following described lands, to be used for the purpose of constructing and maintaining a dam and reservoir thereon." By said ordinance the city attorney was instructed to prosecute this action for the purpose of condemning and acquiring the property and rights demanded pursuant to said ordinance. The complaint, following the terms of the ordinance, alleged that it was necessary to condemn and acquire a fee simple in the described property, "for the use of said city in constructing and maintaining thereon a dam and reservoir."

On June 27, 1925, the plaintiff filed an amendment to its complaint, whereby its demand for condemnation of the fee simple of the described property sought to be taken was modified by providing that there should be reserved to the defendants the easement and right to conduct over and across said land by means of the flume or conduit now located thereon (giving by description the location of the strip of land on which said flume is located) any water which said defendants or either or any of them may now or hereafter be entitled to conduct across said land, together with the right to enlarge and repair said flume or conduit, or to relocate the same in a manner not inconsistent with the use of said land by plaintiff for reservoir purposes; reserving further to said defendants the right to conduct, carry, and have flow through, under, and across and beyond said land any water which defendants now own or have the right to carry, conduct, or have carried and conducted through, under, and across said land; reserving also to said defendants the right to withdraw and take from said land by pumps or otherwise any water which defendants or either of them now have the right to withdraw and take from said land; reserving also to said defendants the right to store upon said land any water which said defendants or either or any of them are now entitled to store thereon, and which said defendants or either or any of them might now or hereafter store upon said property without using or flooding any land of the plaintiff; further reserving to said defendants the right of access, etc., for the purposes of said reservations.

By further amendment on July 1, 1925, the plaintiff modified its demand by providing that in the enjoyment of the common use of said lands herein sought to be condemned, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to construct improvements thereon in a manner which shall flood said land to a height in excess of 150 feet above the level of the stream bed located upon said lands.

The case was tried upon the complaint as so amended, and a second amended answer of defendants and interveners filed July 9, 1925. It may be noted here that the trial commenced on June 15, 1925, and it thus appears that the amendments to the complaint were filed during the period when the issue concerning the right of the plaintiff to take said property was being tried by the court in the absence of the jury, and prior to the introduction of any evidence before the jury. The answer denied many of the allegations of the complaint; denied the necessity that the city of San Diego acquire a fee simple or any other right or estate in the property demanded, and denied the right of the city to take said property at all. The answer further denied the right of the plaintiff to take the property in fee simple and at the same time reserve to the defendants the rights proposed to be reserved, or to limit the rights of the defendants in any way by means of such reservations.

The defendants further by their answers set forth facts showing that defendant Cuyamaca Water Company and its predecessors in interest have been, and that said defendant now is, operating a public utility, and engaged in the conservation, impounding, and distribution of water to public and private consumers, including incorporated cities and their inhabitants, and to other territories, for domestic and irrigation purposes. The defendants alleged that the value of the property sought to be taken is the sum of $1,000,000, and they further alleged their ownership of certain other lands, waters, water rights, and water distribution properties, alleged to be of certain stated values, and which would be damaged in certain stated large sums as a result of the condemnation and taking of the property demanded by the plaintiff. It was alleged that the property sought to be taken is an integral part of the water system owned and operated by the defendants, appropriated by them to the use and actually used in conservation and distribution of water, as before stated; and that said water system will, by reason of the condemnation herein, be greatly damaged in a sum not less than $1,000,000.

It was further alleged in the answer that on April 5, 1924, the defendant Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, executed to intervener irrigation district an option in writing for the purchase of all of the property of the water company, including the land described in the complaint; that said district has complied with all of the terms and conditions of said option, and the said option has thereby now become a contract of purchase and sale between the water company and the district. It was further alleged that the land sought to be taken constitutes a large underground basin or reservoir capable of developing by means of a pumping plant installed thereon, large quantities of water; that prior to the year 1916 there had been installed by said company on said land a pumping plant and water was pumped from said underground reservoir situated on said land and used and supplied for the public purposes heretofore stated. The history of said pumping plant and its connected uses down to the time of the filing of said answer was set forth at length in the answer, and it was alleged that should said lands be acquired by the city of San Diego the district would thereby be deprived of additional water which could be developed by said pumping plant and put to public use. The answer further set forth the ownership of certain lands by the irrigation district within the watershed of the San Diego river, and riparian thereto, which were acquired by the district for the purposes of a pumping plant; and that by the building of the dam sought to be constructed by the plaintiff the flow of water to said lands of the district will be absolutely cut off and said lands will be deprived of all water whatsoever. Facts were stated at length showing how the supply of water in the sands on the district's said lands is replenished from time to time from the surface and underground flow of the river, and how the supply thus obtained will be destroyed by the proposed dam, and the district be damaged thereby.

The foregoing statements are a brief summary of what seem to be the chief elements of the answer, which sets forth said matters at great length.

The court by its findings of fact affirmed the right and necessity of the city to acquire the demanded tract of land, subject to the reservations and restrictions set forth in the findings, which are the reservations and restrictions to which we have referred in describing the complaint as amended. The court found that the lands to be taken, amounting to 190 acres, are a part of a larger tract amounting to 320 acres; and that no other land owned by the defendants, or any of them, is contiguous to said 320-acre parcel. The findings of fact concerning the defendants and their several properties, and concerning the development and distribution of water by them, are too extensive for convenient repetition here, further than may be required in discussion of the questions presented for decision.

[4] The first proposition relied upon by appellants is that at the time this action was commenced the property sought to be condemned was already appropriated to the use of various cities and towns other than the plaintiff, and was being used for the public purposes for which it had been so appropriated; and that for this reason the plaintiff has no right to take the property by condemnation. It is the law that "property appropriated to the use of any county, city and county, incorporated city or town or municipal water district, may not be taken by any other county, city and county, incorporated city or town, or municipal water district, while such property is so appropriated and used for the public purposes for which it has been so appropriated." Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, subd. 4, and section 1241, subd. 3.

The San Diego river is a stream rising in the Cuyamaca Mountains, northeast of the city of San Diego, and flowing down in a general southwesterly direction some 65 miles, reaching the Pacific Ocean at the city of San Diego. The so-called El Capitan dam site is located in and just above a rocky gorge through which the river passes, at a point about 35 miles from the city. In the year 1899 a company known as the San Diego Flume Company, which is a predecessor of the defendants in ownership and operation of the water development and distribution system now owned by the irrigation district, was organized and began the construction of a dam, reservoir, and flume for the diversion and use of water of the San Diego river and of certain of its tributaries. The site of that dam and reservoir is on Boulder creek, about 30 miles, more or less, above the location of the property sought to be condemned in this case. The reservoir became known as Cuyamaca Lake. The water from that reservoir, after passing along Boulder creek for a distance of 14 miles, was diverted and thence flowed through a flume constructed at a suitable grade and which carried the water down to the city; some of the water being distributed to smaller cities and towns, and to agricultural and other lands along the line of this flume and above the city. This flume, as now situated, crosses the lands sought to be condemned in this case, at a level approximately 50 feet higher than the high-water mark of the proposed reservoir.

At a point about five miles below El Capitan dam site, on the river, there is a certain tract of land on which there is a pumping plant, which was first installed in the year 1898 by La Mesa Development Company, which afterwards transferred that property to the San Diego Flume Company, and by further transfers the same property at the time of the commencement of this action belonged to the Cuyamaca Water Company, a partnership. Upstream from the pumping plant, and below El Capitan dam site, there is a basin of approximately 1,400 acres, filled with sand and gravel (and under the same ownership as the pumping plant), and known as El Monte reservoir. Within the area which would contain the reservoir to be created by El Capitan dam there are other water-bearing lands on which at one time a pumping plant had been established and operated by defendant Cuyamaca Water Company, a partnership, and the waters so obtained were carried into the distributing system of that company. Said pumping plant, which had been operated during the years 1913 and 1914, was completely destroyed by flood waters in January, 1916, and that pumping plant has not since then been restored. As a part of its defense herein the defendants claimed that the waters contained in the sands located in El Capitan reservoir site slowly seep down into El Monte reservoir, and thus act as a feeder for that reservoir. They further claimed that the Cuyamaca Water Company and its successors at all times intended, whenever the necessity therefor should appear, to resume the pumping of water from El Capitan reservoir lands, and to use the waters so developed and obtained, either by diverting the same directly to the flume or by permitting them to percolate down into the sands of El Monte reservoir. They further claimed that said owners, prior to and at the time of commencement of this action, held and owned the land constituting the dam site for the purpose and with the intention that they would thereafter construct at that place a dam for the purpose of holding back flood waters and increasing the supply of water available for use in the sands of El Monte reservoir.

At this point it seems necessary to quote certain of the findings which have a bearing upon the foregoing issues of the case:

"X. The Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, is in charge of and operates a public utility, and for many years past has been and now is engaged in the conservation, impounding and distribution of water to public and private consumers for municipal, domestic and irrigation purposes, within the county of San Diego, and that among the consumers are the incorporated cites of La Mesa and El Cajon and the towns of Lakeside, Foster, Lemon Grove, Kensington Park and the territory so served by said public utility is without the boundaries of the city of San Diego. It is not true that defendant has been for many years last past, or now is, conserving or distributing water from a portion of said lands herein condemned by the plaintiff, subject to said reservations and restriction, to the inhabitants of said cities or of said territory for domestic or other uses.

"XI. It is not true that by the building and erection of the dam sought to be constructed by plaintiff the rights of the defendants, or of any one or more of them in and to the waters of the San Diego river will be destroyed or severed from the land of the defendants or of any one or more of them, or that the defendants, or any one or more of them will be damaged by the destruction or taking of said water rights, if said property, subject to said reservations and restriction, is condemned by plaintiff herein."

"XIX. It is not true that the property taken and condemned by this plaintiff in this action is an integral part of a water system owned and operated by the defendant, Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, as herein found, or was at the time of the commencement of this action, or at the time of the trial of this action, appropriated to the use, or actually used in the conservation or distribution of water to the inhabitants of said cities and towns, or of said irrigation district, for domestic or irrigation purposes, other than as used for a right of way for a flume or conduit for the transmission and conveyance of water as herein found, and other than for the pumping of water therefrom at the times and in the amounts all as herein specifically found. It is not true that the lands herein taken and condemned, subject to said reservations and restriction, are used as a means of conducting water or impounding water, or as a reserve storage reservoir for periods of drought."

"XXII. That said lands consisting of 190 acres herein taken and condemned, subject to said reservations and restrictions, and no part thereof is now, or was at the time of the commencement or of the trial of this action or ever has been, used by the defendants or any one or more of them for a public use or purpose other than as a right of way for said flume or conduit as herein specifically found and other than for the purpose of pumping water therefrom during the years 1913 and 1914, as herein specifically found, and that said 190 acres of land herein taken and condemned, subject to said reservations and restriction, and no part thereof, is now or ever has been appropriated to a public use or purpose which is inconsistent with the use sought to be made of said property by said plaintiff; and that the use to be made of said property by plaintiff is consistent with the continuance of the use of said 190 acres of land herein sought to be condemned, subject to said reservations and restriction, and every part and portion thereof heretofore made of said property or any part or portion thereof, by said defendants or any one or more of them.

"XXIII. That the defendant Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, is in charge of and operates a public utility and for many years last past has been, and is now, engaged in the conservation, impounding and distribution of water to public and private consumers for domestic purposes within the county of San Diego. That said defendant Cuyamaca Water Company has not, for many years last past, and is not now conserving and distributing water from a portion of said 190 acres of land herein taken and condemned, subject to said reservations and restriction, to the inhabitants of any city or incorporated village or town, or any other person or persons for any purpose whatsoever, and that no part of said 190 acres herein taken and condemned by plaintiff has, at any time since January, 1916, been used by said defendant Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, or by any one or more of said defendants, for public use other than as a right of way for a flume or conduit as herein found. That no part of said 190 acres herein taken and condemned has ever been appropriated or dedicated to a public use other than as herein specifically found, and that no part of said property at the date of the issuance of the summons in this case or at any time subsequent thereto, has been appropriated and dedicated to a public use by the defendants herein, or by any other party, save and except the use of said land for a right of way for a flume or conduit as herein specifically found."

"XXV. That at the date of the commencement of this action, to-wit: April 16, 1924, Ed Fletcher and the estate of James A. Murray were the owners of the property sought to be condemned in this action; that on said date defendant, the Cuyamaca Water Company, a corporation, had no interest in said lands and property sought to be condemned in this action; that on said date the Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, had no interest in said lands and property sought to be condemned in this action; that on said date the La Mesa, Lemon Grove and Spring Valley Irrigation District had no interest in said lands and property sought to be condemned in this action, save an option to buy the same which on said date had not been exercised, and that at the present time said La Mesa, Lemon Grove and Spring Valley Irrigation District has no interest in said property save an executory contract to purchase the same, which said contract has not as yet been executed; and that at the date of the commencement of this action, defendant C. F. Stern had no interest in and to any of the lands and property sought to be condemned in this action; and that at the date of said trial, the 15th day of June, 1925, Ed Fletcher was the sole owner of the property and lands sought to be taken by said plaintiff in this action."

By the conclusions of law filed with the findings of fact, and by the judgment directed to be entered in accordance with said findings and conclusions, the court determined that the use of said lands sought to be taken for reservoir purposes, etc., is a use authorized by law, and that the taking by plaintiff of said land, subject to the reservations and restrictions mentioned in the complaint as amended, is necessary for such use. It was directed that the lands described in the complaint be taken, subject to the stated reservations and restrictions; that the lands so taken may be used by plaintiff and defendant Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, or its successors in interest, in common, and that the use of said lands by plaintiff for the stated purposes is consistent with the use thereof, and the continuance of such use, by said copartnership or its successors in interest "according to the reservations and restrictions herein specifically provided"; that said dam and reservoir is planned and located in a manner which will be most compatible with the greatest public good and the least private injury; "that no part of the lands condemned and taken in this proceeding by plaintiff has ever been dedicated, appropriated or used, or is now dedicated, appropriated or used, for a public use which is inconsistent with the use thereof for dam and reservoir purposes for the impounding, conserving and delivery of water subject to the reservations and restriction herein contained."

On the subject of ownership by defendants of the lands sought to be taken in this action, findings VII and VIII should be read together with finding XXV. From these findings so considered together, it appears that at the time of the commencement of this action, the legal title to the land was vested in Ed Fletcher, but that such title was held by him as the sole surviving member of the copartnership known as the Cuyamaca Water Company. This ownership, however, was subject to a contract giving the intervener an option to purchase this property, which option was exercised, and was succeeded by a formal agreement of purchase and sale subsequent to the time of the commencement of this action. The evidence shows that at all times the Cuyamaca Water Company and its successors were holding the property as a part of the system of water supply and service of that company. This fact (if we correctly understand the effect of the voluminous evidence in the record) is not contradicted by any of the evidence. Nothing is shown to have occurred in connection with the changes in title of the property of the Cuyamaca Water Company which would in any way alter or diminish the public uses of the property owned by that company and constituting its water system, or that could in any way diminish the beneficial uses and rights vested in the cities, communities, and persons who were being furnished with water from that system.

Paraphrasing the facts stated indirectly in findings XIX and XXII, it is in effect found that during the years 1913 and 1914 the land sought to be condemned was used for the purpose of pumping water therefrom "as herein specifically found." Turning to finding XI we learn that during those two years there was pumped from said land approximately 22,000,000 gallons of water by defendant Cuyamaca Water Company, a copartnership, and distributed to its consumers; but that in January, 1916, the pumping plant which had been so operated was completely destroyed by flood waters and had not since been restored. Nevertheless the court found that it is not true that said land is used as a means of conducting waters or impounding waters, or as a reserve storage for periods of drought. In finding XXII, however, there is an indirect recognition of the fact that said land has been appropriated to a public use, when the court found that said land is not now and never has been appropriated to a public use or purpose which is inconsistent with the use sought to be made of said property by said plaintiff. This in effect is a statement that said land has been appropriated to a public use. This being so, that public use must continue to exist unless there is some evidence of its abandonment. The record is utterly devoid of any evidence that the beneficiaries of the use have ever consented to give up any of the rights which had once been conferred upon them in connection with the water service to which they were entitled. And if it be assumed that the water company would have had the power of abandonment or surrender of any such rights to the detriment of their beneficiaries, the evidence on that subject seems to be entirely to the effect that the use of said land for the purposes to which it was dedicated had not been abandoned. The testimony of defendant Fletcher is directly to the point that this land is "part of the ownership of property owned by the public utilities, used and useful and held in reserve for future development, and to draw on the underground supply of water in case of need." He further testified that the reason why they did not rebuild those pumps after the flood of 1916 was that: "We had no necessity for so doing on account of getting a 100 per cent. supply of water from other sources, and it would be only an added expense waiting for a dry period to come when we could utilize these wells as a reserve." We think that under the facts with relation to this particular subject, this case is similar to that presented in City of Santa Barbara v. Gould, 143 Cal. 421, 77 P. 151. The defendant Montecito Valley Water Company in that action was a corporation engaged in the supplying of water for the use of the inhabitants of the village of Montecito. The land sought to be condemned was water-bearing land which had been used as a part of the company's water system. At the time when the action was begun the water so supplied from the source known as Cold Spring branch had diminished so that it would not flow down to the point of diversion maintained by the company, and the company was not at that particular time using the water. The Supreme Court said: "Nor was said water company responsible for the drought. It ceased to use the water because the water had ceased to flow, but this would not deprive it of the use of the water when it should again flow. Said water company had acquired the land for the purpose of preserving the flow of the stream in its natural state. It had the right to a portion of the waters of the stream. It was engaged in supplying water to the public at the time the action was commenced. Its property could not be taken on the theory that it was not devoted to public use at the time this action was commenced, unless it had of its own volition ceased to devote it to public use. * * * If the waters * * * should again flow down to the company's point of diversion, it would be entitled to the amount of water owned by it. It is also entitled to the land for the purpose of preserving the normal and natural flow of the stream."

If we give consideration to the findings of fact according to their entire scope and meaning, it becomes evident that plaintiff's claim of right to condemn has been sustained by the trial court upon the theory that by putting into the decree certain reservations and restrictions upon plaintiff's use of the dam and reservoir proposed to be constructed, the water rights of the defendants which are appurtenant to the land sought to be taken will be fully protected, and that in view of that protection the defendants have no valid defense to the action. This is in effect an attempted application of the right of concurrent use for public purposes, of property sought to be condemned for some use not inconsistent with an existing public use. This right to take such property for a concurrent public use which is consistent with continuance of the use of such property for an existing public purpose is recognized by the statute which governs in eminent domain proceedings. Code Civ. Proc., § 1240, subd. 4. The right so given, however, is subject to an exception which is vitally important in this case. "But property appropriated to the use of any county, city and county, incorporated city or town or municipal water district, may not be taken by any other county, city and county, incorporated city or town, or municipal water district, while such property is so appropriated and used for the public purposes for which it has been so appropriated." A very thorough discussion of these Code provisions, including the stated exception, is to be found in Mono Power Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 284 F. 784. In that decision by the Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, the same kind of conflicting interest was involved that is exhibited by the facts in the present case. In that case the city was seeking to condemn land of the power company, and it was admitted that the use intended by the city, if permitted to take the property, was inconsistent with the public use then existing under beneficial rights vested in other cities and communities served by the power company. The court held that by reason of the final clause of subdivision 4, quoted above, the demand of the city of Los Angeles must be denied. The Mono Power Co. Case is referred to in East Bay Municipal Utility District v. Railroad Commission, 194 Cal. 603, at page 621 et seq., 229 P. 949, 955. The opinion is there expressed that where there is to be no change or interruption of the use of water by the inhabitants of a city, and where the condemning municipal agency is merely proposing to take over from a water company its property subject to the same use to which it was dedicated, such declared purposes do not bring the plaintiff within the prohibitions of the cited Code provisions. The Supreme Court said: "It is here proposed to continue the use of the water to the same territory to which it has heretofore been appropriated. The territory and the peoples thereof are not to be disturbed in the use to which the water is now put and are to enjoy an uninterrupted use thereof, if the petitioner succeeds in its purpose. In other words, the change will result not in the disturbance of the use or appropriation of the water but in the agency authorized by law to administer the trust. We find nothing in the sections referred to which would prohibit such a change."

In that case the petitioner was seeking a writ of mandate to compel the Railroad Commission to make a valuation of certain properties in contemplation of the acquisition of the same under condemnation or other proceedings. The question relating to the right to condemn was not directly or necessarily presented. In the case at bar we meet that question face to face, and under circumstances which are materially different from those considered in the East Bay Case. Notwithstanding the studied effort shown by the findings and judgment herein, to make a decree of condemnation which will enable plaintiff to take the land without in any way disturbing or interrupting the use to which the property is now put by the defendants for the benefit of the two incorporated cities and several unincorporated towns to which water is supplied, we think that the construction and maintenance of the dam and reservoir as proposed necessarily includes a disturbance, change, and probable interruption of the use. It is not here proposed to substitute the plaintiff for the present owners of the property, and make the plaintiff directly accountable as the agency in charge of the use. The intervener, after the condemnation, will continue to be the agency administering the use and supplying water to its consumers, but will be subjected to new conditions, and to the will of others, in the management of that part of its property which will be transferred to the possession and control of the plaintiff. Instead of an underground supply of pure water taken out by pumping from the land, and instead of water percolating into El Monte basin, the beneficiaries of the use in charge of the defendants will be compelled to submit to the risks and inconveniences of a substituted supply drawn from an open reservoir replenished by storm water, and delivered by the hands of a stranger. The injury to the rights of the defendants and their beneficiaries may be seen, without taking into consideration the disputed claim of appellants that they also intended to use the condemned property as a dam site by means of which they would be able to increase their supply of water in El Monte sands.

Since the conclusions above stated upon questions which are determinative of the appeal require a reversal of the judgment, we find it not necessary to express an opinion upon the other grounds of appeal which have been presented in the briefs for appellants in support of their objections to the judgment.

The application of appellants wherein they request that this court receive and take additional evidence of facts occurring subsequent to the decision appealed from, and to reconsider and review certain of the evidence produced before the trial court, and to make findings of fact based upon such evidence contrary to and in addition to those made by the trial court, is denied. The order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial of that portion of the case decided by the jury, and setting aside the verdict of the jury, is affirmed. That portion of the judgment made and rendered in said action on the 22d day of August, 1925, which adjudges that the plaintiff is entitled to condemn the lands described in its complaint as amended, subject to the reservations and restrictions contained therein and the further restrictions in the findings of fact and conclusions of law specified, is reversed.

KNIESE v. FAIRFAX INCLINE R. CO.★
(Civ. 6405.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 1, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 31, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 27, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑996—Appellate court cannot interfere with finding which trial court made in exercise of its power to draw inference on the subject.

In the absence of an abuse of discretion, appellate court cannot interfere with trial court's finding against plaintiff on count pleading stated account; there being no direct evidence thereon, and the power resting with the trial court sitting without a jury to draw an inference on the subject.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Finding against plaintiff cannot be disturbed; there being only slight evidence to support his claim.

There being only slight evidence to support plaintiff's claim that value of labor done was agreed on, appellate court cannot disturb finding against him.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1151(3)—Judgment, as affected by clerical error in failing to find total of undisputed payments, modified on appeal.

The total of payments as shown by books not being disputed, but the court by clerical error finding it $100 less than what it was, judgment, which on that account was $100 less than what it should have been, will on appeal be modified by adding thereto that amount.

4. Witnesses 🔑406—Memorandum of transaction executed by parties at time of sale held some evidence of what was sold to witness and admissible in contradiction of his testimony as to properties included.

Where when witness bought of another they executed a written memorandum of the transaction, that memorandum signed by witness was some evidence as to what the other sold or assigned to witness, and so limited to that purpose, was admissible in contradiction of witness as to what properties were the subject of the sale.

5. Corporations 🔑118—Buyer of stock under executory sale lost title to seller's account for advances to corporation, assigned as incident of subject of sale, when he defaulted and stock was sold at trustee's sale.

Even if statement of R. when making an executory sale to S. of the stock of a corporation, that he would make no claim against the corporation for the advances he had made to it, amounted to an assignment of the account for advances, it was but an incident of the subject of the executory sale, so that, when S. defaulted in his payments for the stock, and his title thereto was sold by R. at trustee's sale, S. parted with all title to all the properties, including the account for advances.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by George J. Kniese against the Fairfax Incline Railroad Company. From a judgment for less than claimed, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Superseding opinion, 274 P. 383.

Wm. T. Eckhoff, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Martin Stevens, of San Francisco, and Geo. H. Harlan, of San Rafael, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment which was under consideration in the appeal by the defendant in Kniese v. Fairfax Incline Railroad Co. (No. 6406 Cal. App.) 274 P. 382. All of the stock of the defendant corporation was formerly owned by Rivers Bros., a corporation. While so owned the railroad was operated at a loss. The loss was paid by Rivers Bros. and the deficits were carried on the books of the defendant corporation as deficits and as such were reported to the railroad commission. On August 15, 1921, the defendant owned a block at Fairfax, which was known as a park. It also owned an incline railroad. On the date last mentioned Rivers Bros. sold to G. F. C. Seidel all of the stock in the defendant corporation. The sale was made under an executory contract by which the purchaser received the stock and at once redelivered the same as security for the payments thereafter to fall due. There is no evidence in the record of more than one transfer. That transfer was the sale of the corporate stock which represented the properties owned by the defendant corporation. The vendee operated the road from the date he purchased it until August 16, 1923. While so operating the road the block of land known as a park was sold to Rivers Bros. and the proper credits in the sum of $5,000 were entered in the proper accounts. While the vendee was operating the road it was operated at a loss. He paid the losses and such losses were also carried on the books of the defendant corporation as deficits and were likewise reported to the Railroad Commission. Failing to make his payments, the rights of G. F. C. Seidel in the stock of the defendant corporation were sold in payment of his debts, and on August 16, 1923, his management ceased. Thereafter he sued, through this plaintiff as assignee, to recover $4,180.58, that being the total of the deficits incurred during the management of Rivers Bros. and the deficits incurred during the management of Seidel. In making up the account of the deficits incurred during the management of Seidel, the plaintiff entered the salary of Seidel at $200 per month.

[1] Through an abundance of precaution the plaintiff pleaded his case in several different counts. In one count he pleaded a stated account, and he complains because the trial court made findings against him on that count. There was no direct evidence thereon. The power rested with the jury, or court sitting without a jury, to draw an inference on the subject. This court may not, in the absence of an abuse of discretion, interfere, and there is certainly no evidence of abuse of discretion in this case.

The plaintiff contends that the facts in this litigation do not present an instance of a corporate double and that the entity of the defendant corporation should not be ignored, and the plaintiff also claims that the advances made by Rivers Bros. and the advances made by Seidel were not made in payment of a stockholders' liability. We agree with the plaintiff on both contentions, but neither is helpful in determining the rights of the parties on this appeal.

[2] The plaintiff claims that the value of the labor done by Seidel was agreed upon as alleged in the fifth count. The issue was fully tried by the trial court. It found the fact against the plaintiff's allegation. There is slight evidence, if any, in the record to support the plaintiff. Under these circumstances this court may not disturb the finding thereon.

[3] During the trial the court received evidence on each and every alleged expenditure made by Seidel, and as to the reasonable value of the labor done by him while he was operating the road. Thereafter the trial court made a finding that the road became indebted to Seidel in the sum of $4,200. The amounts paid to Seidel while he was operating the road were entered on the books of the defendant. The total of those payments, $3,025.05, was not disputed at the trial. Nevertheless, the court made a finding that the total of the payments so made was $3,125.05. In other words, it made a clerical error against the plaintiff in the sum of $100. Under the findings made by the trial court and the admitted facts the judgment should have been for $100 more than as the judgment was written.

[4, 5] When Seidel bought from Rivers Bros. the vendor and vendee executed a written memorandum of the transaction. That memorandum was introduced by the defendant in contradiction of the witness Seidel as to what properties were the subject of the sale. The memorandum was signed by Seidel, and it was, therefore, some evidence as to what Rivers Bros. sold or assigned to him. Its admission was limited to that purpose. There was no error in receiving it.

As stated above, the plaintiff sought to recover the amount of the advances made by Rivers Bros. In claiming to recover that item, the plaintiff alleged an assignment to his assignor by Rivers Bros. The assignment was denied. The trial court made a finding that the claim was assigned, but as a part of the finding it continued and recited that, when Rivers Bros. made the payments, it did so in payment of its stockholders' liability and that there was nothing to assign. The plaintiff quite properly contends that the latter part of the finding was not sustained by the evidence. He further contends that the latter portion of the finding, not being sustained by the evidence, should be ignored, and that the findings, as so modified, clearly support a judgment in favor of the plaintiff on the alleged assigned claim, and that we should make an order accordingly. We are not at liberty to do so. Taking the evidence most favorably to this appellant, as hereinabove stated, there was evidence that Rivers Bros. executed an executory contract to sell to plaintiff's assignor the park and railroad. There was also evidence that Rivers Bros. made it clear to plaintiff's assignor that Rivers Bros., Incorporated, would not thereafter make a claim against this defendant for the deficit incurred during the management by Rivers Bros. This was the only evidence that can be claimed to be an assignment. If we treat it as an assignment, the assignment was but an incident of the subject of the executory sale. When thereafter plaintiff's assignor defaulted in his payments and his title to the stock in the defendant railroad was sold, he parted with all title to all properties, including the alleged account which he claims Rivers Bros. had agreed to sell him. In other words, there is nothing in the record showing that after the title to the corporate stock was sold by Rivers Bros. at a trustee's sale, plaintiff's assignor retained title to the account for advances theretofore made by Rivers Bros.

The judgment is modified by adding thereto the sum of $100, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed. The defendant will recover its costs.

GREEN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR COUNTY OF LOS ANGELES (two cases). (Civ. 6401, 6403.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 3, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 31, 1929.

Mandamus ⚯31—Mandamus to compel court to proceed to judgment, notwithstanding appeal in another case, held unwarranted, where cases presented involved and interdependent questions.

Petitioner, who had conveyed his apartment house and furnishings to another under exchange contract, held not entitled to writ of mandamus to compel court to proceed to judgment in his claim and delivery and unlawful detainer actions, notwithstanding his appeal from judgment against him in action for rescission of exchange contract, in view of involved and interdependent questions presented by the three cases.

Applications for writs of mandamus by James E. Green to require the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles to proceed with trial and to render judgment. Writs denied.

Wm. C. Ring, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Harry Lyons, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Prior to the litigation hereinafter mentioned, and from which these proceedings arise, the petitioner, James E. Green, entered into an agreement for exchange of properties with William E. Rhoades and wife, whereby the latter acquired possession of an apartment house, and certain furniture and furnishings. Upon the execution thereof the vendees signed a conditional sale contract by the terms of which they agreed to pay $8,500 for the personal property in monthly installments, and which was dated February 1, 1928. Thereafter Rhoades and his wife instituted a suit for rescission of the exchange contract, alleging fraud and misrepresentation, numbered 250325, in the superior court of Los Angeles county. During the pendency of the suit last mentioned, Green in turn filed in the superior court an action in unlawful detainer, which was numbered 257059, and one numbered 257997, for replevin of the personalty. After certain continuances, the plaintiffs in the case numbered 250325 were awarded judgment for rescission, and for $13,723.58, which was made a lien upon the furniture and furnishings. Green appealed from the judgment, and furnished an undertaking for the purpose of staying execution, to which exceptions were sustained by the court, but it appears that a sufficient undertaking was later substituted therefor, and was accepted. It is alleged by petitioner that the claim and delivery and unlawful detainer actions were thereafter tried together and that the court indicated an intention of deciding in his favor, but that upon motion of the defendants they were continued pending the determination of the appeal of the first action. He prays a writ of mandate in each case requiring the superior court to proceed to judgment, notwithstanding such appeal. The respondent court, through counsel for the defendants Rhoades, denies that the claim and delivery or unlawful detainer actions are ready for decision, and alleges that they were consolidated, and that the defendants during, but prior to the conclusion of, the trial thereof, moved for a continuance pending said appeal and produced the records of the first case, and that the complaint in that action and the answer and supplemental answer in the replevin suit and unlawful detainer suit involve the same property and present similar issues. It is further averred by the respondent that the property in controversy was delivered to petitioner in accordance with a verbal understanding or promise at the time of the filing of petitioner's undertaking upon appeal, and that no evidence as to its value had yet been offered or received when the continuance was granted in the replevin suit numbered 257997.

It appears to have been conceded in the respective briefs that the plaintiffs in the suit for rescission having obtained judgment for $13,723.58, in addition to rescission of their contract of exchange, and the personal property having been surrendered by them, the value and right to possession thereof are no longer in issue. The petitioner contends that the only question before the trial court upon the institution of this proceeding was the amount of damages, if any, to which he might be entitled in the unlawful detainer and replevin suits for possession, use, and occupation of the real and personal properties from the date of an alleged default in payment of installments to the time of such surrender. Respondent represents that the petitioner is insolvent, and could not pay the judgment rendered in the first case, if it should be affirmed; that the question of fraud would not be considered in the consolidated actions for possession; and that the question of value alone remained open for proof and determination, for the purpose of arriving at the amount of rental which the petitioner might in the event of a judgment in his favor be entitled to recover. The merits of neither of said actions are here involved.

The contract of conditional sale, entitled "lease contract," for rescission of which the vendees recovered judgment below, and for breach of which the petitioner herein there sought relief, contains no provisions for remuneration of the conditional vendor for use of, or failure to return, the personal property should default occur in the payment of any installment. We think it immaterial whether, as claimed by the petitioner, the trial court had before it all of the evidence and was about to render a judgment awarding or denying rents for the use of the furniture, or required evidence as to the amount of damage, if any, to which he might be entitled for its retention and use between the dates of default and surrender. If the judgment of rescission rendered during the pendency of the possessory actions be affirmed, it might result that petitioner is not entitled to recover rent or damages. Should it be reversed, it might ultimately develop that a construction of the conditional sale contract is requisite to the determination of that question. In other words, if the exchange contract was in fact obtained by fraud and misrepresentation, and was ineffectual for any purpose, the subsidiary conditional sale contract was without foundation and equally null and void. On the other hand, should the exchange contract eventually be upheld, the conditional sale contract must inevitably furnish the basis of any controversy as to the vendor's right to recover delinquent installments, rent for the withholding and use of the property between the date of default and the time of delivery, or damages (in the event that neither any installments or rent may be recoverable thereunder), for deprivation of the vendor's possession and the wear and tear of his property. It becomes quite obvious, we think, that a determination of this issue in the superior court also involves a consideration of the duties and obligations of the parties, either as a result of alleged fraud, or under the terms and conditions of a binding contract. It seems, as was held by the trial court, that the rights of the litigants may not adequately and fairly be adjudicated in anticipation of an unknown event upon which some judgment must be predicated. The entire record was, presumably, before the court, and the whole transaction must stand or fall accordingly as it shall determine therefrom as to whether or not there was a bona fide exchange and conditional sale.

It may well be that the court in its legal discretion felt compelled to hold the proceedings in abeyance until it could know the amount of liability, if any, or upon whom it should rest, as a result of final determination of the principal issue underlying the entire transaction. In view of the involved and interdependent questions presented by the three cases, we think the writs prayed herein are unwarranted.

The peremptory writs of mandate are denied, and the alternative writs are discharged.

tain oil well located on said premises, except a portion of said judgment awarding defendant the sum of $5,000, the value of casing placed in said well.

On February 7, 1924, plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract whereby defendant agreed to deepen an oil well 2,914 feet in depth, and owned by the plaintiff, to an approximate depth of 3,600 feet. The defendant deepened the well to 3,300 feet, and on or about July 15, 1924, made a production test, resulting in an aggregate production in two months of approximately 1,322 barrels of oil, which the plaintiff received and sold, paying the defendant 50 per cent. of the sale value as provided in the contract. The well did not produce much oil; it repeatedly sanded up and was repeatedly cleaned out by the defendant. Defendant never drilled the well to 3,600 feet. On or about December 8, 1924, a restraining order was served upon defendant, restraining defendant from further operating or drilling said well; and on December 24, 1924, a temporary injunction was granted, restraining defendant from operating or drilling the said well, which injunction was made permanent on April 9, 1926.

A dispute arose between the parties as to the meaning of the word "approximately," as used in the contract, and also as to whether defendant was required by the terms of the contract to pay for the cost of an additional string of casing required to deepen the well to an actual depth of 3,600 feet. Appellant claims that, in the event a satisfactory production of oil was not secured at a depth of 3,300 feet, the defendant was at all times willing to deepen the well to an actual depth of 3,600 feet, provided plaintiff would pay for the additional string of casing; but that, at all events, defendant was denied the opportunity to recoup its expenses by deepening the well to 3,600 feet, the well having failed of production at 3,300 feet. Appellant contends that it was error for the trial court to exclude evidence showing the conduct and understanding of the parties in regard to the deepening of another well under a similar contract in the same field. Defendant offered to show that prior to entering into the contract concerned in this case the parties discussed the deepening of an adjoining well known as No. 6, and that Mr. Mellon, president of the plaintiff company, stated they would be liberal in the interpretation, just as they were in No. 6, in which there was a variation of 230 feet from the stipulated depth. Defendant further offered to show that defendant, with the approval of the state mining bureau, placed in well No. 6 one combination string of 4¾ inch casing, as provided in the present contract, and that was what the parties had in mind when they executed the present contract. Defendant also offered to prove the circumstances surrounding the transaction, including a statement of the condition of the well furnished by plaintiff as to the requirements for casing materials.

[1-3] A contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made and the matter to which it related. Civ. Code, § 1647. According to the terms of the contract, the defendant agreed to deepen the well "to a depth of approximately 3,600 feet." In Ross v. Keaton Tire & Rubber Co., 57 Cal. App. 50, 206 P. 645, the trial court was directed to take evidence of the surrounding circumstances of the transaction in order to determine the meaning of the parties in using the word "approximately." The court said, at page 56 (206 P. 648): "The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered, if the parties are so advised, wherein, if had, the trial court is directed to construe the clause specifying a building 'to cost approximately $21,000' as an agreed estimate of such cost, the variation from which should be determined upon proper and competent evidence received touching the surrounding circumstances of the transaction; practical construction of the lease by the parties, if any; amount of increased cost of the building due to defendant's acts in changing the plans and specifications, if any, and for which, under the circumstances made to appear, it should be required to respond, and such other evidence as the court may deem proper." One of the issues in the instant case is whether the defendant was required by the terms of the contract to deepen the well to an actual depth of 3,600 feet or suffer forfeiture. Evidence showing the conduct and understanding of the parties under a similar contract was relevant to the issue. Lobree v. White Lumber Co., 53 Cal. App. 85, 199 P. 821. Any evidence showing the probability or improbability of an issue of fact is relevant to the issue. Moody v. Peirano, 4 Cal. App. 411, 420, 88 P. 380. If the evidence excluded by the trial court had been received, we are not prepared to hold that a different decision of the case might not have been reached and the injunction denied. Having reached the conclusion that this error was prejudicial, it becomes unnecessary to discuss other questions raised on the appeal.

The judgment is reversed, except that portion thereof awarding defendant the sum of $5,000 for casing.

(Civ. 6143.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 19, 1929.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 17, 1929.

1. Mandamus 🔑10—Legal right of petitioner to mandamus must be clear, and every fact forming basis of claim to writ must be proved.

To secure a writ of mandate, the legal right of petitioner must be clear and complete, and he must prove every fact which forms the basis of his claim to the issuance of the writ.

2. Mandamus 🔑23(1)—Petitioners for writ of mandate to require delivery of corporate records can prevail only on strength of their own title.

Petitioners for writ of mandate to require delivery of corporate records can prevail only on strength of their own title, not by merely questioning right of adversary.

3. Mandamus 🔑129—Mandamus lies to compel delivery of corporate seal, books, etc., to newly elected secretary.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel delivery of corporate seal, books, etc., by former secretary to newly elected secretary of corporation.

4. Appeal and error 🔑437—Judgment requiring issuance of new stock certificate to adjudged owner is not vacated by appeal and deposit of certificate to stay judgment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 944, 946).

Judgment requiring cancellation of stock certificate and issuance of new one to person adjudged rightful owner is not vacated by appeal and deposit of new certificate with clerk of court on condition that judgment be stayed, under Code Civ. Proc. § 944, but is held in abeyance pending appeal, under section 946, and certificate is ineffective for any purpose, since reversal of judgment would render it a nullity.

5. Mandamus 🔑5—Corporation secretary, elected by vote of holder of majority stock certificate issued under suspended judgment, from which appeal was pending, held not entitled to mandamus to deliver corporate seal, books, etc., pending determination of such appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 944; Civ. Code, § 312).

Corporation and one elected secretary by vote of one adjudged rightful owner of certificate for majority of stock issued under stayed judgment, from which appeal was pending, will not be granted writ of mandate, requiring former secretary to deliver corporate seal, books, etc., to new secretary, pending appeal from such judgment, on theory that one may not go behind legal title to stock, as disclosed by corporate books, to determine ownership thereof for voting purposes, under Civ. Code, § 312, where such books showed that new stock certificate, required to be issued by such judgment, was issued and deposited with clerk to stay judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 944.

Works, P. J., dissenting.

Application by the Consumers' Salt Company and C. L. Mullholand for writ of mandate requiring J. R. Riggins to deliver the corporate seal, books, etc., to petitioners. Writ denied.

Superseding former opinion in 270 P. 392.

Harry M. Irwin, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Newby & Newby and Dee Holder, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The petitioners are a corporation organized under the laws of this state and a stockholder claiming to be the newly elected secretary, who pray a writ of mandate requiring the respondent Riggins, Mullholand's predecessor, to deliver to them the corporate seal, books, papers, etc., of said corporation. Respondent contends that his alleged successor was not legally elected, and is therefore not entitled to hold the office of secretary, or to demand possession of its records.

It appears that prior to said election and on September 16, 1927, in a suit involving the ownership of certificate No. 40, for 225,000 shares of a total of 300,010 shares outstanding of the capital stock of the corporation, judgment was rendered decreeing that one B. D. McAlvay was the rightful owner thereof, and that said certificate be canceled and a new one issued to him therefor. On November 15, 1927, the defendants in that proceeding, petitioners herein, appealed from such judgment, and respondent alleges that, solely for the purpose of staying execution pending the appeal, said certificate was canceled, a new one numbered 47, for the same number of shares, was issued in the name of McAlvay, and deposited with the clerk of the superior court. It is also alleged that the new certificate bore a statement in writing that it was issued only upon condition that judgment be stayed under the provisions of section 944 of the Code of Civil Procedure to abide its final determination, and that the same conditions were entered in writing upon the stock books of the corporation. Thereafter, and on July 16, 1928, at a stockholders' meeting, which was regularly called, Mullholand and McAlvay and three other stockholders were declared directors, for each of whom the latter voted 225,000 shares. A meeting of directors was then called for the election of officers, whereupon the petitioner Mullholand was declared elected secretary. He thereafter demanded of respondent, Riggins, the former secretary, possession of the office and its paraphernalia, which was refused.

[1, 2] It has been suggested that, since neither of the claimants of the disputed shares is contesting the right of McAlvay to have voted them, and since Riggins is merely a stockholder, he is not in a position to resist the application for this writ. This argument involves the assumption that the only person who could be heard to complain of McAlvay having voted the shares is the other claimant of their ownership, Stockwell. It is an invariable rule that to secure a writ of mandate the legal right of the petitioner to the performance of the act sought to be compelled must be clear and complete. 38 C. J. p. 582, and cases therein cited. In such a proceeding the petitioner must prove every fact that forms the basis of his claim to the issuance of the writ. 10 Cal. Jur. p. 869. The test by which the right of one applying for a writ of mandate is weighed is to inquire as to whether the right is clear. 10 Cal. Jur. p. 797. Hence the petitioners cannot prevail here by merely questioning the right of the respondent. They must prevail if at all through the strength of their own title, and a showing of a clear, convincing, and conclusive character of their own rights in the premises.

The petitioners contend that, notwithstanding the appeal, certificate No. 40 was canceled and a new one issued by action of the corporation; that the sole test of the right to ownership of stock is the entry thereof in the corporate books, and that the judgment was self-executing. Respondent insists that by appeal and deposit of said certificate the judgment was stayed, and, hence, that it was of no force or effect; that McAlvay was not the owner of the 225,000 shares which he voted for the election of Mullholand as director; and that the latter was therefore not legally qualified for the office of secretary or entitled to possession of the records demanded, the by-laws requiring that the secretary must be a director. Riggins contends that he still is secretary as a hold-over, upon the theory that a majority of the stock did not vote at the election for directors, and hence that Mullholand was not eligible to be secretary. The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure applicable to the instant controversy are as follows:

Section 943 of the Code of Civil Procedure recites, in part, as follows: "If the judgment or order appealed from direct the assignment or delivery of documents or personal property, the execution of the judgment or order cannot be stayed by appeal, unless the things required to be assigned or delivered be placed in the custody of such officer or receiver as the court may appoint, or unless an undertaking be entered into. * * *"

Section 944 provides that: "If the judgment or order appealed from, direct the execution of a conveyance or other instrument, the execution of the judgment or order cannot be stayed by the appeal until the instrument is executed and deposited with the clerk with whom the judgment or order is entered, to abide the judgment of the appellate court."

Section 946 further provides: "Whenever an appeal is perfected, as provided in the preceding sections of this chapter, it stays all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from, or upon the matters embraced therein. * * *"

[3, 4] If the petitioners are entitled to the relief prayed, we think it settled beyond question that mandamus is the proper remedy. Potomac Oil Co. v. Dye, 10 Cal. App. 534, 102 P. 677. However, the petitioners' interpretation of section 312 of the Civil Code, and decisions construing the same, that "every person * * * having stock in his own name on the stock books of the corporation at least ten days prior to the election" is entitled to vote under all circumstances, is not supported by the authorities cited. Petitioners' argument is founded upon the theory that one may not go behind the legal title of stock as disclosed by the corporate books to determine ownership for voting purposes. However, the certificate in question was issued and deposited with the clerk for the purpose of staying the operation of a judgment declaring B. D. McAlvay to be the owner, and the face of the corporate books definitely shows that fact. The judgment is not vacated by such appeal and deposit, but it is held in abeyance pending appeal, and the certificate is ineffective for any purpose, since a reversal of the judgment would render it a nullity. Di Nola v. Allison, 143 Cal. 106, 76 P. 976, 65 L. R. A. 419, 101 Am. St. Rep. 84; U. S. Oil & L. Co. v. Bell (C. C. A. 9th Cir.) 219 F. 790. This question was presented under a similar statute in Durfee v. Harper, 22 Mont. 373, 56 P. 589, wherein it was said: "The object of the law in requiring an executed certificate to be deposited with that official was to preserve the rights of parties until it might be determined by this court who owned the stock; and until such determination there could be no delivery of it, and no exercise of ownership by using those incidental rights dependent upon the decision of this court as to the ownership. A contrary ruling would oftentimes make a stay of execution by appeal valueless; for it would not stop the doing of acts to prevent which the suit may have been brought, and which, if done, are equivalent to the possession of all that the lower court may have awarded the successful party."

[5] That B. D. McAlvay is even a legal stockholder is a question depending upon a judgment which is temporarily suspended; hence the official capacities of C. L. Mullholand as director and secretary are likewise contingent upon McAlvay's title to the stock. To decide the question presented by this proceeding would require anticipation of an affirmance of the judgment upon appeal, which involves issues not before us.

The writ of mandate is denied.

I concur: IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

WORKS, P. J. (dissenting). I dissent. Both McAlvay and Stockwell have an inchoate interest in the shares of stock which the former voted at the election, which happens to be more than two-thirds in amount of the total stock outstanding. Of the two, the one who shall finally triumph on the appeal mentioned in the majority opinion has now an immense interest in the personnel of the board of directors of the corporation. It would be entirely proper if McAlvay and Stockwell have agreed that the former shall vote the stock at all stockholders' meetings until the appeal is determined. No other stockholder, if there is such an agreement, can question the right of McAlvay to act under it. It would seem, as well, that in the absence of such an agreement, if none is in existence, McAlvay would have the right to vote the stock at any meeting in default of an attempt on the part of Stockwell to do so, and thus protect his interest in the corporation in the event that the judgment in his favor shall be affirmed.

The meeting was held, McAlvay voted the stock without objection on the part of any one, the result of the election thus consummated was declared, and the meeting was adjourned. I think, on the whole, that the matter is a closed incident so far as Riggins is concerned, and that a peremptory writ of mandate should issue.

Upon the other question presented by the case I must say, also, that I am not sure that Stockwell could have voted the stock if he had come forward to do so. As what I have said above concludes the controversy, in my opinion, I am not ready to express a conclusion upon this latter point.

In action by drawee bank against collecting bank to recover amount of check containing forged indorsement paid by former in reliance on latter's clearing house indorsement, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that plaintiff agreed to refund amount of check to maker and attempted to collect amount thereof from defendant.

2. Banks and banking ⇨119—"Depositor" is one paying money into bank to be placed to his credit and subject to his check, or beneficiary of fund held by bank as trustee.

A "depositor" is one who pays money into the bank in usual course of business, to be placed to his credit and subject to his check, or the beneficiary of a fund held by a bank as trustee.

3. Banks and banking ⇨175(½)—Action by drawee bank against collecting bank based on latter's clearing house indorsement held not one by depositor against bank for payment of forged or raised check.

Action by drawee bank against collecting bank to recover amount paid by drawee on check containing forged indorsement was not one by a depositor for payment of a forged or raised check, but was based on collecting bank's clearing house indorsement.

4. Limitation of actions ⇨46(6)—Limitation against action by depositor against bank for payment of forged or raised check runs from date depositor receives canceled check (Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3).

The one-year period of limitation under Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, applicable to action by depositor against bank for payment of forged or raised check, commences to run from date depositor receives his canceled check.

Rule of statutory construction that express exception is not to be extended beyond fair import of its terms applies in considering effect of Code Civ. 7. Statutes ⇨228—An exception in statute should be strictly construed.

It is a rule of statutory construction that an exception should be strictly construed, which rule does not conflict with requirements of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 4, 1859.

8. Banks and banking ⇨154(2)—Check bearing forged indorsement held not "forged or raised check" within one-year limitation as to action for payment thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3; § 348).

Laches is a defense ordinarily peculiar to actions in equity.

10. Banks and banking ⚷175(3)—Finding that drawee bank suing collecting bank for amount paid on check bearing forged indorsement was not guilty of laches, held sustained by evidence.

In action by drawee bank against collecting bank to recover amount paid on check bearing forged indorsement in reliance on collecting bank's clearing house indorsement, evidence held to sufficiently support court's finding that drawee bank was not guilty of laches in not ascertaining true status of check until over year after its payment.

11. Banks and banking ⚷319—Banks associated together may bind themselves by rule governing effect of their indorsements, which rules will supplant law.

With respect to general effect of clearing house rules upon obligation of member banks with regard to transactions between themselves, it is perfectly competent for banks associated together to bind themselves by rules governing, as between themselves, the effect of their indorsements, and such rules as to them will supplant the law.

12. Banks and banking ⚷320—Collecting bank held liable under its clearing house indorsement to drawee bank paying check bearing forged indorsement; "valid;" "regular;" "sufficient."

Under clearing house rule providing that clearing house indorsement guarantees validity, regularity, and sufficiency of all prior indorsements, held that collecting bank was liable to drawee bank for amount paid by drawee bank on check containing forged indorsement in reliance on collecting bank's clearing house indorsement; a "valid" indorsement meaning one having binding force, authority by law, legally efficacious; "regular" meaning duly authorized; and "sufficient" meaning competent or adequate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by the Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles against the Continental National Bank of Los Angeles. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Root & Bettin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Loeb, Walker & Loeb, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ in support of appellant.

Nolan, Rohe & Freston and Page, Nolan, Rohe & Hurt, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers and Rohe & Freston, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ in support of respondent.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action by respondent bank seeking to recover from appellant bank the amount of a check drawn upon and paid by the former, after indorsement by the latter, under circumstances to be hereinafter related. The trial in the court below was had upon a stipulation as to the facts, which was supplemented by the testimony of but one witness, the assistant cashier of respondent bank. From the findings of the learned trial court, which closely follow said stipulation, the facts are ascertained to be as follows:

On October 14, 1921, the Title Guarantee & Trust Company drew its check upon respondent bank, with which it had deposits ample to cover payment thereof, in the sum of $1,651.60, payable to Camille Sentous, administrator of the estate of Mary Billings, and handed said check to one Carroll E. King for delivery to Mr. Sentous. King was at that time a practicing attorney at law, and was attorney of record for the administrator, continuing as such until September, 1922. Instead of delivering the check to the administrator, King, without right or authority from any one, and some time between the 14th and the 20th of October, indorsed the check as follows:

"Camille Sentous Administrator of the estate of Mary Billings by Carroll E. King his attorney

"Carroll E. King Special"

King at this time, and for some time prior thereto, had carried an account with appellant bank under the name of "Carroll E. King, Special." On October 19, 1921, King deposited four checks with appellant bank, of which the check above referred to was one, making a total deposit of $1,799.96, and up to the 25th of October, 1921, King had on deposit in said bank $2,400. From the 26th of October, 1921, to the 18th of November, 1921, his deposit balance exceeded $1,000, and from the latter date to the 28th of November it exceeded $800. The check in question was accepted by appellant bank without requiring any proof or indentification as to the truth or character of the indorsement above set forth, or of any authority on the part of King to receive payment on the check or credit upon its deposit, and the amount of the check was placed by the appellant to the credit of King in his special account, and no part of the sum called for therein was paid by appellant bank to the payee.

Both banks were members of the Los Angeles Clearing House Association, which is an association of banks having a constitution, by-laws, rules, and regulations, among the purposes of which is to settle from day to day the mutual banking demand of its members through the ascertaining, striking, and liquidations of balances between them, and the effecting of daily exchanges between member banks, which practice is known as "clearing." The rules of the clearing house, in so far as such rules have application to the instant case, provide as follows:

"All negotiable paper deposited for clearance by the members of this association shall bear the stamp of the depositing member, which shall clearly indicate the name of the member, its Clearing House number and the date of clearance. The stamp shall be for clearing house purposes only, and shall guarantee the validity, regularity and sufficiency of all prior indorsements on all paper so cleared, except the indorsement of an original payee of a Certificate of Deposit, and it shall not be construed to supply a missing indorsement. * * *"

On October 20, 1921, appellant bank indorsed the check in question as follows, using for that purpose its clearing house stamp:

"Continental National Bank

Pay only through Los Angeles Clearing House

Oct. 20 1921,
Los Angeles, California
78"

—and on the same day the check was cleared by the association, being charged against respondent bank and credited to the appellant bank in the accounts of that day, and in this manner the amount thereof was paid by respondent bank to appellant bank, respondent bank charging the account of the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, the drawer of the check, with the amount thereof, and on or about October 24, 1921, returning the original check to said drawer.

On September 15, 1922, the attention of respondent bank was for the first time called to the irregularity of the indorsement of the check, and respondent on that date made an oral demand upon appellant for the payment thereof upon the ground that the check had been paid by appellant bank without a proper indorsement by the payee named in the check. This oral demand was followed on September 30, 1922, by a second demand upon appellant bank for the payment of the check, which demand was refused. The attention of respondent bank was called to the irregular indorsement by Mr. Sentous on or about September 15, 1922, who then demanded payment to himself as administrator. Mr. Maurer, the assistant cashier of the respondent bank, told Mr. Sentous that he would have to make a demand on the title company, and that "when they made demand on us we would pay them." On September 30, 1922, Sentous presented to respondent a written demand for payment of the amount of the check, together with an affidavit that the indorsement was forged. The affidavit was handed back to Sentous and was again presented to respondent on November 8 by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company and on that date respondent bank paid the amount of the check to said title company. The title company had previous to this, and on the 30th of September, 1922, demanded that respondent credit the account of the payee of the check with the amount thereof. The stipulation as to the facts states that immediately upon receipt of the demand of September 15, 1922, made by the payee upon respondent, respondent "investigated the character and truth or regularity of said indorsement, and of the right of the said Carroll E. King to make the same, and found the said indorsement to have been made without the authority of the maker or payee of said check." On December 13, 1922, respondent commenced the present action.

In seeking a reversal of the judgment, appellant makes a number of points, having to do with alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support certain of the findings. It is also contended that respondent bank is barred by laches; that payment of the check by respondent bank was a voluntary payment for which no recovery can be had; also that both banks were equally at fault and respondent was not entitled to recover upon the theory of money paid by mistake, and that recovery should not have been had upon the theory that appellant bank was liable by reason of its indorsement of the check, since, as it is claimed, the forged indorsement was in legal effect a "missing indorsement," and under the clearing house rules appellant bank's indorsement could not be construed to supply a missing indorsement, and was therefore of no binding effect.

[1] Taking up first the objections made to the findings, appellant contends that the court erred in finding that on September 30, 1922, respondent agreed to refund the amount of the check to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, and, by proceedings initiated on the 15th of September, 1922, the plaintiff attempted to collect the amount thereof from the appellant. The agreed statement of facts recites that on or about September 15, 1922, the payee (Mr. Sentous, administrator) demanded of respondent that it credit him with the amount of the check upon the ground that it had been paid by respondent without proper indorsement and that on the 30th of September, 1922, the title Guarantee & Trust Company, the maker of the check, likewise demanded that the respondent credit the account of Mr. Sentous as administrator with the amount of the check; that on September 15, 1922, respondent advised appellant of these demands for payment and in turn demanded payment from the appellant.

The testimony of Mr. Maurer is that on September 15, 1922, Mr. Maurer, who was the only officer of respondent bank who handled the transaction, stated to Mr. Sentous "that he had to make demand on the title company and when they made demand on us we would pay them." (Italics ours.) He further testified that he did not actually pay Mr. Sentous the money until the 30th of September, which was the day he presented the affidavit. With reference to the demands made by respondent bank upon appellant bank, the stipulation as to the facts states: "That also on September 15, 1922, plaintiff herein advised defendant that demand had been made upon the plaintiff herein for the payment of said sum of $1,651.60 for the reasons aforesaid, and made demand upon the defendant herein for the payment to the plaintiff by the defendant of said sum of $1,651.60." This evidence, we believe, is amply sufficient to sustain the finding complained of.

It is next argued that the court erred in making its thirteenth finding of fact. This finding may be thus separated into its component parts:

(a) "That this action is not one by a depositor against a bank for the payment of a forged or raised check;"

(b) "That it is not true that the plaintiff paid the claim upon which this action is based after the statute of limitations (sec. 340, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc.) had barred the same;"

(c) "That it is not true that the payment by respondent to the maker of the check was without right or authority and contrary to statute and that it is not true that it was a mere voluntary payment."

The above findings, while directly responsive to issues tendered by the appellant's answer, are really conclusions as to the law rather than statements of ultimate facts, but, inasmuch as the questions involved, which are also presented by some of appellant's other points, are of extreme importance to the solution of the problems presented on this appeal, they may as well be taken up under a discussion of appellant's objections to the findings.

[2, 3] As to the first portion of the findings, appellant has furnished us with no authority for its position that the present action is one by a "depositor" against a bank. There is nothing in the record to indicate that respondent bank was at any time a depositor of appellant bank.

A "depositor" is one who pays money into a bank in the usual course of business, to be placed to his credit and subject to his check (State v. Corning State Savings Bank, 136 Iowa, 79, 113 N. W. 500; Anheuser-Busch Brewing Ass'n v. Clayton (C. C. A.) 56 F. 759; Com. v. Sponsler, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 116), or the beneficiary of a fund held by a bank as trustee (Kimball v. Norton, 59 N. H. 1, 47 Am. Rep. 171). See, also, Murphy v. Pacific Bank, 130 Cal. 542, 62 P. 1059.

Tested by this definition, it is evident that this portion of the finding was correct.

The action is by a drawee bank against a collecting bank to recover money paid by the former in reliance upon the latter's clearing house indorsement.

We next come to the question of the application of the statute of limitations (section 340, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc.) to the respondent's cause of action. It is not claimed that respondent's cause of action is itself barred by the provisions of the statute, but that the Code section in question would have been a bar to any action by the maker of the check against respondent, and hence that respondent's payment of the amount thereof to Mr. Sentous, the payee named therein, upon the demand of the maker, Title Guarantee & Trust Company, not being a payment under compulsion, was a mere voluntary payment for which no recovery can be had. A discussion of these points involves two lines of inquiry: First, does section 340, subd. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure apply to the sort of action which the Title Guarantee & Trust Company would have been compelled to bring to enforce its demand had respondent bank refused to make the check good? Second, if that section was applicable, did the promise made by respondent bank to refund the amount of the check to the maker take the claim of the latter out of the statute?

Appellant's contention that respondent's payment of the amount of the check to the payee (on demand of the maker) was a voluntary payment, on account of which no recovery can be had, is based entirely on the premise that section 340, subd. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, would have applied as a bar to any action which the maker might have brought to enforce such payment. The argument is that a payment made after the period of limitations has passed is one not resting upon any legal obligation or made under any legal necessity. Stone v. Hammell, 83 Cal. 547, 23 P. 703, 8 L. R. A. 425, 17 Am. St. Rep. 272; Schlitz v. Thomas, 61 Cal. App. 635, 216 P. 51. Section 340, subd. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the time within which certain actions must be commenced, in so far as it is here involved, is as follows: "Within one year. * * * 3. An action * * * by a depositor against a bank for the payment of a forged or raised check."

hence, if section 340, subd. 3, Code of Civil Procedure, applied, the cause of action of the maker against respondent bank would have been barred on October 24, 1922.

By the express provisions of section 348, Code of Civil Procedure, there is no limitation to the time within which an action may be brought to recover money deposited with a bank. This was the law in California from 1873, when this section in its original form was added to the Code, until 1905, when, by an amendment to section 340 of the same Code, which up to that time had contained no reference to actions by depositors against banks, the Legislature made an exception to the general rule laid down in section 348, taking from its purview but one class of actions by depositors against banks, namely, those "for the payment of a forged or raised check," and leaving all other classes of actions by depositors still without time limitation.

[5, 6] The provisions of the Code—indeed of all the Codes—are to be construed with relation to each other "as though all such codes had been passed at the same moment of time and were parts of the same statute." Pol. Code, § 4480; People v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 83 Cal. 393, 23 P. 303; and Miller v. Engle, 3 Cal. App. 325, 85 P. 159. That is to say, the Codes must be construed as a single statute. McKay v. McKay, 125 Cal. 65, 57 P. 677. Hence the rule of statutory construction that an express exception is not to be extended beyond the fair import of its terms (Perry v. Ames, 26 Cal. 372; Mordecai v. Board of Supervisors, 183 Cal. 434, 192 P. 40) applies in considering the effect of section 340, subd. 3, as an exception to the general rule laid down by section 348, and it must be presumed that the Legislature in enacting the amendment to section 340 intended to create no exception other than that therein in terms specified (Tynan v. Walker, 35 Cal. 634, 95 Am. Dec. 152), since an express exception excludes all others. "The expression of one thing is the exclusion of another; and consequently no further exception was intended." Brocket v. Ohio etc., R. R. Co., 14 Pa. 241, 53 Am. Dec. 534; Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 494.

[7] It is another rule of statutory construction that an exception should be strictly construed (Id.), and this rule is in no way opposed to the requirement for liberal construction of the Code (section 4, Code Civ. Proc.) or to the rule that in the construction of a statute a particular provision, inconsistent with a general provision, is paramount to the latter (section 1859, Code Civ. Proc.).

[8] With these principles in mind, the next question to be answered is this: Had respondent bank refused payment to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company or order, and had the latter been compelled to resort to the courts for redress, would its action have been an action by a depositor against a bank for the payment of a forged or raised check? We have italicized the words "forged or raised," for there is no question but that the action would have been one by a depositor against a bank since as the trial court found "* * * said Title Guarantee and Trust Company, the maker of said check had and maintained an account and funds on deposit with the plaintiff bank. * * *" The only question in this connection is whether such action would have been for payment of a "forged or raised check."

There is neither proof nor contention in the record that the face of the check when presented was in any way altered as to amount, name of payee or of maker, or otherwise. The sole defect was the forged indorsement written on the reverse side of the paper.

A check is defined as "a bill of exchange drawn on a bank payable on demand" (section 3265a, Civ. Code), and "a bill of exchange is an unconditional order in writing addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time a sum certain in money to order or bearer" (section 3207, Civ. Code). The instrument involved in this case was therefore complete in itself without any indorsement. First Nat. Bank v. U. S. Nat. Bank, 100 Or. 264, 197 P. 547, 14 A. L. R. 479. An indorsement is not, under the above definition, an essential part of a check; it need not even be written on the instrument, itself, but may be "upon a paper attached thereto." Section 3112, Civ. Code. "The forgery of the indorsements was entirely distinct from the issuance of the checks on false demands, and there was no relation between them." Los Angeles Investment Co. v. Home Savings Bank, 180 Cal. 601, 610, 182 P. 293, 297 (5 A. L. R. 1193).

We are of the opinion that the presence of a forged indorsement does not make an otherwise unaltered check, bearing the genuine signature of the maker "a forged or raised check" within the meaning of section 340, subd. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that, had the Legislature intended to extend the exception to the general rule laid down in section 348 of the same Code, it would have so indicated by apt words. In this opinion we are fortified by the reasoning of the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District of this state, as well as by well-considered cases from other jurisdictions.

In the very recent case of Atwell v. Mercantile Trust Co. (Cal. App.) 272 P. 799, the action was by a depositor against a bank to recover the amount of checks issued by the depositor and paid by the bank upon forged indorsements. The bank pleaded the bar of section 340, subd. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The point presented for decision was thus identical with the question here under discussion. The court noted that section 340 "covers a special class of cases and is an exception to the general rule" promulgated by section 348 and proceeded to discuss the development of the law relating to the duties and obligations existing as between banks and their depositors as throwing light upon the question of the legislative intent in adopting this exception to the rule. The court further said:

"The execution of a check and the execution of an indorsement are distinct. The first is the act of the maker and the second is the act of the payee. A check is complete as a check without an indorsement. A check is defined as a 'bill of exchange * * * payable on demand.' Section 3265 (a), Civil Code. An indorsement 'must be written on the instrument itself or upon a paper attached thereto.' Section 3112, Civil Code. The history of the development of the law relating to the duties and obligations between banks and depositors, briefly referred to in the above decisions, leads to the conclusion that the words 'forged or raised' check, as used in these statutes and in our own statute, do not refer to a 'forged indorsement.' * * *

"Counsel for appellant urges that the unauthorized indorsement and cashing of the checks in this case constituted forgery under the provisions of sections 470 and 476 of the Penal Code. That the indorsements were forged is conceded by respondent, and the trial court made findings to that effect. The question, however, is not whether forgery was committed in the indorsing and cashing of the check, but rather whether this is a case of a 'forged or raised' check within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

In Kleinman v. Chase Nat. Bank, 124 Misc. Rep. 173, 207 N. Y. S. 191, the Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Term, had the same question before it. Section 326, Negotiable Instruments Law of New York (Consol. Laws, c. 38), provided: "No bank shall be liable to a depositor for the payment by it of a forged or raised check, unless within one year after the return to the depositor of the voucher of such payment, such depositor shall notify the bank that the check so paid was forged or raised."

The court there said:

"It is conceded that the bank received no notice of the forged indorsement from plaintiff until some two years after the bank's cancelled checks or vouchers were returned to him. Obviously, therefore, if section 326 comprehends within its scope forged indorsements, the plaintiff is estopped from now asserting his claim against the bank. Our view, however, is that the notice required to be given in section 326 is limited to cases where payment is made of a check upon which the maker's signature is forged or the check is raised.

"The commonly accepted meaning of the words 'a forged check' in the commercial world is a check upon which the maker's name is forged. It is manifest by a consideration of the reason for the enactment of section 326 of the Negotiable Instruments Law, as well as the commonly accepted meaning of the words 'forged check,' that the legislature intended to limit the requirement to give notice to cases where payment is made on a check upon which the maker's signature is forged and did not intend to extend the statute to include forged indorsements. Before the enactment of section 326, our common-law rule was that the depositor as maker owed the bank the duty to make a reasonably careful examination of his cancelled checks or vouchers and notify the bank within a reasonable time thereafter. The time of notice thus was flexible, depending upon the circumstances in each case. (See Morgan v. U. S. Mort. & Trust Co., 208 N. Y. 218, 101 N. E. 871, L. R. A. 1915D, 741, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 462).

"A check possesses the attributes of a contract and certain characteristics of property. It is essentially a commercial paper. It was the legislative purpose in enacting section 326 in response to the needs of business stability to make definite and inflexible the time when the drawee bank must be notified by the maker of its payment of a check upon which his name is forged. The act is in derogation of the common law, hence must be strictly construed. At common law the maker depositor owes no duty to the bank to make inquiry or examine as to any forged indorsement upon his returned voucher because as to indorsements he has ordinarily no greater knowledge or information than the bank. (Prudential Ins. Co. v. Nat. Bank of Commerce, 227 N. Y. 510 [125 N. E. 824, 15 A. L. R. 146]; Critten v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 171 N. Y. 219 [63 N. E. 969, 57 L. R. A. 529]; [Welsh] v. German-Am. Bank, 73 N. Y. 424 [29 Am. Rep. 175]). If the legislature intended to modify this common-law maxim to the extent of imposing upon the depositor the onerous and unreasonable duty to detect within a year forged indorsements, it would have stated it explicitly. Such intended modification cannot be found in the express words of the statute nor can it be fairly implied from the text. (North British & Mercantile Ins. Co. v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 161 App. Div. 341 [146 N. Y. S. 720]). We are thus in accord with the view of the court below that section 326 had no application to payments made by a bank upon a forged indorsement and the judgment against the defendant Chase National Bank is affirmed."

An Iowa statute (section 9266, Iowa Code of 1924), identical in wording with the New York statute quoted above, except that it provided a six months' limitation, was involved in the case of McCornack v. Central State Bank, 203 Iowa, 833, 211 N. W. 542, 52 A. L. R. 1297. The court there said:

"This section was in force at the time the check in question was cashed as section 1889a, Code supplement of 1913. It is claimed appellee's cause of action is barred under this statute. Prior to the enactment of the statute, we had held, in German Savings Bank v. Bank, supra [101 Iowa, 530, 70 N. W. 769, 63 Am. St. Rep. 399], that a depositor was under no duty to the bank as to the genuineness of an indorsement. We said:

" 'The check was returned with an apparent genuine indorsement of Quinlan. The fact that intervener had paid the money thereon, and presumably had satisfied itself that the indorsement of Quinlan was genuine, as it was in duty bound to do, was a further reason why plaintiff should not, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary, have concerned itself as to the genuineness of the indorsement of Quinlan's name thereon. Furthermore, the plaintiff owed no duty to the defendant, or to the intervener, as to the genuineness of the indorsement of Quinlan.' [Citing many authorities.] * * *

"The statute does not, we think, change this rule in respect to the genuineness of the signature of indorsers. The indorsement is no part of the check as made by the drawer, although it is, of course, contemplated that the payee must indorse it. But, since the maker is not required to know the signature of the payee, and has a right to issue the check payable to the order of one unknown to him, relying on the bank to pay only in accordance with his direction, a forged indorsement does not make the check a 'forged check' within the meaning of the statute. In Union Tool Co. v. Farmers & Mer. Nat. Bank, 192 Cal. 40 [218 P. 424, 28 A. L. R. 1417] cited by appellant, there was, in addition to a forged indorsement, an alteration on the face of the check. We are of the opinion the action is not barred by the statute in question."

A case somewhat analogous, although not precisely in point, is State v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 145 Minn. 322, 177 N. W. 135. The state had sued a bank which had cashed certain voucher warrants upon forged indorsements and later presenting the same to the state treasurer for redemption, who had thereupon redeemed them. The bank invoked section 6378, General Statutes of Minnesota 1913, which was identical with the Iowa statute quoted hereinabove. While holding that the instruments in question were not checks nor were they charged to a depositor's account, the court said of the statutory provision referred to: "By its terms, it applies only to forgery of the name of the depositor to a check purporting to have been drawn on a bank by a depositor, and paid by the bank, and charged to the depositor's account."

Appellant, in contending for the application of section 340, subd. 3, Code of Civil Procedure, to the cause of action which the Title Guarantee & Trust Company would have had against respondent bank, relies strongly upon Union Tool Co. v. Farmers & Merchants Nat. Bank, supra, in which the Supreme Court held that, "Where the action is one to recover money deposited with a bank and not paid out by it on a check claimed to have been forged or raised, the provisions of section 348 apply. To the special case where the action arises because of payment on a check which the plaintiff asserts was forged or raised, the special provision of subdivision 3 of section 340 applies." The Union Tool Company Case was also relied upon by the appellant in Atwell v. Mercantile Trust Co., supra, and the court there very clearly distinguished it from the case under discussion. The Union Tool Company Case was considered and the distinction clearly brought out in the case of McCornack v. Central State Bank, 203 Iowa, 833, 211 N. W. 542, 52 A. L. R. 1297.

In view of our holding on the question above discussed, it seems unnecessary to enter into any extended discussion as to the effect of the promise of respondent bank to refund the amount of the check to the maker thereof as taking the latter's claim out of the statute of limitations. It may be pointed out, however, that, if the provisions of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure, did apply, such promise, having been verbal, would not have availed to remove the bar of the statute. Section 360, Code Civ. Proc.

[9] Appellant makes the points that the court below erred in finding that respondent "was not guilty of laches in not ascertaining the true status of said check until September 15, 1922; that plaintiff was not careless and negligent in allowing said check to pass through its clearings; that plaintiff was not careless and negligent in allowing one year and eighteen days to elapse without informing himself and the defendant of the alleged true status of said check"; and that in fact and as a matter of law respondent was guilty of laches. Laches is a defense ordinarily peculiar to actions in equity. Suhr v. Lauterbach, 164 Cal. 591, 130 P. 2; Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 P. 516. Conceding that this case is an action in equity rather than one at law (Crocker Woolworth Bank v. Nevada Bank, 139 Cal. 564, 73 P. 456, 63 L. R. A. 245, 96 Am. St. Rep. 169), we think these points are not well taken.

[10] We cannot agree that the court's finding of the absence of laches was a mere legal conclusion. The court, in addition to the finding "the plaintiff was not guilty of laches," found as to specific facts upon which the finding above quoted was based, namely, that the check was drawn and delivered to King for Sentous on October 14, 1921, presented by King to the appellant bank for deposit in King's account between October 14 and 20, 1921, bearing the forged indorsement, indorsed by appellant bank with its clearing house stamp and deposited by it with the clearing house and charged against respondent on October 20, 1921, and on the same day charged by the respondent to the account of the maker; that prior to September 15, 1922, respondent had no notice or knowledge that the check had been improperly paid or that the indorsement was a forgery, and that on September 15, 1922, the payee named in the check demanded of respondent that it credit him with the amount thereof upon the ground that the check had been paid without proper indorsement by said payee; that on the same day the respondent bank advised the appellant bank of Mr. Sentous' demand and made demand upon appellant for payment to respondent of the amount of the check, and that on the 30th of September the maker of the check likewise demanded that respondent bank credit the payee's account with the amount of the check; that on September 30, 1922, appellant bank refused to accede to the demand of the respondent bank to refund the amount of said check and that on November 8, 1922, respondent paid the amount of the check.

Elsewhere in this opinion we will take up the matter of appellant bank's liability upon the clearing house indorsement and of the right of respondent bank to rely thereon. Suffice it here to say that the evidence, including the stipulation as to facts, sufficiently supports the court's finding above referred to, and that it appears therefrom that respondent bank had no actual notice that any indorsement prior to that of appellant bank was defective or forged until its attention was called to that fact by Mr. Sentous on the 15th of September, whereupon respondent bank immediately took the matter up with appellant bank and made demand for reimbursement.

While liable to its depositor, Title Guarantee & Trust Company, respondent bank was not, as to appellant bank, required to look beyond appellant's indorsement and inquire into the validity of prior indorsements, it had no actual notice of any irregularity in regard to the check until its attention was called thereto by the payee, Mr. Sentous, on September 15, 1922, and immediately upon being advised of such irregularity it reported the same to appellant and demanded payment from the latter. What greater degree of promptness it could have been expected to exercise it is difficult to imagine.

Having disposed of these problems, we now come to that of appellant bank's liability on its clearing house indorsement. As to this phase of the case, appellant contends: (a) That the indorsement made by King was void and therefore tantamount to a "missing indorsement," and as such not within the guarantee specified by the clearing house rules; (b) that respondent should not have recovered on the theory of mistake; and (c) that, even assuming the indorsement should not be regarded as a "missing indorsement" no recovery should have been had upon the appellant bank's clearing house indorsement. Inasmuch as the first and third of these contentions involve a construction of the clearing house rules and their legal effect, we shall first consider these points.

[11] We have heretofore quoted the only clearing house rule involved in this controversy, and it will be recalled that it provides that the clearing house stamp shall guarantee (1) the validity, (2) the regularity, and (3) the sufficiency of all prior indorsements, and that it shall not be construed to supply a missing indorsement. As to the general effect of clearing house rules upon the obligation of member banks with regard to transactions between themselves, it has been held that "it is perfectly competent for banks associated together to bind themselves by rules governing, as between themselves, the effect of their indorsements, and these rules as to them will supplant the law." Crocker-Woolworth Bank v. Nevada Bank, 139 Cal. 564, 73 P. 456, 63 L. R. A. 245, 96 Am. St. Rep. 169; First National Bank v. United States National Bank, 100 Or. 264, 197 P. 547, 14 A. L. R. 479.

[12] There is a clear distinction between the liability of a collecting bank to a drawee bank upon the former's clearing house indorsement, in the case of a check which is forged as to the name of the drawer or payee or which has been raised, and its liability in the case of a forged indorsement. This distinction is apparent upon a perusal of the cases of Crocker-Woolworth Nat. Bank v. Nevada Bank, 139 Cal. 564, 73 P. 456, 63 L. R. A. 245, 96 Am. St. Rep. 169, Union Tool Co. v. Farmers and Merchants Nat. Bank, 192 Cal. 40, 218 P. 424, 28 A. L. R. 1417, and First Nat. Bank v. U. S. National Bank, 100 Or. 264, 197 P. 547, 14 A. L. R. 479. In the first named of these cases, the court pointed out that under clearing house rules identical with those involved in this action there is eliminated from the warranty of indorsement the Code provision that the instrument indorsed "is in all respects what it purports to be"; "in other words," the court says, "the indorsement does not, of itself, import an undertaking that the check has not been altered; and in proceedings to recover back the amount paid on an altered check the indorsement could not be made the foundation of the action, as importing a promise to refund the money, in case it should afterwards appear that the amount in the body of the check had been fraudulently altered." Crocker-Woolworth National Bank v. Nevada Bank, quoting from Redington v. Woods, 45 Cal. 428, 13 Am. Rep. 190. (Italics are those appearing in the opinion quoted from.) The facts in the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank Case were as follows: On December 9, 1895, the Bank of Woodland, in Yolo county, drew its check upon the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank in San Francisco for $12 to the order of one Dean; Dean was a depositor of the Nevada Bank; he fraudulently altered the check by changing its date to December 13 and raising its amount from $12 to $22,000, and on December 17 he indorsed the check and deposited it with the Nevada Bank, which thereupon credited his account with the amount of the check; on the same day the Nevada Bank put its clearing house stamp on the check, which found its way in regular course from the clearing house to the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank, which was the San Francisco correspondent of the Bank of Woodland, and had funds of the latter on deposit; the check was honored under the clearing house rules by the payment to the clearing house of the balance found due, the Nevada Bank receiving the credit due it; the next day Dean drew $20,000 from his account at the Nevada Bank and absconded; on January 3, 1896, the Crocker-Woolworth Bank informed the Bank of Woodland of the payment of the check, which promptly notified the Crocker-Woolworth Bank that no such check had been drawn; the Nevada Bank was immediately notified, and repayment was demanded therefrom. We recite these facts in order that it may be clearly understood that in reversing a judgment in favor of the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank, which sued to recover from the collecting bank, the court had before it a case differing from the instant case in this very important particular, to wit, that, as clearly pointed out by the Supreme Court in its opinion, the banking house rules did not purport to make the clearing house indorsement a guaranty of anything other than that stated in the clearing house rules, namely, the validity, regularity, and sufficiency of all prior indorsements. The court there pointed out that a clearing house indorsement under the rule of the clearing house is not such indorsement as is specified in section 3116 of the Civil Code as it then stood, and that the clearing house rule is an express limitation of the effect of the indorsement. The fact must not be overlooked that Dean was the payee named in the originally valid check, and that the indorsement was a genuine indorsement by himself.

In Union Tool Co. v. Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank the situation was different. The checks there involved and which were drawn against the Union Tool Company's account in the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank were, after altering the name of the payee, indorsed with the name of the altered payee and again indorsed by the forger by writing his own name thereon, and thereafter deposited by him with the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank. The latter placed its clearing house indorsement upon the checks in question. In the suit by the maker of the checks against the bank upon which they were drawn, the Hellman Bank intervened. The latter bank was in the same position with regard to the transaction as is appellant bank in the present case. The judgment of the trial court was in favor of the plaintiff and against the drawee, Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank, and in favor of the latter bank and against the intervening Hellman Bank. In other words, the court there held that the maker of the checks was entitled to recover as against the bank upon which he had drawn, and that the latter bank was entitled to recover as against the collecting bank. After adverting to the well-settled rule that, as between a bank and its depositor, the bank is only warranted in paying out the money of the depositor on his genuine order and in accordance therewith, and that no degree of care upon the part of the bank will excuse it from liability, the court went on to hold that the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank was guilty of negligence by reason of which the maker was entitled to recover, and said:

"The intervener, Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, can be in no better position with respect to the defenses pleaded than can the Farmers and Merchants Bank; they both rest upon the same facts and the same law with reference thereto. In a case involving a similar principle it was said: 'The defendant bank is in no better attitude to defend against the government's demand than would have been the banks which advanced the money to McCoy upon his forged indorsements. Those banks had the opportunity to discover the facts that it was their duty to do so. Had they investigated, they would have discovered that the holder of those checks had no legal title to them, and was not an authorized payee." (United States v. National Bank of Commerce of Seattle, 205 F. 433, 437, 123 C. C. A. 501. See, also, Harmon v. Old Detroit Nat. Bank, 153 Mich. 73, 116 N. W. 617, 17 L. R. A. [N. S.] 514, 126 Am. St. Rep. 467.) The evidence shows that the intervener, Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, failed to exercise proper care to ascertain whether or not C. H. Mueller had indorsed any of the checks here involved. It in effect, took the word of the forger, paid him the money, guaranteed all indorsements on the checks, and forwarded them through the clearing-house for the collection from the Farmers and Merchants Bank. Referring again to the case of United States v. National Bank of Commerce of Seattle, supra, it is there held that where a forged check was cashed by a bank other than that on which it was drawn, such bank was negligent in failing to discover the forgery and in not requiring identification of the payee, and could not urge in defense of its liability to refund the money that the drawer of the check was negligent in failing promptly to discover the fraud. To quote from the opinion in that case, it was said: 'It was their duty to ascertain whether there was such a person as the payee named in the checks, and to know that the person who presented the checks was entitled to receive the payment thereof. They made no investigation, required no identification, and took no precaution. They paid the money negligently, and at their own risk, and the defendant bank in choosing to rely upon the identification of the payee by the banks which cashed the checks did so at its own risk.' And in this respect The Farmers and Merchants Bank was also guilty of negligence, for, although thoroughly equipped to do so, it took no pains to learn if the indorsements on the checks were genuine, depending, according to the custom of banks, where checks have passed through clearing houses, upon the responsibility of the preceding indorsements."

In First National Bank v. U. S. National Bank, supra, the situation was very similar to that in this case. Blank checks of the form used by the Willamette Iron & Steel Works had been stolen. They were filled out by the thieves and were signed with a forged signature purporting to be that of the officer of the steel works whose duty it was to sign pay checks. These checks were drawn upon the First National Bank with which the steel works was a depositor. They were passed on various merchants in Portland who had accounts with the United States National Bank and who in due course deposited them there in their respective accounts. The United States National Bank stamped on each of the checks an impression of its clearing house stamp, and they were presented by the Portland Clearing House to the First National Bank for payment and paid in the usual manner. Thereafter, the First National Bank being notified that the checks were forgeries and that the indorsements thereon were likewise forged, credited its depositor, the steel works, with the amount thereof which it had previously charged against its account, and demand for repayment by the United States National Bank being refused, brought suit to recover. The Supreme Court of Oregon delivered a long and well-considered opinion, too long to be here quoted, and held that, under the general principles of the law relating to payment by mistake, the First National Bank would not have been entitled to recover, and that a clearing house indorsement (clearing house rules identical with those here involved) does not guarantee the genuineness of the drawer's signature, and that the First National Bank was not entitled to recover, for the reason that the checks in question were never at any time valid. In so holding, however, the court recognized the rule that, where the defect consists in a forged indorsement, recovery can be had under the clearing house guaranty. In summing up, the court used this language, which we think bears out the above statement:

"We may summarize the foregoing decision as follows: The doctrine of Price v. Neal [3 Burr. 1354, 97 Eng. Reprint 871], is adopted by the Negotiable Instruments Law; and consequently a drawee who pays bears the risk of the drawer's signature being a forgery. If, however, the drawee is innocent of actual fault, and the holder is chargeable with bad faith or negligence, the drawee's hands are untied and he can compel the holder to refund. It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the defendant was guilty of negligence on account of its failure to detect the forgery of the signature of the drawer, even though the defendant had among its files the genuine signature of the drawer. If the checks are considered alone, and the rules of the clearing house are for the moment eliminated, we find that the act of presenting the checks for payment is neither a representation nor a warranty made by the holder to the drawee that the signature of the drawer was genuine, and we further find that the indorsements placed by the holder upon the back of the checks did not constitute representations or warranties of the genuineness of the drawer's signature. The holder must refund where he has received payment on a forged indorsement of the check, if the check bore the genuine signature of the drawer. The obligation to refund payment received on a forged indorsement exists whether the checks are considered alone or in connection with the clearing house rules. If the checks are considered alone, the rules of the common law enable the drawee to recover; if the checks are considered in connection with the clearing house rules, the drawee can recover on the guaranty which the clearing house rules attach to the indorsement of the holder. But the rule which permits a drawee to recover payment made on a forged indorsement is not available to the plaintiff, because the signature of the drawer was forged and the instrument was never at any time valid, but from the very beginning was an invalid order in its entirety. The plaintiff did not pay on a genuine instrument bearing a forged indorsement; but payment was made on a paper to which the name of the drawer was forged, and, since the plaintiff is bound to know the signature of the drawer, it paid at its peril." (Italics ours.)

In State v. Merchants' National Bank, supra, the state warrants in question were deposited by the party who had stolen them and had forged the indorsement of the payee upon them, to his own account in the Exchange Bank, which thereupon indorsed them in the usual manner and presented them through the clearing house to the Merchants' Bank for payment, which thereupon paid them to the clearing house and presented them to the state treasurer for redemption. The trial court had held that both banks were liable to the state, but that the Exchange Bank was primarily liable, and that, if the Merchants' Bank were obliged to pay, it would be entitled to recover from the Exchange Bank. The court said:

> "We agree with the trial court. The Exchange Bank simply cashed or purchased these voucher warrants. Under familiar principles of law, when that bank transmitted them, with its indorsement, to the Merchants' Bank, it guaranteed that all previous indorsements were genuine and that it had good title to the paper. 3 Ruling Case Law, 1148; G. S. 1913, § 5877; Youngberg v. Nelson, 51 Minn. 172, 53 N. W. 629, 38 Am. St. Rep. 497; Brown v. Ames, 59 Minn. 476, 482, 61 N. W. 448."

We are of the opinion that appellant bank was liable to respondent bank under its clearing house indorsement.

As to recovery upon the ground of mistake, we are of the opinion that, if this were the sole ground upon which the appellant could rely, it would be compelled to bear its loss. Inasmuch as we have determined that it is entitled to an affirmance of the judgment upon the ground just discussed, no useful purpose would be subserved by a lengthy discussion of the principles and authorities relating to recovery by reason of mistake. Suffice it to say that this subject is discussed at great length in the opinion in Crocker-Woolworth National Bank v. Nevada Bank, supra, and also in the case of First National Bank v. U. S. National Bank, supra, and it was held in the former, under the facts which have already been adverted to, that, where equally innocent parties have dealt with one another under a mistake, the burden of loss resulting from the common error will ordinarily be left where the parties themselves have placed it, and that recovery can only be had where in equity and good conscience the defendant should be called upon to refund.

[13] With respect to the contention that the indorsement in question must be construed as a "missing indorsement," it is hard to conceive by what mental legerdemain an indorsement, however defective, which is actually written upon a check, can be classed as an indorsement which is missing. Two classes of cases are contemplated by the clearing house rule in question: First, those in which an indorsement actually on a check is considered in regard to (a) its validity, (b) its regularity, (c) its sufficiency; and, second, those in which a necessary indorsement is missing. A "valid" indorsement means one "having binding force; authority by law; legally efficacious." Anderson; Bouvier. One lacking these elements is still an indorsement, but is an invalid indorsement. "Regular" means duly authorized. Webster. An indorsement which is not duly authorized—a forged instrument—may not be regular, or operative (section 3104, Civ. Code), but it is still an indorsement. "Sufficient" means competent or adequate. An indorsement lacking the initials or first name of the payee or his title, such as "treasurer" or "trustee" would be insufficient, but it would still be an indorsement. It is obvious that the clearing house rule, in so far as it related to missing indorsements, had reference, not to those cases in which an indorsement on a check was invalid, irregular, or insufficient, but those in which it was not there at all.

We have carefully examined and considered all of the contentions urged by appellant, and, while we have omitted discussion of some of them, we feel that the legal principles involved therein have been sufficiently discussed hereinabove.

The judgment is affirmed.

PODESTA et al. v. DELUCCHI et al.

(Civ. 6819.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 29, 1929.

Appeal and error ⚿643(4)—Delay of nearly year after settlement of bill of exceptions before moving for order for diminution of record required denial of motion.

Delay of nearly one year after settlement of bill of exceptions and filing of briefs on appeal before moving for order for diminution of record required a denial of motion, regardless of whether appellate court had jurisdiction to amend and supplement a bill of exceptions settled by trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Anthony Podesta and another against Eugene Delucchi and others, copartners doing business under the name and style of the Stockton City Realty Company, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. On motion for diminution of record. Motion denied.

A. D. Schaffer, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Gumpert & Mazzera, of Stockton, for respondents.

NOURSE, Acting P. J. The appellants have moved for an order for diminution of the record asking that they be permitted to file a modified bill of exceptions for the purpose of including therein instructions requested by either party to the action whether given or not given and all instructions given by the trial court of its own motion.

The appeal was taken on a bill of exceptions which was settled after hearing of proposed amendments thereto on April 20, 1928. At the time of the settlement of this bill the instructions which are now sought to be included were expressly omitted and the parties stipulated that the appeal could be heard upon the bill of exceptions as settled. The motion for diminution of the record was made on April 17, 1929, nearly one year after the settlement of the bill of exceptions and after the appellants' and respondents' briefs had both been filed on this appeal. In opposition to the motion respondents insist that appellants are guilty of laches in making the motion and in their failure to apply to the trial court for relief in the settlement of the bill of exceptions. Without assuming that this court would have any jurisdiction to amend and supplement a bill of exceptions settled by the trial court, we are satisfied that the motion must be denied because of the unexcused delay of the appellants in seeking this relief.

Motion is denied.

Rehearing Denied May 29, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 27, 1929.

1. Automobiles 🔑155—Visitor at plaintiff's home who ran over child with automobile was not a trespasser.

Defendant, visiting plaintiffs' family home as a relation and friend on a neighborly errand, and who ran over plaintiffs' child with his automobile, was not a trespasser.

2. Automobiles 🔑244(3)—Evidence supported finding that defendant running over plaintiffs' child with automobile as he was leaving their home was negligent.

Evidence held sufficient to justify finding that defendant, who was relative and friend of plaintiffs and had seen child playing around yard, and who ran over child with his automobile as he was leaving plaintiffs' home after visit, was guilty of negligence.

3. Automobiles 🔑155—Where defendant visiting plaintiffs' home knew child was playing about yard, he had duty to use care before starting automobile.

Where defendant visiting plaintiffs' home on errand saw child playing about yard, it became his duty to use vigilance and care before starting his automobile.

4. Death 🔑103(3)—Mother held not negligent as matter of law in permitting child, struck by defendant's automobile when he was leaving yard, to play around yard.

Where plaintiffs' child was struck by automobile of defendant, a relative and friend, as he was leaving yard, mother was not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in permitting child to play around yard.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action for damages for the death of a minor child by John Cambou and wife against J. Marty and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Alfred C. Skaife and H. W. B. Smith, both of San Francisco, and L. R. Lambert, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action for damages. Plaintiffs are husband and wife, and the cause upon which the action rests is the negligence of defendants through and as a result of which a minor child of plaintiffs was killed. No questions are presented which involve the joinder of parties or the amount of the judgment. The facts are not in dispute. The appellants' contentions are twofold. First, they contend that there is no negligence chargeable to defendants or either of them; and, secondly, that if negligence is chargeable to them, the negligence of plaintiffs, proximately contributing to the injury of the child, is sufficient to preclude a recovery. It thus becomes necessary to review the facts. Plaintiffs are husband and wife and were the parents of two minor children. One of these children was a boy named Ernest, aged seven, and the other was a boy named Jackie, age about eighteen months at the time of his death. The plaintiffs lived upon a small ranch in Sonoma county. Incidental to or in conjunction with the ranch, the plaintiffs, at certain seasons of the year, maintained a small resort and catered to summer guests. It is admitted, however, that at the time in question here the season was ended and that there were no guests on the ranch, nor was the ranch in any sense or manner open to or soliciting public patronage. The ranch house is situated some short distance from the main road and is reached only by leaving that road and entering upon the lands of plaintiffs. The defendants Marty are father and son, Seraphin being the son. It may be here noted that the Cambou family and the Marty family are close relatives, Marty, Sr., being the uncle of the older Cambou. Nothing in the record discloses any breach in the friendly contact incident to the relationship. The home of each was always open to the other and the various members of the respective families were on terms of social intimacy. At about 8 a. m. on the morning in question the defendant Seraphin Marty arrived at the Cambou home inquiring for Mr. Cambou. He had come in an automobile described as a two-seated car with the top up. He drove up to the house and parked his car in the driveway and alighted. It is to be noted that the ranch house was built on or into a side hill and the approach thereto was up an incline. The defendant Marty left his car parked in this incline, the front of the car facing the exit from the premises and likewise facing down the hill. The gradient of the incline was such that the car could be thrown in gear and started by its own weight, when the brakes were released. Before alighting defendant Marty put on the brakes and threw the car into reverse gear, with the engine off. He then entered the house, where he found Mrs. Cambou in the kitchen with the baby Jackie. He inquired of her concerning the whereabouts of her husband. She told him the husband was out milking the cow or feeding the chickens, whereupon Marty left in search of Mr. Cambou. It may be noted here that at that time the baby Jackie was dressed and in the presence of Marty and within his hearing told the mother that he (Jackie) was going outside to get an egg. Marty, after leaving the house, went in search of the husband. Finding him and disclosing that the purpose of his visit was to secure the loan of one or two grape pickers, the defendant Marty started back for his automobile. It is undisputed that the errand or business of Marty on the premises was urgent and that great haste characterized his every movement. In his departure from the place where he had conversed with the husband he ran rapidly, as he states, "going fast but not like a wild man." He jumped hurriedly into the auto, and releasing the brakes and disengaging the reverse gear, the auto started up right away, coasting down. The lad had gone but a short distance when he was attracted by the screaming of the other Cambou child, Ernest, and looking back he noticed the baby, Jackie, sitting in the road. Without further elaborating here, he had run over the child, and from the injuries inflicted the child, within a few days, died.

There are many questions of law hinted at which are said to control the liabilities of the parties hereto. At the outset some argument is made as to the character of the premises, with relation to their being public or private, that from a finding of the said character we might definitely fix the status of Marty, whether as an invitee, trespasser, licensee, or guest. We may pass these questions with little discussion. It is not claimed that the premises were such as to constitute the driveway a public highway, and all sides seem willing to concede that the said driveway and the premises in and about the house were private premises constituting the yard and home of Cambou's family. Nor is the status of defendant Marty seriously questioned. As a relation and friend on a neighborly errand he was invited at all times and welcomed. Quoting from Cooley on Torts, p. 303: "Every man, by implication invites others to come to his house as they may have proper occasion either of business or courtesy or information, etc. Custom must determine in these cases what the limit is of that implied invitation."

[1-3] Without developing this thought we may at once conclude that Marty was not a trespasser. In fact, without attempting to label his technical status, he was there, charged with no legal or other restrictions other than that he should exercise ordinary care. The trial court found as a fact that defendant Marty did not exercise ordinary care. We are thus brought to the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding. Negligence remains, as it has always been, relative to time, place, and circumstances. Text-writers are at a loss to give any fast and rigid definition of the term, and the courts have abandoned any attempt to frame such a definition. As new conditions develop, new situations arise. Custom and habit build up practices universally recognized as prudent. Some few years ago it would have been deemed negligent per se for a person to attempt to drive a machine claiming that it operated through an auto power. In fact, negligence would have been a mild term. Therefore, in determining the nature of defendant's conduct in the instant case we confine ourselves to the facts before us. In addition to the general facts as stated, we have other facts to consider and which aid our inquiry. The defendant Marty had been a frequent visitor at the Cambou home. He knew the family and the individual members thereof. He knew that the baby, Jackie, was a child of walking age. On different occasions he had seen him playing around the yard and the premises, and on some occasions had seen him playing around the place where the automobile had been left standing. In fact, he had seen the baby playing out in the yard the day before this fatal occurrence. There is also the additional fact, testified to by defendant Marty, that if he had looked he could have seen the baby, but that he did not look before starting the auto in motion. Another significant fact disclosed from the testimony of the defendant Marty is that when the boy Ernest shouted to him, to use his own language, "I stopped the machine right away and I figures, I said to myself, I wonder if Jackie was around there playing." We conclude from all of these facts that the trial court's finding of negligence was supported. As is urged, it may be what counsel is pleased to term "a close case." The fact is that defendant Marty forgot all about the baby. In his haste to return home he had in mind nothing but a hurried exit. Whatever might be the general rule concerning the caution or degree of care required in and about public places where children are known to congregate, the situation here is different. From all of the facts the defendant here was charged with a duty while in these premises, and that duty was to be ever watchful. His own admission that if he had looked he could have seen the child indicates that the child was not under the car or concealed. It would have taken but a second or two to have looked around the car. Any reasonable man can be charged with knowledge that a child is apt to be found at any place about the family yard. Charged with that knowledge it becomes his duty to use vigilance and care before setting in motion a dangerous instrumentality in that locality. Failing in the duty he is negligent. We cannot concede that it is a harsh burden to place upon a visitor at a family home. Where a life may be jeopardized by a failure to make certain a clear path it surely is not unreasonable, as a matter of law, to insist that ordinary care demands some precaution before starting an automobile. Nor is it unreasonable to include within the required precaution the duty here announced. In the annotation to 44 A. L. R. at page 434, it is said: "The tendency of the later cases would seem to indicate that the courts are requiring a higher degree of care on the part of the operators of automobiles towards children playing on or in proximity to their automobiles, * * * particularly in those cases in which the driver had notice of the children's presence on or about the machine."

[4] At this stage of our economic progress all the best thought is being directed toward child welfare and the promotion of the physical, mental, and moral welfare of the generation to succeed the present. A logical following out of the idea would suggest that in all contact with children a higher standard of care be established as necessary to meet the law's requirement of ordinary care under the circumstances. Concluding the present inquiry, it is obvious that a course of conduct which indicates no care at all and a complete disregard of any caution will not measure up to such a standard or to any standard of ordinary prudence. Coming to the defense of contributory negligence little may be said. The home is a place of refuge, a sanctuary. The yard surrounding is the same. It is the human instinct to segregate from the rest of the world one little spot in which the family may be safe and secure. The chief reason for a home, with its yard, is that there may be such a place. Under all of the circumstances we cannot say, as a matter of law, that it is negligence for a mother to permit a child of the age and strength of the baby Jackie to play around the private yard and walks of her home. The defendant Marty was a relative and friend, and surely his presence upon the premises did not furnish a source of danger which the mother, in the exercise of ordinary care, was charged to anticipate and guard against. As stated hereinbefore, no other issues are presented. The liability of the older Marty is admitted under the conclusions here reached.

Judgment affirmed.

FORISTIERE v. ALONGE. (Civ. 6528.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 27, 1929.

1. Limitation of actions 🔑151(2)—Acknowledgment of debt, made after statute has run, gives new cause of action for which old debt is consideration (Code Civ. Proc. § 360).

Acknowledgment of debt, made after statute of limitations has run, gives new cause of action for which old debt is consideration, under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, while acknowledgment or promise, made before statute has run, vitalizes old debt for another statutory period, dating from the acknowledgment.

2. Limitation of actions 🔑148(2)—Debtor's promise to pay, taking debt out of operation of statute, may be implied from written acknowledgment, which treats indebtedness as subsisting (Code Civ. Proc. § 360).

There need be no express promise to pay to constitute written acknowledgment of debt necessary to take case out of operation of statute of limitations, under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, provided the debtor treats the indebtedness as subsisting, and as one which he is liable and willing to pay; promise to pay being implied from such acknowledgment.

3. Limitation of actions 🔑149(1)—To take debt out of statute, acknowledgment thereof must directly and unconditionally admit debt (Code Civ. Proc. § 360).

Written acknowledgment of indebtedness, to take debt out of statute of limitations, under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, must be direct, distinct, unqualified, and unconditional admission of debt, which party is liable and willing to pay.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑149(1)—Cross-complaint, alleging that defendant had made payment on mortgage and had offered to pay debt if proper credit was given, held not to take indebtedness referred to out of statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 360).

In action for foreclosure of mortgage, cross-complaint by mortgagors against codefendant holding another mortgage, which alleged that they had paid certain sum thereon, which codefendant refused to apply on mortgage, and that defendant had offered to pay the balance due, if credited with the sum heretofore paid, but that codefendant refused to accept payment, held not to constitute valid acknowledgment, taking such debt out of operation of statute of limitations, under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, because not evidencing direct, distinct, unqualified, and unconditional willingness to pay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Action by A. Foristiere against Paolo Alonge. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for appellant.

George G. Graham, of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The defendant, Paolo Alonge, appeals from an adverse judgment in an action to quiet title, the real purpose of which was to cancel a mortgage standing of record against the property in defendant's name, and which the plaintiff Foristiere, claimed was barred by the statute of limitations at the time he acquired the property.

It appears that plaintiff's predecessors in interest, Santo Catania and wife, during their ownership of the property, incumbered the same with two mortgages, the first of which was given to the Bank of Italy. The second was given to the defendant Alonge to secure the payment of a note for $2,000, both the note and mortgage being made payable on February 5, 1921, and the mortgage being recorded on February 10, 1920. The mortgage debt was never paid, and consequently the mortgage was never released or satisfied of record. Several months prior to the running of the statute of limitations against Alonge's mortgage, the Bank of Italy brought suit to foreclose its mortgage, Catania, his wife, and Alonge being made parties to that suit. In September, 1924, which was approximately five months before the running of the statute against the Alonge mortgage, Catania and his wife answered the foreclosure complaint by admitting the allegations thereof, and added a cross-complaint, which was verified by Catania and was served personally on Alonge before filing. Alonge now claims that the contents of this cross-complaint constituted a statutory acknowledgment of the debt (Code Civ. Proc. § 360), which operated to extend the period of the statute of limitations beyond the date on which plaintiff acquired the property. It further appears that the cross-complaint was later dismissed by the court on motion of the Bank of Italy and on October 21, 1925, a decree of foreclosure was entered and the property sold at commissioner's sale to the Bank of Italy; that during the pendency of the foreclosure action Mrs. Catania conveyed her interest in the property by quitclaim deed to her husband and on March 1, 1926, before the period of time allowed by law for the redemption of the property had expired, Foristiere acquired the property from Catania by quitclaim deed. Two weeks later he commenced this suit to quiet title, and on September 4, 1926, Catania redeemed the property from the foreclosure sale by paying to the commissioner the amount due the Bank of Italy.

The evidence further shows that plaintiff knew of the existence of Alonge's unpaid mortgage at the time he acquired the property. The cross-complaint reads as follows: "Comes now the above-named defendants Santo Catania and Elizabetta Catania, his wife, and for a cross-complaint against the defendants Paolo Alonge and John Doe and Mary Roe and Annie Roe, allege and state that on or about the 1st day of March, 1920, these cross-complainants executed and delivered to the said Paolo Alonge and others, their said mortgage on the real estate mentioned in Plaintiff's complaint, to wit: Lots 31 and 32 in block 14 of the town, now city, of Fresno, California, as per map thereof on file, to secure the payment of $2,000 principal and interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. until paid. That these cross-complainants have paid to the said Paolo Alonge the sum of $675, which should be applied upon said mortgage obligation, and the said Paolo Alonge refuses so to do. These cross-complainants have heretofore offered to pay the balance due, if credited the aforesaid sum of $675 heretofore paid, and the said Paolo Alonge refused to accept said payment, or to settle said accounts, or to relieve said premises from the burden of the said second mortgage and all of which casts a cloud on the title of the cross-complainants in and to said premises, and prevents the said cross-complainants from obtaining money with which to pay the plaintiff in this case. Wherefore these cross-complainants pray that said Paolo Alonge, or the person holding said second mortgage, be cited to appear in this court, and that this court adjudge the amounts that may be due said Paolo Alonge by virtue of said mortgage and the amount the cross-complainants shall pay, and upon payment thereof shall cause said premises to be released from said second mortgage, and that this court grant to these cross-complainants such further relief as equity and justice of this case may warrant."

[1, 2] Section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "No acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, by which to take the case out of the operation of this title, unless the same is contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby." And in construing said section it was held in Southern Pacific Co. v. Prosser, 122 Cal. 413, 52 P. 836, 55 P. 145, that "the distinct and unqualified admission of an existing debt contained in a writing signed by the party to be charged, and without intimation of an intent to refuse payment thereof, suffices to establish the debt to which the contract relates as a continuing contract, and to interrupt the running of the statute of limitations against the same; from such an acknowledgment the law implies a promise to pay. Code Civ. Proc., sec. 360; McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 180, 184, 185 [95 Am. Dec. 170]; Biddel v. Brizzolara, 56 Cal. 374; Tuggle v. Minor, 76 Cal. 96 [18 P. 131]; Wood on Limitations, §§ 68, 85."

The only distinction between an acknowledgment of a debt before and one after the statute has run, say the courts, is that an acknowledgment or promise made before the statute has run vitalizes the old debt for another statutory period, dating from the time of the acknowledgment or promise, while an acknowledgment made after the statute has run gives a new cause of action, for which the old debt is a consideration. Southern Pacific Co. v. Prosser, supra; Rodgers v. Byers, 127 Cal. 528, 60 P. 42. In either case there need be no express promise to pay, it being held sufficient if the writing shows that the debtor treats the indebtedness as subsisting and as one which he is liable and willing to pay; and from such acknowledgment the law implies a promise to pay. Foster v. Bowles, 138 Cal. 346, 71 P. 494, 649; Searles v. Gonzalez, 191 Cal. 426, 216 P. 1003, 28 A. L. R. 78; Concannon v. Smith, 134 Cal. 14, 66 P. 40; First National Bank of Park Rapids v. Pray (Cal. App.) 260 P. 933.

[3] In the case of Commercial Mutual Ins. Co. v. Brett, 44 Barb. (N. Y.) 489, some of the earlier decisions bearing upon the essential element of a willingness to pay are summarized as follows: "In Van Keuren v. Parmelee (2 Comst. [N. Y.] 523 [51 Am. Dec. 322]) the same rule was recognized. 'There must at the least be a plain admission that the debt is due, and that the party is willing to pay it.' It was also assented to in Shoemaker v. Benedict, 1 Kern. [11 N. Y.] 176 [62 Am. Dec. 95], where it was said 'that, to continue or revive the debt, there must be an express promise to pay, or an acknowledgment of the existence of the debt, with the admission or recognition of an existing liability to pay it, from which a new promise may be inferred.' * * * From these and many other cases, which might be cited, I think it is clear that an acknowledgment to be sufficient must not only be an admission of the existence of the debt, but in addition thereto a recognition of a liability to pay, in such a mode as well authorize the inference of a new promise."

In any event, however, as held in McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 180, 95 Am. Dec. 170, "the acknowledgment referred to in the statute is not such as may be deduced by inference from a promise or an offer to pay a part of the debt, or to pay the whole debt in a particular manner, or at a specified time, or upon specified conditions. The acknowledgment, say the cases, must be a direct, distinct, unqualified, and unconditional admission of the debt which the party is liable and willing to pay." The doctrine of the foregoing case has been approved in the later cases of Clunin v. First Federal Trust Co., 189 Cal. 248, 207 P. 1009; Rodgers v. Byers, supra; Southern Pacific Co. v. Prosser, supra.

[4] After analyzing the contents of the cross-complaint in question in the light of the foregoing legal rules, we have reached the conclusion that it amounts to no more than a qualified and conditional admission of the debt, and a willingness to pay only that particular balance which the Catanias claimed was justly due, and therefore is not effective as a legal acknowledgment. In the fore part of the cross-complaint it is distinctly stated that they have "hereto offered" to pay the debt provided they were given credit for $675, which appellant refused to do; and the latter part of the cross-complaint fairly implies only that they were still willing to pay the balance provided they were allowed the credit of $675. Therefore, even though it be conceded that the statute may be tolled by an acknowledgment embodied in a pleading, there is not present here the essential element of a direct distinct, unqualified, and unconditional willingness to pay, which the law demands in order to constitute a valid acknowledgment. McCormick v. Brown, supra; Clunin v. First Federal Trust Co., supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

LANDTBOM v. BOARD OF FIRE COM'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6342.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 3, 1929.

1. Municipal corporations ⚷198(4)—One challenging sufficiency of evidence to warrant his dismissal as fireman had burden of producing all evidence.

Burden was on one challenging sufficiency of evidence, taken before board of fire commissioners, to warrant order dismissing him from fire department, to produce all the evidence, in order that trial court might see wherein it was insufficient.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷198(4)—Court cannot say that fire commissioners acted irregularly in dismissing fireman not applying for further return to writ of review including all evidence (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1074, 1075).

Where one applying for writ of review to review board of fire commissioners' order dismissing him from fire department failed to apply for further return, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1075, when return, showing on its face that it did not include all evidence taken by board, was made, record did not show affirmatively that any element of charge was not proved by competent evidence, and court cannot say that board did not regularly pursue its authority under section 1074.

3. Municipal corporations ⚷198(4)—Appellate court cannot assume, from fire commissioners' return to writ for review of order dismissing fireman, that competent evidence not shown thereby was not introduced.

Where board of fire commissioners' return to writ of review to review its order dismissing member of fire department showed on its face that it did not include all evidence taken by it, District Court of Appeal may not assume therefrom that other competent evidence than that shown thereby was not introduced.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Application by Arthur J. Landtbom for a writ of review to review an order of the Board of Fire Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco dismissing applicant from the fire department. Judgment for applicant, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Walter A. Dold, Chief Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellants.

William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff was a member of the fire department of San Francisco. He was served with written charges of misconduct and with a notice of the trial of the charges before the defendant board. A trial was had. Witnesses were called, sworn, and examined, and later the defendant board rendered its decision, finding the plaintiff guilty as charged, and entered an order dismissing him from the department. On September 24, 1917, the plaintiff applied to the trial court for a writ of review. A return on said writ was not filed until August 30, 1927. Shortly after the return was filed the plaintiff made a motion for judgment based on the return. The motion was granted, and a judgment in favor of the plaintiff was entered. From that judgment the defendants have appealed, and have brought up a typewritten record.

[1-3] The plaintiff claims that the charge placed against him was not proved by competent evidence. The return purports to contain a copy of "the journal of the proceedings of the board of fire commissioners," which purports to contain some of the evidence taken by the defendant board, but it likewise appears that it does not contain all of the evidence. When the return was made, it showed on its face that it did not include all of the evidence. When that fact appeared, the plaintiff was at liberty to apply for "a further return." Code Civ. Proc. § 1075. If he had done so, the question would then have arisen as to whether the evidence taken below had been preserved. If it had been, "a further return" would have been ordered. If it had not been preserved, one of two possible situations would have been presented. If "jurisdictional facts" were involved, "a further return" would have been ordered, for a duty rests on the respondent board at all times so to keep its records as to show the existence of "jurisdictional facts." Stumpf v. Board of Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 367, 63 P. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350.

Again, if the evidence taken before the defendant board was not preserved and if it involved the guilt or innocence of the petitioner, that is, the fact in issue, the trial court would, in its discretion, have had the power to deny the motion. C. P. R. Co. v. Placer County, 32 Cal. 582, 584; C. P. R. Co. v. Placer County, 34 Cal. 352, 361. When the plaintiff challenged the sufficiency of the evidence taken before the respondent board, the burden rested on him to produce all of the evidence, that the trial court might, from an inspection thereof, see wherein, if at all, it was insufficient. Roe v. Superior Court of San Francisco, 60 Cal. 93; Hagenmeyer v. Mendocino County, 82 Cal. 214, 218, 23 P. 14; Humboldt County v. Dinsmore, 75 Cal. 604, 607, 608, 17 P. 710; Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Board of Equalization of Los Angeles, 97 Cal. 318, 325, 32 P. 312; Johnston v. Board of Supervisors, 104 Cal. 390, 394, 37 P. 1046; Imperial Water Co. v. Supervisors of Imperial County, 162 Cal. 14, 25, 120 P. 780. As the record stands it does not show affirmatively that any element of the charge was not proved by competent evidence. Therefore it cannot be said that the respondent board did not regularly pursue its authority. Code Civ. Proc. § 1074. If this is not the rule, then actions in certiorari may be brought within the period of the statute of limitations to review any determination of inferior boards or tribunals and in 95 per cent. of the cases the determination of such inferior board or tribunal must be set aside, because no law requires the evidence to be preserved, and, in fact, it has not been preserved.

The plaintiff asserts that the charges against him were not proved by competent evidence. The return does not show the fact. The most that can be said is that the return shows some competent evidence, and does not show an absolute want of competent evidence. We may not assume, from the return as made, that other competent evidence was not introduced. Hagenmeyer v. Mendocino County, 82 Cal. 214, 218, 23 P. 14.

The defendant board cites Roberts v. Police Court, 185 Cal. 65, 195 P. 1053, and contends that, even though the evidence was insufficient, there is no showing that the defendant board exceeded its jurisdiction. The plaintiff cites Garvin v. Chambers, 195 Cal. 212, 232 P. 696, as laying down a different rule. We do not so read that case. The facts as stated in the majority opinion were these: Garvin, a patrolman, was suspended on a certain charge; he took an appeal from that order; while that appeal was pending, his chief withdrew the suspension order, and filed an order of discharge on a different ground, and based on facts occurring subsequently; of these latter transactions Garvin had no notice. The defendant board held no hearing of the charges, but entered its judgment affirming the order of discharge—an order which Garvin had not appealed from, and on which he had had no hearing. The court held the defendant board exceeded its jurisdiction. Many similar cases could be cited based on the leading case of People ex rel. Whitney v. Board of Delegates of San Francisco Fire Dept., 14 Cal. 479, 503. The latest is probably Baar v. Smith, 201 Cal. 87, 100, 255 P. 827. But it is clear that the facts in the Garvin Case were quite different from the facts in the instant case.

For the reasons stated above, the judgment is reversed.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

LOBB v. BROWN et al. (Civ. 6562.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 30, 1929.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 29, 1929.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

On rehearing. Application for rehearing denied, but opinion modified.

For former opinion, see 276 P. 583.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, and Earl Warren and Ralph E. Hoyt, both of Oakland, for appellant.

Byrne & Lamson and Knight, Boland & Christin, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petitions for rehearing in the above-entitled cause are denied. In directing judgment against the respondent Herbert Brown we did so upon the grounds that the findings of the trial court demanded a judgment in favor of the appellant as against that respondent. Such did not however, preclude the right of this respondent to appeal from the judgment so entered upon new grounds within the rule of Klauber v. San Diego Street Car Co., 98 Cal. 105, 32 P. 876, and Lambert v. Bates, 148 Cal. 146, 82 P. 767.

Because of the criticism directed to the statement of facts appearing in the original opinion, we have examined the record and the evidence with additional care. The activities of respondent Frank Brown are accurately stated in the opinion, with the exception that we should have said that he procured and supplied a witness (rather than witnesses) for the contestants. As to the activities of Mr. J. S. Lamson, the attorney for Herbert and Frank Brown during the course of the contest of the will, we were in error in referring to his activities as "encouragement and co-operation with Mr. McWilliams," attorney for contestants, and also in stating that Mr. Lamson aided Mr. McWilliams "in procuring witnesses in support of the contest." But the evidence shows that he was in attendance at the counsel table with Mr. McWilliams during the greater portion of the trial and that, as he testified in this case, he "conferred" with Mr. McWilliams during the examination of the witnesses and aided him in the search for documents which were offered in evidence. The statement of facts appearing in the opinion is accordingly amended as herein indicated and the sentence appearing in the first paragraph on page 589 of the printed opinion (276 P.), and reading as follows, "He admitted in his answer that the defendants (himself and Herbert Brown) paid all the costs and attorneys' fees of the contestants in the contest," is stricken out.

MOCH v. SAVOY et al. (Civ. 5632.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 3, 1929.

Appeal and error ⟹1010(1)—Findings of trial court supported by evidence will not be disturbed.

Where evidence contained in record is sufficient to support findings of trial court, they will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Lew Moch against H. A. Savoy and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Henry E. Carter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

P. C. Rentfro, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. Action was brought to recover judgment for money loaned and money had and received by the defendant for the use and benefit of the plaintiff, arising out of the sale and financing of automobile trucks. Defendant denied the indebtedness and filed a counterclaim for the construction of a building for the plaintiff. Trial was had without a jury, and judgment was granted for plaintiff in the sum of $2,668.38 and against defendant on his counterclaim. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

Defendant was engaged in the business of selling trucks, and plaintiff financed the deals by loaning money to defendant on the sale contracts as collateral. It was stipulated at the trial that at the commencement of the transaction defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $2,090. As security for this indebtedness three certain contracts were turned over to the plaintiff by the defendant. Plaintiff testified that these contracts were never assigned and none of the contracts received in evidence showed an assignment thereof, although there were blank forms attached to said contracts for that purpose.

Appellant does not raise any question on the denial of the items in the counterclaim, but contends that the judgment is erroneous in failing to allow certain credits for payments received by plaintiff on the sale contracts of three certain trucks. We have examined the evidence with respect to the credits made for payments and believe the evidence contained in the record to be sufficient to support the findings of the trial court. In such cases the findings will not be disturbed. 2 Cal. Jur. 918. No good purpose would be served in discussing these items in detail. While it is true that defendant Savoy testified that he delivered a truck to one Guthroe and that Guthroe told defendant he was paying $400 for the truck, yet we find no direct evidence that plaintiff ever received $400 or any other sum from Guthroe, and the payment is not included in plaintiff's testimony. Plaintiff testified from his book accounts, while defendant relied on his memory. Furthermore, the defendant testified that plaintiff received only $1,200 on that contract, and we find that defendant is given credit by plaintiff for payments on the contract of $564 by Campbell and $650 by Walker, making a total of $1,214.

Appellant assigns as error the conduct of the trial judge as showing prejudice against the witnesses and attorney for the defendant. Upon examination of the record we find no such prejudice to be shown by the trial court.

Judgment is affirmed.

98 Cal. App. 633

In re WRIGHT'S ESTATE. (Civ. 6669.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 3, 1929.

1. Statutes 🔑225—Statutes in pari materia must be read and construed together, each referring to and supplementing the other, though passed at different times.

All statutes which relate to the same general subject-matter must be read and construed together as one act, each referring to and supplementing the other, though they were passed at different times.

2. Homestead 🔑2—Descent and devolution of homestead is controlled by law in force at death of spouse whose property was impressed with homestead character.

Law in force at death of spouse whose property was impressed with homestead character controls descent and devolution of title thereto.

3. Homestead 🔑134—Final decree of divorce having been granted to husband, there was no survivor entitled to homestead on husband's death (Code Civ. Proc. § 1474; Civ. Code, § 1265).

Where husband was granted final decree of divorce from his wife, on his death there was no survivor, within section 1474, Code Civ. Proc., controlling devolution of title to homestead where there is a survivor, and within that part of section 1265, Civ. Code, providing that homestead selected from separate property of spouse making selection, vests in survivor.

4. Homestead 🔑142(1)—Minor children of divorced husband on his death were entitled to have homestead set apart to them for limited period, not exceeding minority (Civ. Code, § 1265).

Where married man declared homestead on his separate property, procured final decree of divorce, and later died, leaving two adult and three minor children, and inventory showed homestead among assets of estate, minor children were entitled to have homestead set apart to them for limited period, not to exceed period of minority, under Civ. Code, § 1265, providing that, on death of owner, homestead shall go to heirs or devisees, subject to power of superior court to assign same for limited period to family of decedent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Petition by Clara C. Wright, as guardian of the minor children of Oscar J. Wright, deceased, to set aside homestead. From an order granting petition, the administrator of Oscar J. Wright, deceased, appeals. Reversed.

B. M. Benson, of Fresno, for appellant.

Alva E. Snow and Lawrence W. Young, both of Fresno, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. Clara C. Wright, as guardian of three minors, filed a petition asking that a homestead be set aside in favor of the decedent's minor children. The trial court made an order granting the petition as prayed for and from that order the administrator has appealed and has brought up the judgment roll.

The appellant states that the sole question he seeks to have reviewed is this: "When a married man declares a homestead on his separate property, procures a final decree of divorce from his wife, dies, leaving two adult and three minor heirs, and the inventory shows the homesteaded property among the assets of his estate, should the court in setting apart a homestead for the minor children grant the property to said minors in fee or merely for a limited number of years?"

The real estate involved is lot 5, block 8, of the Alta Vista tract in the city of Fresno. It was the separate property of the decedent. On the 21st day of February, 1927, the decedent, his wife and four minor children were residing on that property and on said date the decedent executed a declaration of homestead and caused it to be recorded. One of the minor children attained her majority on the 23d day of February, 1927, while a resident of this state. The other minor children, on the date the decree was made, were respectively nine years, seven years, and five years of age. On the 28th day of March, 1928, a final decree of divorce was entered dissolving the bonds of matrimony theretofore existing between Oscar J. Wright and his wife. The record does not disclose that in the divorce proceeding any order was made or was not made regarding the homestead. On September 3, 1928, Oscar J. Wright died, and thereafter an adult son was appointed administrator with the will annexed of the estate of the deceased. The record does not disclose what provisions, if any, were contained in the will regarding the disposal of the homestead.

[1, 2] In her petition the guardian set forth the foregoing facts and prayed for an order that the homestead be set aside in fee for the minor children. The trial court ordered judgment as prayed for. The respondent takes the position that the law pertinent to the subject of the quantum of the estate to be taken under such an order is contained in section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure. She argues that section 1468 is to be read in connection therewith, but that it contains nothing that is pertinent to the facts of this case. Her contentions are apparently correct as far as they go, but there are other provisions of the statute which must also be taken into consideration. "In accordance with the principle that a statute is construed in connection with and as a part of the body of legislation upon the general subject, it is a settled rule that all statutes which relate to the same general subject-matter—briefly called statutes in pari materia—must be read and construed together, as one act, each referring to and supplementing the other, though they were passed at different times. * * *" 23 Cal. Jur. 785. That general rule has been followed by the courts when considering homestead rights. Weinreich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 647, 54 P. 254; Hannon v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 12 Cal. App. 350, 107 P. 335. The latter case holds that the law in force at the death of the spouse, whose property was impressed with the homestead character, controls the descent and devolution of the title. That the trial court had the power to set aside the homestead at least for some period of time for the use of the minors (Code Civ. Proc., § 1465), both parties agree. Whether such order may pass the fee or whether it should be limited is not conceded. It is not contended that any part of section 1468, Code of Civil Procedure, is directly applicable excepting the last sentence. However, that sentence, it has been held, was enacted to cover a case where the decedent had not selected a homestead and the trial court made the selection. In re Schmidt, 94 Cal. 334, 29 P. 714. The reasoning of the court in that case was based on the ground that at that time section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure stated the law on the same subject with reference to a homestead selected by the decedent.

[3] Since the rendition of that decision, section 1474, Code of Civil Procedure, and section 1265 of the Civil Code, have both been amended. An examination of section 1474, Code of Civil Procedure, discloses that it is concerned with the devolution of title of the homestead where there is a "survivor" and to homesteads selected by one spouse without the consent of the other. In the instant case a final decree of divorce had been entered and there was no "survivor." Zanone v. Sprague, 16 Cal. App. 333, 116 P. 989. Furthermore, in the instant case it is not claimed that the homestead was selected by the wife without the consent of the decedent. Turning to section 1265, Civil Code, it will be noted that the first part of the section is also concerned with the title of the "survivor." For the reasons just stated, that portion is not applicable. However, the statute continues. "* * * In other cases, upon the death of the person whose property was selected as a homestead, it shall go to the heirs or devisees, subject to the power of the superior court to assign the same for a limited period to the family of the decedent. * * *"

[4] It seems clear that on the death of Mr. Wright the homestead selected by him from his separate property passed to his "heirs or devisees, subject to the power of the superior court to assign the same for a limited period, * * *" not to exceed the period of the minority of the children. Homesteads are authorized to provide support for the family, but no one of the homestead statutes shows any intention on the part of the Legislature, except during minority, to create any rights in behalf of one child which are greater than the rights of any other child of the decedent. We think it is clear from what we have stated that the order as made was erroneous, and that the order should have designated the period of time for which the minors would have the use of the homestead.

The order is reversed.

CAPUCCIO v. CAIRE et al. (L. A. 9165.)★

Supreme Court of California. May 3, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 27, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⚷878(4)—Where notice of motion for counsel fees was held sufficient, but motion was dismissed on other grounds, defendants' objecting to motion could not have sufficiency of notice reviewed on appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 796).

Where motion for allowance of counsel fees in partition case was objected to on ground that notice of motion was insufficient under Code Civ. Proc. § 796, and that counsel fees were not allowable in case, and trial court held that motion was sufficiently noticed, but dismissed motion on second objection, defendants objecting to motion were not entitled to have Supreme Court determine that first objection to motion for counsel fees should have been sustained.

2. Partition ⚷114(6)—Notice of motion for counsel fees in partition proceeding held sufficient without express reference to Code providing for fees (Code Civ. Proc. § 796).

In action for partition, notice of motion for counsel fees to be paid by parties entitled to share in land divided held sufficient without reference to Code Civ. Proc. § 796, which was only provision of law under which plaintiff in partition would be entitled to move court for allowance of counsel fees.

3. Partition ⚷114(2)—Expenditures in partition action for common benefit should be divided among persons entitled to interest in property regardless whether controversies were litigated (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 752–801).

In action for partition under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 752–801, expenditures entailed in maintenance of action for common benefit should be divided among those who shall have been found to be entitled to their respective share and interest in property under section 796, regardless whether or not there had arisen and been litigated controversies over question whether parties to action were cotenants or over their respective interests in properties sought to be divided.

4. Partition ⚷114(4)—Plaintiff in partition could recover counsel fees, though issues were contested (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 752–801).

In action under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 752–801, to partition realty over which parties engaged in prolonged conflict, dismissal of plaintiff's motion for reasonable counsel fees on ground that counsel fees were not allowable under section 796, where issues were contested, was error.

5. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Questions whether property could have been more equitably divided in partition held for trial court, whose decision will not be reversed on conflicting evidence in absence of abuse.

Where court appointed referees to make partition of real property involved in action, and appellants did not challenge ability of referees nor question their integrity and good faith, question whether referees might have made more just and equitable division of certain portions of properties and might have provided for more accessible means of ingress and egress to property were matters primarily for trial court to determine on hearing of report of referees, and, in absence of showing of abuse of discretion on part of court in determining such matters, decision of trial court on conflicting evidence will not be reversed.

Appeals from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Aglae S. Capuccio against Arthur J. Caire and others. From the judgment, plaintiff and defendant Edmund A. Rossi appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Ambrose Gherini, of San Francisco, Orrin K. McMurray, of Berkeley, and James E. Lyons, of San Francisco, for appellants.

J. F. Bluxome, and Frank P. Deering, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. In this matter there are two questions presented by the appellants upon their appeal from the judgment. The first of these involves the correctness of an order of the superior court in and for the county of Santa Barbara dismissing a motion made by the plaintiff in this action for an allowance of counsel fees. The second of these questions involves the correctness of an order of said court denying the appellant Rossi's motion to change and modify the report of the referees in this action. Each of the foregoing orders was made prior to the making and entry of the final judgment herein, and each is sought to be reviewed, and is, we think, reviewable upon the appeal from said final judgment.

The legal troubles and disputes of the parties to this action, in so far as these relate to their contentions upon these and certain former appeals, date their inception from the year 1912, when a certain corporation, known as the Santa Cruz Island Company, and of which the parties to this litigation, or the predecessors of some of them, were the stockholders, failed to pay the corporate license tax due under the provisions of the act of March 20, 1905, and the amendments thereto, and in consequence forfeited its corporate charter. In May, 1912, Edmund A. Rossi, one of the appellants therein, acquired from Amelia A. Rossi her shares and interest as a stockholder in and to the property and assets of said corporation, and thereupon commenced an action against the directors or trustees of said corporation, the purpose of which action was to enjoin the said directors and trustees from continuing to carry on the business of said defunct corporation and to compel them as the trustees thereof to wind up its affairs, pay its debts and distribute its assets among its stockholders according to their respective interests therein. When that action reached this court upon appeal one of the questions presented for determination related to the nature of the interest which the stockholders of such corporation had respectively in its real and personal properties and assets from and after the date of the forfeiture of its corporate charter, and this court, while holding that this question was incidental to the relief which was the main object of the action, nevertheless deemed it necessary to determine that, the corporation having ceased to exist and being thus no longer capable of holding the title of property, such property belonged to the persons who were its stockholders at the time it ceased to be a corporation, subject to the temporary possession of its directors who upon its dissolution had become its trustees for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the former corporation and making distribution of its assets to the real owners thereof, which owners, in so far as the real estate was concerned, were held to have become tenants in common thereof. There were certain other matters determined upon said appeal not necessary now to be referred to, but the orders appealed from were reversed and the cause remanded to the trial court for further proceedings. The decision of this court upon that appeal was handed down on December 16, 1916, and the remittitur therein was duly issued 30 days thereafter (174 Cal. 74, 161 P. 1161). Thereafter, and on August 8, 1917, another action was instituted by said Edmund A. Rossi, which had for its purpose that of obtaining an accounting and distribution among the former stockholders of said corporation according to their respective interests in its property arising from the forfeiture of its corporate charter.

The principal questions presented in that action and upon appeal from the judgment rendered therein related to an attempted revival of said corporation under certain later amendments to the earlier statute under the terms of which it had suffered the forfeiture of its charter. When that action reached this court upon appeal it was held, in conformity with the earlier decision above referred to, that said corporation, having ceased to exist under the state law as it stood when its said charter was forfeited, it could not be the subject of a revival, at least in the absence of a consent on the part of all its former stockholders whose respective rights in and to its properties had become vested when such corporation had ceased to exist. This court in the state of said appeal did not deem it necessary to determine the precise nature of the interests of the former stockholders of said defunct corporation in its properties, but apparently assumed that that question had been correctly decided upon the former appeal. The judgment of attempted revivor was reversed and the cause remanded to the trial court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views expressed in the opinion. The decision of this court upon that appeal was handed down on July 28, 1921, and in due course became final (186 Cal. 544, 199 P. 1042).

In the meantime, and while this latter action was pending upon appeal in this court and in the month of May, 1918, the plaintiff herein instituted in said superior court the present action, which had for its purpose the partition of the lands of Santa Cruz Island among the parties to this action who, the plaintiff alleged, were tenants in common thereof. Santa Cruz Island, which is the largest of the so-called Channel Islands, is situate off the coast of the county of Santa Barbara, but is included within its boundaries and consists of about 58,800 acres of land; and prior to the dissolution of the aforesaid Santa Cruz Island Company had constituted the real estate holdings of said corporation and the lands and real properties thereof, to which, according to the terms of the first case of Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 161 P. 1161, the former stockholders of said defunct corporation had succeeded as tenants in common thereof. The trial court, upon the issue joined in this latter action, determined that the plaintiff therein was entitled to an interlocutory decree of partition of said real properties among the parties thereto and who constitute the tenants in common thereof in conformity with the earlier decision of this court in the first case of Rossi v. Caire. Upon appeal to this court the judgment of the trial court to that effect was affirmed in an opinion filed on September 14, 1922 (189 Cal. 507, 209 P. 374), and which in due course became final. Upon the going down of the remittitur upon that appeal the trial court proceeded to carry into effect its interlocutory decree through the appointment and activities of certain referees selected to make and to report a proper distribution of said real estate in conformity with the terms of said interlocutory decree in order to enable said court to enter its final decree of partition therein. Upon the return and report of said referees, and during the time when the said court was proceeding to hear such matters as had relation to the form and content of its said final decree of partition, the plaintiff herein gave and duly caused to be served a motion to the effect that on Monday, September 28, 1925, "the plaintiff will move the said court for reasonable counsel fees herein in favor of the plaintiff to be paid by the parties respectively entitled to share in the land divided in proportion to their respective interests. Said motion will be made on the ground that said plaintiff is entitled to such allowance and that it is just and equitable that the same should be made." At the time fixed for the hearing of said motion counsel for the moving parties therein in presenting the same stated to the court that the moving parties to said motion were making the same under the provisions of section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The parties to said action other than the plaintiff and Edmund A. Rossi, one of the defendants therein, appeared and presented certain objections to the hearing and determination of said motion. The first of these objections related to the form of the notice of said motion, and was based upon the ground that in said notice of motion it had not been expressly stated that said motion was to be a motion "for reasonable counsel fees expended by plaintiff for the common benefit," as required by the provisions of section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The second objection which was urged to the hearing and determination of said motion was the objection that in said action, which purported to be an action for partition, the defendants thereto other than said Edmund A. Rossi had denied and contested the existence of a cotenancy between the parties to said action, and hence that in the presence of and existence of such denial and contest counsel fees of plaintiff in said action were not allowable under the provisions of said section of the Code of Civil Procedure. This objection also went further, to the extent of setting forth that in said action certain other contested issues had been presented and determined, and that as to all contested matters in said action both the plaintiff and defendants had been represented by counsel, and for this additional reason counsel fees were not recoverable to any extent whatever by the plaintiff in the action. Upon the presentation of the foregoing objections to the hearing and determination of said motion the moving parties thereto offered to produce witnesses in support of their motion, but the trial court, while holding that as to the first of said defendants' objections that it was technical and that the plaintiff's motion was sufficiently noticed under the provisions of section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure and was so understood by counsel for the defendants, refused to permit the production of such or any evidence in support of said motion upon the ground urged in the defendants' aforesaid second objection, and thereupon made and entered its order dismissing said motion; from which order the first of the appeals herein to be considered was taken.

[1, 2] Counsel for the respondents insist that they are entitled to have this court and upon this appeal determine that their first ground of objection to the hearing of the plaintiff's motion for the allowance of counsel fees in this action should have been sustained by the trial court. We find no merit in this insistence for the two-fold reason that the trial court did not base its order for the dismissal of the plaintiff's said motion upon that ground, but, on the contrary, held that the plaintiff's said motion was being sufficiently made under the provisions of section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and also for the reason that we are of the opinion that the trial court was entirely correct in so ruling. This, as we have seen, was an action for partition and the Code of Civil Procedure with special relation to actions of this character has expressly provided that "the costs of partition" of the plaintiff or either of the defendants, "including reasonable counsel fees, expended by the plaintiff or either of the defendants, for the common benefit, fees of referees, and other disbursements, must be paid by the parties respectively entitled to share in the lands divided, in proportion to their respective interests therein." The foregoing is the only provision of law under which a plaintiff in an action for partition would be entitled to move the court for an allowance of counsel fees, and it would therefore not be necessary to include an express reference to the aforesaid section of the Code in plaintiff's notice of motion.

We pass, therefore, to a consideration of the sufficiency of the second objection urged by the respondents upon the hearing of said motion, and which was to the effect that in a contested action for partition the plaintiff was not permitted to recover any counsel fees whatever under the aforesaid provisions of section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] We are satisfied that the foregoing objection to the hearing and determination of the plaintiff's motion for an allowance of counsel fees as made in the trial court under the provisions of section 796, Code of Civil Procedure, was and is not sustainable either under the provisions of said Code applicable to actions for the partition of real property, or under the authorities cited by counsel for the respondents in support thereof, or under the facts and circumstances in the instant case. This, as we have seen, was an action for the partition of certain real property, which action was instituted and has been thus far conducted under the provisions of chapter 4, pt. 2, title 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This chapter of said Code, commences at section 752 thereof and extending to section 801, inclusive, thereof, embraces a complete and elaborate scheme for the institution and maintenance of an action for partition. It provides in section 752 thereof that such an action may be brought by any one or more of several cotenants owning real property as joint tenants or tenants in common and having an estate of inheritance or for life or lives or for years therein. It imposes upon the plaintiff in such action the duty of setting forth in his complaint the full details as to the interests of all other persons in the property and the nature of such interests or ownerships so far as known to said plaintiff. It requires that the plaintiff shall immediately record in the office of the recorder of the county or of the several counties in which the property is situated a notice of the pendency of the action containing the names of the parties so far as known, the object of the action, and a description of the property to be affected thereby. It directs the issuance of a summons containing much more in detail than is required in the ordinary process issued in civil actions. It provides for the publication by the plaintiff of such summons and its service by that method upon all parties to the action whose share or interest is unknown and who themselves either reside out of the state or cannot be found therein. It further provides that when necessary the plaintiff may procure an abstract of title of the property to be partitioned for the inspection and use of all the parties to the action, and requires that the expense reasonably incurred in procuring such abstract shall be allowed to the party incurring it. All of the foregoing requirements imposed upon the plaintiff in the first instance arise prior to any appearances on the part of the defendants in the action. This title of said Code further proceeds to set forth a considerable number of important matters in the further course of the proceedings for the partition of the real property involved in said action, including the ascertainment of the rights of lienholders, the procedure for the appointment, qualification, services, and report of referees to be appointed by the court for the purpose either of making a proper distribution of said property in kind and in severalty to those who may be found entitled thereto or to report and recommend a sale of said property, either in whole or part, and the distribution similarly of the proceeds of such sale.

It will thus be seen that from the inception of an action for partition instituted by any one or more of several cotenants having the right as such and as plaintiffs to institute such an action there is a considerable succession of required procedural details which must be initiated and carried forward by the plaintiff or plaintiffs in the action and which at the final analysis inure to the common benefit of those parties to the action who shall be found to be respectively entitled to a share of the lands to be thus divided. It was doubtless for the purpose of making a just and equitable provision for the division of the expenses entailed either by the plaintiff or by any one or more of the defendants in pursuing the required courses for the partition of the property involved in said action whenever such expenditures could be shown to have been made for the common benefit that section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure was formulated and embraced in said title thereof. Assuming that the action for partition was properly brought and that the trial court shall have so determined upon the issues as framed in said action and having so determined shall proceed to distribute said property or the proceeds thereof among the several persons so found to be the owners as cotenants of hitherto undivided interests therein, we are of the opinion that the more just and equitable rule to be applied to such cases would require a proper division of the expenditures entailed in the maintenance of such actions for the common benefit among those who shall have been found to be entitled to their respective shares and interests in said property by the ultimate judgment of the court regardless of whether or not there had arisen and been litigated controversies either over the question as to whether or not the parties to the action were cotenants or over the extent of their respective interests as such in the property thus sought to be divided. It is not to be understood that in so holding we are deciding that the cost of litigating purely controversial issues arising in such actions between parties thereto who have their own counsel and are incurring their own costs in the effort to sustain their adverse claims shall be chargeable or recoverable against the losing party or parties to such controversy. It is evident that such was not the intent of the framers of section 796, Code of Civil Procedure, since it is expressly provided therein that it is only when the costs, including counsel fees entailed in said action, shall be found to have been expended for the common benefit, that they shall be chargeable or recoverable by whichever of the parties, plaintiff or defendant, shall have so expended the same. The cases to which we have been referred by counsel for the respondents in support of said objection are not persuasive as furnishing to this court a sufficient reason for interpreting the provisions of the title of our Code of Civil Procedure relating to actions for partition otherwise than as we have thus construed it, since in the main such cases have arisen in jurisdictions the statutes whereof differ materially from our own; or in cases other than actions for partition.

[4] We have been cited by appellants and respondents to the case of Watson v. Sutro, 103 Cal. 169, 37 P. 201, wherein in an action for partition in which the parties thereto were represented by opposing counsel and also in which certain parties had engaged in various controversies some of which at least involved their respective claims of title to the property in question and in which the attorney for the plaintiff sought to have allowed and apportioned among said parties certain counsel fees alleged to have been expended for the common benefit, the trial court took testimony as to the reasonable value of the services so rendered by plaintiff's counsel for the common good and made an award and allotment therefor among the parties which it had found respectively entitled to share in the lands divided in proportion to their respective interests therein. This court affirmed upon appeal such award and allowance, and in so doing placed an interpretation upon section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure which we are constrained to follow in the instant case. We are moved so to do by a consideration of the facts and circumstances which we have set forth in an earlier stage of this opinion and which have reference to the prolonged controversy between the parties to this action respecting the real estate which it was the purpose of this proceeding to partition between them. In the case of Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 161 P. 1161, this court, as we have seen, decided that upon the dissolution of the Santa Cruz Island Company through the forfeiture of its charter the stockholders of said corporation who were the parties to that action and also to this action became tenants in common of the real estate involved therein. In the later case of Rossi v. Caire, 186 Cal. 544, 199 P. 1042, this court decided that an attempted revivor of said corporation was abortive and that the title and ownership of said real estate had reverted to those who had been the former stockholders of said defunct corporation. The present action was instituted after the decision of this court upon the first of said appeals had become final and after the issues presented by the second of said appeals had been brought to this court for determination, but before the rendition of its decision therein.

Upon the main decision of this court in the instant case in 189 Cal. 514, 209 P. 374, this court expressly approved the conclusion arrived at upon the first of the foregoing appeals to the effect that the parties thereto and to each and all of the subsequent appeals have become tenants in common of said real estate upon the legal death of the Santa Cruz Island Company. Such was the state of things when, following the final decision of that question by this court and following the procedural processes carried forward by the trial court in ordering and making a partition of said property in conformity with our said decision, the plaintiff herein made his motion for the allowancee of counsel fees herein under the provisions of section 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are of the opinion that under the foregoing circumstances, and in accord with our interpretation of the meaning and intent of said section, the plaintiff was entitled to a hearing and determination of his said motion in the trial court, and that the action of said court in denying such motion upon the ground stated in the aforesaid second objection urged by the respondents against a hearing thereon was erroneous, and hence that in order to the correction thereof upon proper proceedings therefor in the trial court the judgment herein must be reversed.

[5] The second question presented by the appellants herein is entitled, in our opinion, to but brief consideration. It involves an order of the trial court denying a motion made by the defendant and appellant Edmund A. Rossi herein to change and modify the report of the referees herein in the several particulars enumerated in said motion. The record discloses that upon the going down of the remittitur upon the main appeal in this action the trial court proceeded to appoint and properly qualify three referees selected by said court to make partition of the real property in question among the parties entitled thereto and in conformity with the interlocutory decree theretofore made and entered in this action and that said referees thereupon proceeded with the performance of their duties in conformity with the order of their appointment and with said decree, and that, having completed their labors, they duly made and filed with said court their referees' report. The appellants herein do not challenge in any respect the ability of said referees, or of any one of their number, nor do they question the integrity and good faith of said referees in the slightest regard. Their whole contention upon this appeal is the contention that said referees might have made in certain respects a more just and equitable division of certain portions of said properties than they appear to have done, and might have provided for more acceptable means of ingress and egress to the property or of roadways extending across the same and making accessible the somewhat infrequent harbors thereon. These, however, were all matters which were primarily the function of the trial court to determine upon the hearing of the report of said referees, and they were each and all presented to the trial court for such determination at the time of such hearing. There is no showing on this appeal of any abuse of discretion on the part of said court in determining these matters adversely to the views of the appellants herein upon the hearing of said motion, and, this being so, it would seem to be clear that a review of the decision of said court upon the matters involved in said motion upon the conflicting evidence presented before it at the hearing thereon will not be undertaken by this court upon this appeal.

The judgment herein is reversed, and the cause remanded to the trial court, for further proceedings therein upon the motion of the plaintiff for an allowance of counsel fees, in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion. Upon the hearing and determination of said motion, the trial court is hereby directed to include the same and the result thereof in its findings and decree, to be forthwith entered herein, and to conform otherwise tô its former findings and decree, and to the views expressed in this opinion. It is so ordered.

Supreme Court of California. May 6, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 3, 1929.

Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Judgment based on findings on conflicting evidence could not be disturbed on appeal.

In action to recover payment upon a contract for purchase of real property, judgment for defendants based upon trial court's findings on conflicting evidence that there was no fraud, misrepresentation, and conspiracy on part of defendants inducing plaintiffs to enter into contract, could not be disturbed on appeal.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elias V. Rosenkranz, Judge.

Action by Jessie M. Outram and another against the Taft Realty Company and others, to recover payment on a contract for a purchase of real property. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Henry M. Lee and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Farrand & Slosson, C. W. Fourl, and Horace P. Babson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. In this cause the judgment is affirmed. The basis of the action is alleged fraud, misrepresentation, and conspiracy on the part of defendants in inducing plaintiffs to enter into a contract to purchase certain real property situate in Wilmington, Los Angeles county. The court found for defendants and gave judgment accordingly. Plaintiffs have appealed. We find in the record evidence amply sufficient to uphold the action of the trial court, and as this question of its sufficiency constitutes the sole issue before us, we shall rest our conclusion upon the following brief statement of the case:

Defendants Nellie L. and Fred Mason are mother and son, respectively, both of whom are experienced in the real estate business. About September, 1923, at the instance of Nellie L. Mason, after inspection upon two occasions of said real property and neighboring real estate, and upon the representations and statements of defendants as to its present and prospective value, etc., and particularly through reliance upon representations made by defendant Fred Mason, who held an option upon it, plaintiffs, sisters, were induced to enter into a contract jointly with defendant Nellie L. Mason for the purchase of said property from defendant Taft Realty Company for the total sum of $39,650. Said contract called for a down payment of $15,000, $5,000 of which was advanced by each of said three purchasers and trust deeds were duly given for the balance. The purchase was made with the expectation of securing a large profit through resale before further payments became due under said trust deeds. All efforts to turn over the property at anything but a material loss proved unavailing, and in November, 1925, after failure of plaintiffs to meet their obligations under said trust deeds, said property was bought in at the foreclosure sale by the original owners for the balance due thereon.

Prior thereto, however, and in March, 1925, plaintiffs learned for the first time that the Taft Realty Company was not the original owner of the property, but that a week or so before the sale to them, said company, for the benefit of Fred Mason, and at a cost to him of $100, secured an option of purchase from the true owners and thereafter by means of a separate and secret escrow had said property first conveyed to it and later transferred to plaintiffs and said Nellie L. Mason; that by means of two escrows and this double conveyance, Fred Mason was enabled to raise the purchase price $5,000 upon the resale to plaintiffs and his mother, and at the close of the second escrow, he assigned to his mother said $5,000 profit, which amount she duly received. In other words, said company and Fred Mason were paid the customary commission of about 5 per cent. upon the sale, which amount they divided equally between them, and in addition a profit of $5,000 was made, which later went to Mrs. Mason, thus canceling her initial investment so that she practically lost nothing by the transaction. Upon learning these facts plaintiffs served a notice of cancellation and rescission of said deal, and, tendering a good and sufficient deed to the property to said company, they demanded the return of all moneys paid by them on account thereof. This was refused, and in November the property was sold under foreclosure as aforesaid.

Plaintiffs claim that it is obvious that Mrs. Mason and her son conspired together, and in addition to misrepresenting the value of the land and opportunities for its resale, Mrs. Mason temporarily paid in her $5,000 as a decoy to lure plaintiffs into joining with her in the contract, well knowing that her son had secured the property for a lesser sum and through his profit her $5,000 would be returned to her. Were this claim true, the authorities upon fraud cited by appellants would be applicable and would govern the situation.

Such, however, is not the case. The evidence is directly conflicting, and the court below, although it would have been warranted in believing the above to be the true significance of the facts, chose to take the opposite view of the matter. By its findings it adopted as true and correct the account of the deal given by defendants and their corroborating witnesses to the effect that property values were not misrepresented to plaintiffs; that the son did not take his mother into his confidence; that he had theretofore on two occasions made a profit out of selling real estate to her and did likewise on this occasion; that the transaction was in all respects regular and legitimate; that he owed his mother the sum of $7,500 and upon being notified that this $5,000 was held for him at the office of said company, he had it turned over to his mother as a payment on account of his said indebtedness to her. These findings have full support in the evidence, although, as above indicated, a finding for plaintiffs would likewise have been supported by the evidence. But our well-known rule as to conflicting evidence forbids interference with the judgment; hence the conclusion first above announced.

Appellee's motion to dismiss appeal or affirm judgment for appellant's failure to comply with Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, with reference to printing in brief portions of record, will be disregarded, where sufficient of record had been incorporated in appellant's opening brief to raise some, if not all, vital points on petition for hearing in Supreme Court, and by stipulation of parties cause was argued and submitted on merits; appellant in meantime having by leave of court filed extensive supplement to brief.

2. Railroads 🔑303(3)—Pier standing in highway and supporting railroad bridge held not public nuisance (Civ. Code, § 472, and § 465, subd. 5; Pen. Code, § 370).

3. Railroads 🔑350(3)—Whether pier in highway supporting overhead bridge was maintained in manner to afford security for life and property within statute held fact question (Civ. Code, § 465, subd. 5).

In action against railroad for personal injuries to occupant of automobile striking pier supporting bridge over highway in fog, question of fact was presented as to whether pier standing in middle of paved highway was maintained in such manner as to afford security for life and property within Civ. Code, § 465, subd. 5.

4. Railroads 🔑303(1)—Compliance with railroad commission's order, relative to clearance where railroads cross over highways, cannot authorize negligent maintenance of pier in highway (Const. art. 12, § 23; Public Utilities Act, §§ 42, 43; Civ. Code, § 472).

In action against railroad for personal injuries to occupant of automobile striking pier supporting bridge over highway in fog, railroad's compliance with order of railroad commission, adopted pursuant to Const. art. 12, § 23, Public Utilities Act, §§ 42, 43 (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, pp. 39, 40), relative to clearance when railroads cross over highways, cannot authorize noncompliance with Civ. Code, § 472, or negligent maintenance of pier in highway.

5. Railroads 🔑259(1)—Lessee operating railroad held liable for damage from negligent maintenance of pier in highway.

Lessee railroad held liable for damage resulting from negligent maintenance of pier in highway, where, by terms of lease, lessee undertook to operate railroad applying earnings in part to maintenance of property.

6. Railroads 🔑259(1)—General rule is lessee railroad is liable as if operating road as owner (St. 1880, p. 21).

In action against railroad for personal injuries to occupant of automobile striking pier supporting bridge over highway in fog, evidence showing that plaintiff was familiar with bridge, that wrecked condition of automobile showed excessive speed, that right wheels of car were 12 feet from right-hand edge of 20-foot highway, and that fogs were so dense as to require utmost caution, held sufficient to take to jury question of contributory negligence.

12. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1)—Railroads 🔑351(5)—Instructions submitting to jury question whether railroad pier in highway was legally authorized held erroneous and prejudicial.

In action against railroad for personal injuries to occupant of automobile striking pier supporting bridge over highway in fog, instructions submitting to jury question whether construction and maintenance of pier was legally authorized held erroneous and prejudicial, where it was impossible from record to determine upon which theory jury had found defendant guilty of negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Charles W. Barrett against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal or affirm judgment. Judgment reversed.

Superseding opinion in 269 P. 551.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin and Dozier & Kimball, all of San Francisco (Guy V. Shoup, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

James F. Brennan, of San Francisco, John J. McMahon, of Los Angeles, and William F. Herron, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from the judgment on a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injuries.

[1] The appeal was originally taken to this court. It was transferred to the District Court of Appeal for hearing and determination. The plaintiff moved in that court to dismiss the appeal or affirm the judgment on the ground that the defendant had failed to comply with the requirements of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure with reference to printing in the appellant's brief or in a supplement appended thereto the portions of the record desired to be called to the attention of the court. The motion was granted and the judgment affirmed. On petition for hearing in this court it appeared that sufficient of the record had been incorporated in the appellant's opening brief to raise some, if not all, of the vital points of law in the case, and the hearing was granted. When the cause was called for oral argument in this court, the matter before us, strictly speaking, was the motion of the plaintiff to dismiss or affirm the judgment on the grounds stated in the plaintiff's notice of motion. By stipulation of the parties, however, the cause was argued and submitted on its merits. The defendant in the meantime had by leave of court filed an extensive supplement to its brief. Under the circumstances no further notice will be taken of the motion to dismiss or affirm.

Between four and five miles northwesterly from the city of Santa Barbara the defendant corporation operates a railroad for the carrying of passengers and freight above and across the state highway at a separated grade. The overhead bridge is in two spans, each extending from the outer stone abutments to a stone pier erected in the center of the highway. This pier is about 5½ feet in width, 20 feet long, and is V-shaped at the ends. The bridge is known as the Hollister avenue bridge No. 365E and was constructed by the defendant's lessor in 1899. It crosses the highway diagonally, and the highway approaches thereto are through a cut and on a curve. The highway, however, is straight for a distance of 240 feet easterly from the pier. The paved portion of the highway in this vicinity is regularly 20 feet in width, but from a point about 200 yards from the bridge the highway begins to widen. Immediately at the bridge it is 34 feet wide. Beneath it the spans are approximately 14 feet in width.

On August 30, 1924, at about 8:30 o'clock p. m., the plaintiff and Herbert D. Phelps left Santa Barbara northbound in a Davis sedan owned by the plaintiff. Phelps was driving the car, and the plaintiff was riding in the front seat at the right of the driver. As they left Santa Barbara and approached the bridge a dense fog, such as usually occurs in that section at night in the months of July and August, was encountered. The car was equipped with a movable spot light on the right side. The plaintiff testified that he manipulated the spot light and trained it on the outer right-hand edge of the highway so as to avoid leaving the pavement. Phelps testified that because of the fog on the windshield he peered out of the left front window to observe his course in driving. Both testified that when they reached the bridge they were traveling from 12 to 15 miles per hour and that the fog was so dense that it appeared like a fog wall and obscured their vision for any considerable distance ahead, although they could see the headlights of automobiles approaching from the opposite direction. Phelps testified that he could not see ahead more than a few inches beyond the radiator cap. It was in evidence beyond dispute that there were no danger signals on the approach to the pier and that the pier was gray in color and was not equipped with any red lights or other signal of danger. Phelps further testified that he was unable to see the pier because of the fog and because the pier was about the same color as the fog. The middle front end of the car struck the pier. The car was not overturned, but the front end thereof was impinged upon the V-shaped end of the pier. The impact threw the plaintiff forward into the shattering windshield, from which position he rebounded into the front portion of the car, thereby receiving serious injuries. So far as the record shows, the driver Phelps was not seriously injured.

In his amended complaint the plaintiff alleged that the overhead bridge and the pier were constructed and at all times mentioned in the complaint were maintained by the defendant corporation; that the pier constituted a public nuisance by reason of the fact that the defendant erected and maintained it unlawfully and without a permit from the board of supervisors of Santa Barbara county; that the pier obstructed the highway and impeded, endangered, and interfered with traffic along the highway, and that the defendant was negligent in that no light or warning signal of any kind was maintained by it on or near the pier. The plaintiff alleged general damages in the sum of $65,000 and special damages in the sum of $2,800.

The answer to the amended complaint denied that the overhead bridge and pier were constructed by the defendant corporation, and alleged that they were constructed in 1899 by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company under the authority of and in compliance with sections 465 and 472 of the Civil Code, and that, thereafter, on June 26, 1902, the structure, together with other railroads and railroad property was leased to the defendant on a fixed yearly rental, but that under said lease agreement the defendant "did not expressly agree to maintain but did expressly agree to operate said railroads." Other allegations of the complaint were denied. The answer also pleaded the affirmative defense of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $67,700.

In support of the appeal it is contended that the construction and maintenance of the pier were duly authorized by law, and that the defendant was not guilty of any negligence in connection therewith. Our attention is directed to subdivision 5 of section 465 and to section 472 of the Civil Code. Section 465 defines the powers of railroad corporations. In subdivision 5 it is provided that such corporations shall have power to "construct their roads across, along, or upon any * * * highway * * * in such manner as to afford security for life and property; but the corporation shall restore the * * * highway * * * to its former state of usefulness as near as may be, or so that the railroad shall not unnecessarily impair its usefulness or injure its franchise." Section 472 provides that: "Whenever the track of such railroad crosses * * * a highway, such railroad or highway may be carried under, over, or on a level with the track, as may be most expedient. * * *"

[2, 3] The foregoing code sections constitute authority for the construction and maintenance of the railroad across the highway in question. No authority in this state has been cited which would prevent the construction and maintenance under the authority of these code sections of a pier in the middle of the highway as a support for the overhead bridge, provided the terms of the statute be complied with, viz.: That the construction be accomplished "in such manner as to afford security for life and property," and that the highway be restored "to its former state of usefulness as near as may be." The existence of the pier in question did not therefore constitute a public nuisance within the meaning of the cases relied upon by the plaintiff. L. T. Co. v. S. & W. W. R. Co., 41 Cal. 562; Marini v. Graham, 67 Cal. 130, 7 P. 442; Voorhies v. Tidewater Southern Ry. Co., 41 Cal. App. 315, 182 P. 797. But while the construction and maintenance of the bridge and pier appear to have been authorized by statute, yet we think a question of fact was presented in this case whether the pier was maintained in such manner as to afford security for life and property. The prevalence of heavy fogs at night in this section in July and August was established by government records and local observations for many years. This climatic or atmospheric condition would seem to have required a color scheme or painting on the pier different from the grayish color of the fog. This was not done, at least before this accident. Then, too, the installation of red lights or other danger signals on or near the pier as a warning to travelers along the highway would seem to have been required in the exercise of ordinary care. In the absence of these precautions we think it was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the maintenance of the pier in its condition on the night of the accident was negligence on the part of the defendant.

[4] It is insisted by the defendant that the order of the railroad commission (general order No. 26, effective January 1, 1913), adopted pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution and statutes relating to powers of that commission (Const. art. 12, § 23; Public Utilities Act, §§ 42, 43, Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, pp. 39, 40), authorized the maintenance of the pier in its condition at the time of the accident. The order provided in part as follows: "Railroads * * * which cross above * * * public highways * * * shall have a minimum side clearance when two or more spans are used, each of twelve feet." This order was undoubtedly promulgated in recognition of the fact that railroads in this state were maintaining and might thereafter construct and maintain bridges of two or more spans above and over public highways, and the pier in question was maintained in full compliance with the side clearance requirement. But it is clear that compliance with the order relied upon did not and could not operate to authorize the noncompliance with section 472 of the Civil Code or to permit the negligent maintenance of the pier. The terms of the order of the railroad commission were not at all inconsistent, but were in harmony with the Constitution and laws relating to the regulation of public utilities.

[5, 6] It is also contended by the defendant that as lessee of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company it was and is not liable for any damage which might occur from the negligent maintenance of the pier, and that, if any corporation is liable therefor, it is the lessor. We think the state of the pleadings and the evidence sufficiently establish the responsibility of the defendant for the proper maintenance of the pier. The lease was in evidence. By its terms the defendant undertook to operate the leased railroads and to apply the earnings and income derived from such operation in part to the maintenance of the railroad property. By the provisions of the lease, if not in express terms at least by reasonable and necessary implication, the lessee engaged to maintain such pier with suitable protection to the public. The fact that the lessor might be liable under certain circumstances as held in Lee v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 116 Cal. 97, 47 P. 932, Johnson v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 154 Cal. 285, 97 P. 520, and similar cases, is beside the question when, as here, the lessee is properly found to be liable. The lease in evidence was executed by virtue of legislative authority (Stats. 1880, p. 21). In such case the general rule is that the lessee company, within the terms of the lease, is liable as if it were operating the road as owner. 1 Elliott on Railroads (3d Ed.) p. 711.

[7] The answer to the original complaint denied that the defendant unlawfully or negligently maintained said pier. Thereafter the answer to the amended complaint was filed, in which the denial pregnant with the admission of maintenance was omitted. The negative pregnant in the original answer was offered and received in evidence over the defendant's objection, and the ruling thereon is urged as error. Assuming, without holding, that the denial of the superseded answer was erroneously received in evidence, its inclusion in the record was harmless for the reason that there was other sufficient evidence of the maintenance of the pier by the defendant, including the evidence of the defendant's supervisor of bridges, called as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff, who testified that the defendant kept up and maintained in repair the railroad bed over the defendant's lines from Los Angeles to San Francisco, including the Hollister avenue bridge.

[8, 9] We are not persuaded that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the opinions of experts as to the possibility, feasibility, and practicability of constructing the Hollister avenue bridge with a single span over the highway, or in refusing to admit evidence of the construction of bridges over other highways with center abutments. The evidence received was pertinent to the question of whether there had been a compliance with the provisions of section 465 of the Civil Code, and the fact that other bridges in the state were similarly constructed had no legitimate bearing upon the status of this particular bridge.

[10, 11] The defendant presents a very forceful argument on the question of the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff as matter of law. Attention is drawn to evidence of the fact that the plaintiff had driven an automobile under this same bridge at least twice before and had ridden thereunder several times in busses; that the fogs were so dense as to require the utmost caution in proceeding along the highway; and that the wrecked condition of the automobile as it was impaled on the end of the pier is a demonstration beyond cavil of the excessive rate of speed at which the car was traveling under the circumstances. It appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff that he was, just prior to the accident, manipulating the spot light attached to the car, endeavoring thereby to assist in guiding the automobile so that it would not run off the paved shoulder of the highway at the right. At the time of the impact the right wheels of the car must have been at least 12 feet from the right-hand edge of the pavement. This position of the car on a 20-foot highway would place the left wheels of the car very near the edge of the pavement at the left. But we think that in the absence of a vehicle approaching from the opposite direction or of an observed or observable obstruction ahead, this position of the automobile on the highway may not be said to establish negligence on the part of the plaintiff as matter of law. The driver of the car was watching the highway in front and at the left. From the left he might have considered himself well on the proper side of the highway if the same had been of the ordinary width at that point. The entire situation presents a close question of fact on the issue of contributory negligence. If reasonable precautions had been taken to install on the pier or otherwise provide a warning of danger, it would be difficult to escape the conclusion that the negligence of the plaintiff proximately contributed to his injuries. But on the record it cannot be said that the question of the alleged contributory negligence of the plaintiff was not properly one for the jury.

[12] At the request of the plaintiff the court gave an instruction that, if the jury should "find by a preponderance of the evidence in this case that the maintenance of said pier as a support to said bridge was not authorized or permitted by any law of the state of California, as alleged in the complaint, I then instruct you that in maintaining said pier said defendant corporation was prima facie guilty of negligence." Objection is made to this instruction as reversible error on the ground that the court thereby left the question to the jury whether the law authorized the maintenance of a pier in the center of the highway. Also at the request of the plaintiff the court further instructed the jury that: "Anything which unlawfully obstructs the free passage or use, in the customary manner, of any highway, is a nuisance," and that "nothing which is done or maintained under express authority of a statute can be deemed a nuisance."

Counsel for the plaintiff presented the case to the court and jury on two theories: First, that there was and is no authority in law for the maintenance of a pier in the center of a public highway and that therefore the maintenance of the pier in question was a public nuisance under section 3479 of the Civil Code and section 370 of the Penal Code, in which case it was and is argued the defense of contributory negligence would not lie (citing Tognazzini v. Freeman, 18 Cal. App. 468, 123 P. 540), and the defendant would be liable as an insurer (citing Stockton Auto Co. v. Confer, 154 Cal. 402, 97 P. 881); and, secondly, that the maintenance of the pier, if lawfully authorized, but maintained in its condition at the time of the accident without lights or other warning signals, was negligence on the part of the defendant. The court instructed the jury at length on the second theory of the case, that is to say, that it was the duty of the defendant "to use ordinary care to notify or warn, by signals, lights, or otherwise, all persons traveling along or on said highway, of the existence of said obstruction in said highway; and if you find by a preponderance of the evidence in this case that plaintiff was injured, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, by driving his automobile into and colliding with said obstruction; and if you further find by a preponderance of the evidence that at the time of colliding with said obstruction said plaintiff was using ordinary care and due care and caution, under all the circumstances at the time of said collision, for his own protection; and if you further find by a preponderance of the evidence that said defendant corporation did not use ordinary care to warn and notify said plaintiff of said obstruction in said highway; and if you further find by a preponderance of the evidence that the said failure, if any, to notify or warn said plaintiff of said obstruction in said highway was the sole and proximate cause of the injuries to said plaintiff, then I instruct you that it is your duty to find in favor of plaintiff in such amount as will compensate said plaintiff for the detriment, if any, caused by said injuries, if any."

[13, 14] But on the first theory of plaintiff's counsel the question of law therein presented was left entirely to the jury's notion of what the law was or ought to be on the subject, namely, whether the maintenance of the pier was or was not authorized or permitted by any law of the state of California, and that, if the jury should find "by a preponderance of the evidence" that the maintenance of the pier was not lawfully authorized, said unlawful maintenance by the defendant was prima facie proof of negligence. The court also left to the jury the determination of whether or not the pier was an unlawful obstruction in the highway and therefore a public nuisance as defined by section 370 of the Penal Code. Whether or not the original construction and subsequent maintenance of such a pier in a public highway was legally authorized was a question of law for the court to determine. Under the instructions of the court, that question was submitted to the jury for determination, and that, too, "by a preponderance of the evidence." Whether or not this particular pier was negligently maintained at the time of the accident was properly a question for the jury. All of the jurors, or more than three of them, may have concluded that the maintenance of the pier in question was not authorized or permitted by any law of the state of California, and that the defendant was guilty of negligence for that reason. Likewise, some of them may have concluded that the pier when constructed was in full compliance with section 465 of the Civil Code, and the maintenance of such a pier, with due regard for the security of life and property, was legally authorized, but that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the maintenance of this pier in its condition at the time of the accident. It is impossible from the record to determine upon which of the two theories the jury found the defendant guilty of negligence. Some of them may have found against the defendant on the one and erroneous theory, and the remaining jurors may have reached the same conclusion on the other theory. It cannot be said that the same verdict would have been reached, if the jury had been correctly instructed. Under such circumstances the erroneous instruction was prejudicial. See Ginochio v. San Francisco, 194 Cal. 159, 228 P. 428, 24 Cal. Jur. p. 864, and cases cited.

[15] It may not reasonably be questioned that the original construction of the pier in 1899 was then legally authorized for the reason that, under conditions prevailing at the time of horse-drawn vehicles and dirt roads, the highway was restored to its former state of usefulness. In fact, it would seem to be generally accepted that a separation of the grade was a distinct advantage over a grade crossing which might then have been installed. Even in these days of swiftly driven motor vehicles and paved highways, it might be said that the separated grade with the pier in the center is more conducive to the security of life and property than a grade crossing at the point, provided the motor traveling public be properly warned of the presence of the pier. The only question, therefore, to be left to the jury would be whether the defendant had at the time of the accident provided safeguards or signals to warn users of the highway of the presence of the pier sufficient to relieve itself of liability as against a charge of negligence.

[16] Finally, the defendant contends that the damages are excessive. It appeared in evidence that the plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was 43 years of age, and that his expectancy was then 26 years. His earnings from his business were about $2,500 per year. The amount of such income multiplied by the number of years of his expectancy equals the sum of $65,000, which was the amount of general damages prayed for in the complaint and allowed by the jury in its verdict. The additional amount in the verdict was made up in response to proof of expense for nurses, doctors, hospital, incidental expenses, and damage to the automobile. There is no question as to the very serious and permanent disability suffered by the plaintiff. The defendant offered no evidence in an endeavor to minimize it. The extent of the injuries need not be recounted other than to say that the evidence shows permanent impairment to the plaintiff's knee which has resulted in some limitation of motion, and permanent partial paralysis of the tongue which interferes with the proper mastication and swallowing of food and also causes considerable embarrassment when the plaintiff dines in public. There is no sufficient evidence that the plaintiff is so disabled as to be incapacitated from engaging in some gainful occupation. A comparison of the evidence with the verdict convinces us that the jury was moved by considerations foreign to the evidence in arriving at the amount of $67,700 in the verdict. If the judgment could otherwise be affirmed we would feel compelled to reduce the amount thereof. To what extent it is unnecessary to say, for the reason that the cause must go back for further proceedings because of prejudicial misdirection of the jury.

The judgment is reversed.

HENDERSON v. OROVILLE-WYANDOTTE IRR. DIST. (Sac. 4281.)

Supreme Court of California. May 6, 1929.

1. Action ⚷6—In action for declaratory relief with reference to water rights brought by landowner against irrigation district, court erred in refusing relief for lack of jurisdiction without leave to amend complaint (Code Civ. Proc. § 1060).

In action under Code Civ. Proc. § 1060, for declaratory relief against irrigation district by owner of land with water right appurtenant thereto, in which a bona fide controversy was shown as to nature, degree, and extent of plaintiff's rights, court erred in refusing relief for lack of jurisdiction without leave to amend complaint and without pointing where relief might be had.

2. Courts ⚷472(2)—Superior court held not without jurisdiction of action for declaratory relief relative to water rights on ground Railroad Commission's order was involved (Const. art. 6, § 5; Code Civ. Proc. § 76, subd. 3).

Superior court held not without jurisdiction under Const. art. 6, § 5, and Code Civ. Proc. § 76, subd. 3, of action for declaratory relief with reference to water rights brought by landowner against irrigation district, on ground that order of Railroad Commission granting permission to transfer property of water company to defendant was involved, and that such order is reviewable only in Supreme Court, since interpretation of such order, and not validity is involved.

3. Waters and water courses ⚷253—Transfer of property from water company to irrigation district does not destroy established water rights in land.

Water right dedicated to lands of plaintiff in 1892, and enjoyed continuously since that time, will not ordinarily be destroyed or consumed by any transfer of franchises or property from water company to irrigation district, where contracting parties had full notice of landowner's rights.

4. Waters and water courses ⚷249—Right to water service held, under circumstances, property right appurtenant to land, but subject to regulation.

Where plaintiff had purchased tract of land together with perpetual water right appurtenant thereto from water company engaged in sale and disposition of water along with sales and conveyances of land, plaintiff's right to water service was property right appurtenant to land, though subject to regulation, so that public trust was impressed on water company to furnish to those to whom water right had been dedicated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Action for declaratory relief with reference to water rights by J. C. Henderson against the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District. From a judgment denying relief for lack of jurisdiction, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, and George F. Jones, of Oroville, for appellant.

Raymond A. Leonard, of Oroville, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. The judgment denying declaratory relief under section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for lack of jurisdiction, is reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

Plaintiff, on behalf of himself and some 81 other landowners, sues to have his water rights in certain real property declared under a deed, contract, and order of the Railroad Commission of the state of California, which instruments affect his title and right of possession to said property. Defendant demurred generally and specially to the jurisdiction of the court over such subject-matter. The court did not merely refuse in the exercise of its discretion to entertain the matter, but, as above noted, refused relief on the ground of lack of jurisdiction, and this, too, without leave to amend the complaint. A judgment of dismissal followed, from which this appeal has been taken.

[1] Concededly a bona fide controversy has arisen between plaintiff and defendant as to the nature, degree, and extent of his rights under said instruments as against the claims of defendant. Why this does not constitute a typical case for declaratory relief by a court of general jurisdiction does not appear. Surely, such a court under these circumstances must at least point the index finger to the place where relief may be had even were it conceded that power to grant relief was wanting at its own hands. The reasons for our conclusion will be the more manifest from the following discussion:

In 1892 plaintiff purchased a tract of land, together with a perpetual water right appurtenant thereto, from Palermo Land & Water Company, a public utility engaged in the sale and distribution of water along with its sales and conveyances of land. Palermo L. & W. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 380, 160 P. 228. It agreed to and did construct canals, ditches, and laterals suitable for conveying water to plaintiff's land, and for many years plaintiff enjoyed uninterrupted water service to his lands from said utility. Later, in 1919, defendant was organized as a public corporation—an irrigation district—largely for the purpose of including within its boundaries some of the lands to which had become attached or dedicated water rights of the type here under consideration. Accordingly, following its organization, defendant district negotiated with said utility to take over its properties and property rights and make its water supply, diversion, and transportation works a part of the property of the said district.

The consent of the Railroad Commission of the state was necessary for such a transfer, and therefore, on June 30, 1922, an application was filed with that body by the corporations involved for the requisite permission. A hearing was duly noticed, at which plaintiff and some 81 other water users in like situation, all owning property without the boundaries of said district, appeared and set up their water rights and the dedication of water service to their lands, and protested against such sale, unless and until their rights to said water service were perpetually guaranteed and protected. Whereupon defendant district passed a resolution setting up this controversy with and protest of said outside water users, and, in consideration of the withdrawal of said protest, specifically declared therein that the president and secretary of the district should be empowered to enter into contracts with the protestants to the effect that water in certain amounts and at certain rates would be furnished them until January 1, 1928, and that subsequent to said date such service should continue uninterruptedly thereafter, and that such rates should never thereafter be increased, unless the users of water in the district were required to pay a higher rate, in which event the outside users would be required to conform to the rate paid by the inside users. Making the substance of this resolution a condition precedent to its order, the Railroad Commission gave its consent to the consummation of such transfer, its order in this behalf providing: "It is hereby ordered that the applications designated above be and the same are hereby granted, subject to the following conditions: * * * 2. That the present water users of the two water companies parties hereto, and those persons or firms desiring to become water users within ten (10) years from the date hereof, shall receive service from the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District at the rates and under the conditions recited in Application 8000 and Application 8018 and in the resolutions of the directors of the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District dated October 20, 1922, submitted and marked as Exhibit 4 in Application No. 8000 and Exhibit 5 in Application No. 8018."

This order of the commission became final. A deed was made by the utility to the district which contained, among other clauses, the following: "* * * It being understood that said property is so conveyed to said party of the second part subject to all existing obligations of the party of the first part to furnish water to the present water users and to such persons, firms or corporations as are entitled to the use of water from said party of the first part."

The complaint, after setting up the foregoing facts in detail, continues and shows that the contracts provided for in the order of the Railroad Commission were made, and the rates therein set forth, except as modified by the said Railroad Commission, continued until on or about January 28, 1928, at which time defendant took certain action admittedly indicating an intention on its part to increase the charges applicable to plaintiff and other outside users as well as to curtail the supply of water to them, all in such a way as to deny them the same consideration given to water users within the said district. The pleading further alleged that no warrant for this discrimination had been furnished by any rate-supervising body, and finally alleged that the situation was one calling for declaratory relief. Defendant interposed a demurrer to the jurisdiction upon both general and special grounds. The order sustaining said demurrer without leave to amend on the ground of lack of jurisdiction and the appeal from the judgment of dismissal furnishes the issue before us.

[2] Plaintiff, relying upon the provisions of said section of the Code demands reversal of the judgment. Respondent, however, insists in reply thereto that said order of the Railroad Commission granting permission to make said transfer to it is involved; that, as such an order is reviewable only in the Supreme Court, the superior court is without jurisdiction in the premises. This position is manifestly untenable.

In the first place, the order of the commission is only one of the written instruments involved affecting the title to said real property. Again, the validity of the order of the Railroad Commission is not in question nor under review. The interpretation of that order at most is the only question before the court. The superior court is a court of general jurisdiction. It derives its powers from article 6, § 5, of the Constitution, and section 76, subd. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Superior Court, 43 Cal. App. 332, 185 P. 195. Where a written instrument affects the title to real property, otherwise subject to the jurisdiction of the superior court, we can conceive of no reason why such an instrument may not be construed and its meaning declared, even though the document is final in its nature and is the result of action by either the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of a state government or of the government of the United States.

[3] The further contention of respondent seems to be that, inasmuch as the Railroad Commission admittedly is without supervisory power over defendant irrigation district (Jochimsen v. City of Los Angeles, 54 Cal. App. 715, 202 P. 902; City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 526, 192 P. 25, 10 A. L. R. 1425; Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 187 P. 1056; Water Users' & Taxpayers' Ass'n v. Railroad Commission, 188 Cal. 437, 205 P. 682), and further asserting the passage of such resolution of the district was an act ultra vires its powers, the said district thereby acquired the water rights in question without restriction or condition, and plaintiff and others in like situation are thereby foreclosed from questioning the unregulated supremacy in the premises of said district. In other words, the contention is that the exemption, weakness, and infirmities of the district are now to be claimed elements of strength as against the claims of plaintiff and others. We, of course, are not required to finally dispose of this question, and do not do so, but we do not hesitate to say that a water right was in 1892 dedicated to the lands of plaintiff and others in like situation, and they have enjoyed such right continuously up to this time, and it is difficult to see how, by any transfer of franchises or property from the utility to the district, these rights can be said to have been destroyed or consumed—rights of which each of the contracting parties admittedly had full notice. Byington v. Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Co., 170 Cal. 124, 130, 148 P. 791. Nor at this time does anything appear that convinces us that the power to regulate this distribution to plaintiff and his associates has been lost.

[4] Appellant, for a reversal, relies largely upon the case of McIntyre v. Consolidated Water Co. (Cal. Sup.) 270 P. 444, an action similar to the one at bar. We agree that the holding in this case supports his contention. Respondent, however, contends that a distinction between that case and the situation at bar lies in the fact that here the right of plaintiff is only a right to have a delivery of water from the utility to him, whereas in the McIntyre Case a private property right existed in the water, in the wells, and in the distribution system in favor of plaintiff, which property right does not exist in plaintiff in this case. This difference exists in fact, but in our opinion it is not sufficient ground upon which to base a distinction, for the right of plaintiff to water service is a property right appurtenant to his land, although subject to regulation, or, in other words upon the utility corporation was impressed a public trust, to wit, the duty of furnishing water to plaintiff and others in like situation to whom a water right has been dedicated. See Price v. Riverside L. & I. Co., 56 Cal. 431, and McCrary v. Beaudry, 67 Cal. 120, 7 P. 264. In the case of Hildreth v. Montecito Creek Water Co., 139 Cal. 22, 72 P. 395, it is said: "In the case of a public use, the beneficiaries do not possess rights to the water which are, in the ordinary sense, private property. A public use 'must be for the general public, or some portion of it, and not a use by or for particular individuals, or for the benefit of certain estates.' McQuillen v. Hatton, 42 Ohio St. 202. 'The use and benefit must be in common, not to particular individuals or estates.' Lewis on Eminent Domain, sec. 161; Coster v. Tide Water Co., 18 N. J. Eq. 68; Pocantico Co. v. Bird, 130 N. Y. 259 [29 N. E. 246]; Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal. 251; McFadden v. County of Los Angeles, 74 Cal. 571 [16 P. 397]. The right of an individual to a public use of water is in the nature of a public right possessed by reason of his status as a person of the class for whose benefit the water is appropriated or dedicated. All who enter the class may demand the use of the water, regardless of whether they have previously enjoyed it or not." Quoted with approval in Leavitt v. Lassen Irrigation Co., 157 Cal. 82, 89, 90, 106 P. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213. See Sutter Butte Canal Co. v. Railroad Commission, 202 Cal. 179, 259 P. 937.

This is a sufficient discussion warranting the conclusion already above announced.

J. E. RUTHERFORD and Wyandotte Bangor Water Users Association (an Association), Plaintiffs and Appellants, v. OROVILLE-WYANDOTTE IRR. DIST. (a Public Corporation), Defendant and Respondent. (Sac. 4282.)

Supreme Court of California. May 6, 1929.

Appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court of Butte County, Michael J. Roche, Judge, in an action for declaratory relief with reference to water rights. Reversed.

Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, and George F. Jones, of Oroville, for appellants.

Raymond A. Leonard, of Oroville, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is a companion case to Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, 277 P. 487, this day decided. That action was brought against this same defendant on behalf of some 81 landowners similarly situated to plaintiff here and the landowners on whose behalf this action is prosecuted. Although in each action the landowners and public utility involved are different, the cases are in all other respects practically identical. In fact, the two proceedings before the Railroad Commission, based upon application No. 8000 in the Henderson Case and application No. 8018 in this case, were consolidated and are both disposed of by one order. For a detailed statement of the facts, reference is made to said case of Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, supra, and upon the same grounds and for all the reasons set forth therein the judgment in the instant case denying declaratory relief under section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for lack of jurisdiction, is reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

GIBBONS v. CLAPP et al.

MORGAN et al. v. SAME.

(Sac. 4105.)

Supreme Court of California. May 8, 1929.

1. Judgment 🔑153(2)—Court, after expiration of one year, has no jurisdiction of motion to set aside default judgment not invalid on its face (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Where no application to set aside or vacate default judgment is made within one year under provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, judgment not invalid on its face is beyond the reach of the court which rendered it, except as against attack in separate action, and any order purporting to vacate it is beyond court's jurisdiction and void.

2. Judgment 🔑141—Judgment void on its face may be at any time vacated on motion or on court's own motion.

Judgment or order void on its face may be vacated on motion made at any time, or court may of its own motion set it aside and disregard it, regardless of manner in which invalidity is brought to its attention.

3. Judgment 🔑141—Invalidity apparent from inspection of judgment roll renders judgment void on its face.

Judgment or order is void on its face when invalidity is apparent on inspection of the judgment roll.

4. Judgment 🔑141—Default judgment may be set aside at any time, where based on defective affidavit for publication of summons (Code Civ. Proc. § 412).

If affidavit for order directing publication of summons fails to comply with provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 412, default judgment, subsequently entered on such defective service, is void on its face, and may be set aside at any time.

5. Process 🔑96(2)—Affidavit for publication which shows existence of any one of several conditions specified by statute is sufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 412).

Affidavit for publication of summons showing existence of any one of conditions mentioned in Code Civ. Proc. § 412, as basis for service by publication, fully satisfies statutory requirement.

6. Process 🔑96(3)—Affidavit for publication, reciting that action was brought to quiet title to real property in county, in which affiant believed defendant claimed interest, and that action was brought to exclude defendant's interest, held sufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 412).

Affidavit for publication of summons, alleging that action was brought to quiet title to land situated in county, and that affiant was informed that defendant claimed interest therein, and that action was brought for purpose of excluding defendant from any interest in particular property, held sufficient under Code Civ. Proc. § 412.

7. Judgment 🔑174—Where order purporting to vacate default judgment quieting title was void, court properly adjudged title and right of possession in substituted plaintiffs (Code Civ. Proc. § 412).

Where affidavit for publication of summons was sufficient under Code Civ. Proc. § 412, and order purporting to vacate default judgment quieting title, more than two years after its entry, was void, trial court on having its attention called to its improper exercise of jurisdiction in vacating judgment, properly disregarded the void vacating order, and adjudged title and right of possession to be in substituted plaintiffs.

8. Appeal and error 🔑803—Dismissal of appeal from void order for failure to file transcript did not validate order.

Dismissal of appeal from void order for appellant's failure to file transcript imparted no validity to order.

9. Appeal and error 🔑173(6)—Defendant could not for first time on appeal from order refusing motion to vacate judgment complain that judgment was obtained by fraud.

Where it was not claimed on motion to vacate default judgment that extrinsic fraud had been practiced in securing entry of judgment, that claim could not be availed of for first time on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by Oscar Gibbons against Mrs. E. R. Clapp and others. Judgment was entered for plaintiff by default, and thereafter O. D. Morgan and another were substituted as plaintiffs. A motion of defendant named to vacate the default judgment was denied, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Sharp, of Alturas, and H. W. Brunk, of Berkeley, for appellant.

J. J. Lerman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to quiet the title of the plaintiff, Gibbons, in and to certain real property. Service of summons was had by publication, and judgment as prayed for in the complaint was entered May 6, 1921. More than two years thereafter the defendant moved the court below to set aside and vacate its judgment and decree on the ground that the affidavit accompanying the request for an order directing publication of summons failed, the complaint being unverified, to comply with the provisions of section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in that it did not aver sufficient probative facts to establish the existence of a cause of action against the defendant. On August 20, 1923, the trial court granted the motion, and set aside the judgment, 27 months after its entry. An appeal taken by the plaintiff from the order setting aside and vacating the judgment was dismissed by this court on January 6, 1925, for failure to file a transcript. When the cause came on again for hearing in the trial court, it was urged by the plaintiff that O. D. Morgan and the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank had acquired all of his right, title, and interest in and to the property at a time subsequent to the entry of the judgment and decree quieting title, but prior to the vacation of such judgment upon appellant's motion. It then being made to appear that the real parties in interest had not been served with notice of appellant's motion to set aside the judgment, though the instruments transferring title to them had been of record at the time, the trial court, being of the opinion that its order granting said motion was ineffective and inoperative as to said parties, reopened the proceedings looking to the vacation of the judgment, and, upon application, permitted Morgan and the bank, as such real parties in interest, to file a supplemental complaint setting forth the facts showing their acquisition of the property involved. With the matter thus fully before it, the court below, upon reconsideration, concluded that the affidavit, as filed by the original plaintiff, for an order directing publication of summons, was amply sufficient to meet the Code requirements, and denied appellant's motion to vacate the default judgment entered against her. It thereupon decreed that the substituted plaintiffs were the owners in fee and entitled to possession of the property, and that appellant was without interest therein. This appeal followed.

[1-4] It is well settled that a court has no power to set aside or vacate, on motion, a judgment not void upon its face, unless the motion is made within a reasonable time; and it is as definitely determined that such time will not extend beyond the limit fixed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which in no case exceeds one year. In the absence of application made within the time specified in section 473, supra, a judgment which is not invalid on its face is entirely beyond the reach of the court that rendered it, except in a separate action; and any order of the court purporting to vacate it is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and, therefore, void. People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 675, 77 P. 651; Dunsmuir v. Coffey, 148 Cal. 137, 140, 82 P. 682. However, a judgment or order void on its face may be vacated on motion made at any time, or the court may, of its own motion, set it aside or disregard it, regardless of how the invalidity is brought to its attention. People v. Davis, supra; Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 528, 137 P. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737. A judgment or order is said to be void on its face when the invalidity is apparent upon an inspection of the judgment roll. People v. Davis, supra. It follows, therefore, that, if the affidavit upon which the order directing publication of summons was had in this action fails, as urged by the appellant, to comply with the provisions of section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the default judgment thereafter entered on such defective service would be void on its face, and the trial court at any time could have properly set it aside. Should it be determined, however, that the affidavit fully satisfies the requirements of the Code section, the judgment would not be void on its face, and the attempt of the court below to vacate it upon motion made more than a year after entry would be beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and the order purporting to vacate the judgment would occupy no better position than a judgment that is void upon its face, and, like such a judgment, would be assailable wherever and whenever it might be produced. People v. Davis, supra; Dunsmuir v. Coffey, supra. It is preliminarily essential, therefore, that the sufficiency of the affidavit be determined.

[5] At the time of the filing of the affidavit in this cause, section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so far as now material, authorized an order directing publication of summons when, in the absence of a verified complaint, it was made by affidavit to appear "that a cause of action exists against the defendant in respect to whom the service is to be made, or that he is a necessary or proper party to the action; or when it appears by such affidavit, * * * that it is an action which relates to or the subject of which is real or personal property in this state, in which such person defendant or corporation defendant has or claims a lien or interest, actual or contingent, therein, or in which the relief demanded consists wholly or in part in excluding such person or corporation from any interest therein. * * *" The section reads in the disjunctive, and an affidavit showing the existence of any one of the several conditions therein mentioned fully satisfies the statutory requirements. Brown v. Sandell, 79 Cal. App. 313, 317, 249 P. 209.

[6] The affidavit filed herein avers, among other things: "That said action is an action brought by the said plaintiff against the said defendants to quiet the title of plaintiff in and to certain real property described in the complaint on file herein, situated in Modoc County, State of California, and affiant states that he is informed and believes that said defendant, Mrs. E. R. Clapp, claims some interest in said real estate, and affiant further states that said action is brought for the purpose of excluding said defendant, Mrs. E. R. Clapp, from any interest in said real property, and that said defendant, Mrs. E. R. Clapp, is a necessary and proper party to said action." That the action relates to adverse interests in certain real property situate in this state, and has as its object and purpose the exclusion of appellant from any interest in such real property, is readily apparent from the quoted portion of the affidavit. This, in our opinion, fully satisfies the statutory requirements. Brown v. Sandell, supra. Appellant cites People v. Mulcahy, 159 Cal. 34, 112 P. 853, in support of her contention touching the asserted insufficiency of the affidavit. The case of Brown v. Sandell, supra, wherein a hearing in this court was denied, has this to say in regard to the Mulcahy Case: "An examination of the opinion, however, clearly discloses that the Supreme Court did not have before it the amendment to section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which included the provisions relating to causes involving adverse claims to property such as we have here. There is nothing in the Mulcahy decision wich covers the point to which it is cited, and it is, therefore, not authority upon that proposition. The terms of the statute are plain that either the verified complaint or the affidavit must show the existence of one of the conditions mentioned in section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and as the affidavit here in question clearly disclosed that the action involved adverse claims to real property in this state, it was sufficient within the terms of that section."

[7] It must be concluded, therefore, that the affidavit filed in this case was sufficient, and the judgment thereafter entered valid on its face. The order of August 20, 1923, purporting to vacate the judgment more than two years after entry, was therefore void, and the trial court, upon having its attention called to its improper exercise of jurisdiction, had no alternative but to disregard such void vacating order, and, upon denial of appellant's motion to vacate, quite properly proceeded to adjudge title and right of possession to be in the substituted plaintiffs.

[8] The dismissal of the original plaintiff's appeal from the void order of August 20, 1923, for failure to file a transcript, imparted no validity to that order which otherwise it did not possess. Sullivan v. Gage, 145 Cal. 759, 770, 771, 79 P. 537.

[9] In response to a suggestion thrown out by appellant's closing brief that extrinsic fraud had been practiced in securing the entry of the default judgment in 1921, it may be said that fraud was not urged by her upon the motion to vacate, and may not therefore be availed of for the first time upon this appeal.

The order or "judgment" appealed from is affirmed.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, DIVISION OF INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS AND SAFETY et al. (S. F. 13189.)

Supreme Court of California. April 29, 1929.

1. Master and servant 🔑385(16)—Employee suffering permanent injury held entitled to medical and hospital treatment reasonably required to relieve him of effects of injury; "cure and relieve" (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 9(a).

Injured employee is entitled under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 9(a); St. 1917, p. 836, to medical and hospital treatment reasonably required to relieve him of effects of injury, even though permanently injured, notwithstanding that it necessitates holding that the words "cure and relieve" as used therein were intended to mean the same as "cure or relieve."

2. Master and servant 🔑416—Award for medical and hospital treatment reasonably required was not void for uncertainty.

Award by Department of Industrial Relations, Division of Industrial Accidents and Safety, requiring employer to furnish medical, surgical, and hospital treatment, including nursing, as may be reasonably required to cure and relieve employee from effects of injury, was not void because of uncertainty.

3. Master and servant 🔑416½—Department of Industrial Relations may take all necessary steps to enforce award made within statutory period (Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 20 (d), 63(a).

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 63 (a); St. 1917, p. 873, the Department of Industrial Relations, Division of Industrial Accidents and Safety, has authority to make any necessary orders for purpose of making effective award made by it within 240 weeks after date of injury, in that an order therefor does not constitute rescission, alteration, or amendment of award of compensation in violation of section 20(d); St. 1917, p. 850.

In Bank.

Original application for certiorari by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company to review an order of the Department of Industrial Relations, Division of Industrial Accidents and Safety, in favor of William Hardy. Writ denied and award affirmed.

Horace W. B. Smith and P. R. Lund, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This proceeding was instituted for the purpose of having reviewed and annulled a certain order made by the Department of Industrial Relations, Division of Industrial Accidents and Safety. By section 364b of the Political Code, as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 734, § 3), the Department of Industrial Relations has succeeded to all the powers vested in the Industrial Accident Commission by the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), and acts amendatory thereof. On November 19, 1923, the respondent William Hardy was injured while in the employ of Gibbons & Reed, contractors. At the time Hardy received his injury the petitioner, the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company, was the insurer of Gibbons & Reed against liability for compensation under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, enacted in 1917.

Petitioner without waiting for any action on the part of the Industrial Accident Commission paid for all medical, surgical, and hospital treatment, including nursing required to cure and relieve Hardy for a period of 240 weeks, or up to and including June 19, 1928, and in addition thereto paid to him the sum of $14.82 per week for 240 weeks, and thereafter $9.12 per week. On the 10th day of July, 1928, after a hearing before the Department of Industrial Relations, Division of Industrial Accidents and Safety, an award was made in favor of Hardy and against petitioner "of the sum of $14.82 a week, beginning November 27, 1923, and continuing for 240 weeks, and thereafter a life pension at the rate of $9.12 a week." In this award the petitioner was given credit against said award for all payments previously made by it on account of Hardy's disability. There is no objection or complaint made by petitioner to any of the terms of that portion of the award above set out as the department found, and it is admitted by the petitioner that Hardy's injury produced total permanent disability. The department, however, as a part of said award made the further order as follows: "It is ordered that defendant insurance carrier furnish to employee the medical, surgical and hospital treatment, including nursing, as may be reasonably required to cure and relieve him from the effects of said injury." It is conceded that this award for medical and hospital treatment was intended to cover not only the treatment furnished Hardy during the 240 weeks' period, immediately following his injury, and which the petitioner had paid for in full, but its intent and purpose was to provide for such treatment beyond said 240 weeks' period, and was designed to require petitioner to furnish Hardy medical, surgical, and hospital treatment, including nursing, so long as the same may be required to cure and relieve Hardy from the effects of his present injury and after said injury had been declared permanent. As stated by petitioner in its points and authorities filed herein: "The issue in this case is the power or jurisdiction of the said Department of Industrial Relations, Division of Industrial Accidents and Safety, to make the award of July 10, 1928, ordering that the petitioner herein furnish the employee (Hardy) the medical, surgical and hospital treatment, including nursing, as may be reasonably required to cure and relieve him from the effects of said injury." This identical question was before this court in two prior proceedings in which the petitioner herein was also the petitioner. The first of said proceedings was entitled United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company v. Industrial Accident Commission, S. F. 12102, and was referred to as the Blankenhorn Case. In that proceeding the petition was denied without any written opinion. The same question was again raised by the same petitioner in a second petition in the Blankenhorn Case, being numbered S. F. 12404. This petition was also denied as was also a motion for a rehearing, but no written opinion was filed on either occasion. Upon the filing of the present petition while the same question is raised as was presented in said prior proceedings, we deemed it best to grant an alternative writ, and, after argument and consideration of the case, to file a written opinion expressing the views of this court upon the question involved, which apparently may be one of frequent recurrence.

Before proceeding to the decision of the main question in the case, it might be well to state that the injury to Hardy having been sustained on November 19, 1923, the 240 weeks' period, beyond which payments for temporary disability could not be extended (section 9 of said act) expired on June 19, 1928, and the 245 weeks' period, after which no award of compensation can be rescinded, altered, or amended (section 20 [d] of said act) expired on August 3, 1928. The award of July 10, 1928, was, therefore, made after the department had determined that the injury to Hardy had produced total permanent disability, but within the 245 weeks' period in which an award for total disability might be made. There can be no question, in so far as the time limit is material to the validity of said order, that the department acted within time and had jurisdiction to make said order or award.

This brings us to petitioner's principal contention that the department is without the power or jurisdiction to make an award for medical, hospital, or surgical treatment, after it has determined that the injury to the employee has produced total permanent disability. Section 9(a) of the Workmen's Compensation Act provides that the employer shall furnish to the injured employee "such medical, surgical and hospital treatment, including nursing, medicines, medical and surgical supplies, crutches and apparatus, including artificial members, as may reasonably be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury." This duty of the employer to furnish to his injured employee medical treatment has undergone various changes since the enactment of the original Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 279). In that act this obligation was limited to such medical treatment as might be reasonably required at the time of the injury "and within ninety days thereafter, to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury." Section 15(a). In the amendment of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1082, § 4) the Industrial Accident Commission was given the power to extend this period of 90 days in which the employer was required to furnish medical treatment. In Union Iron Works v. Industrial Accident Com., 190 Cal. 33, 47, 210 P. 410, it was held that, without making any formal order of extension where the employer refused to furnish the required medical treatment, the commission under this amendment was empowered to make an award for such medical treatment to be furnished to the injured employee by a physician of his own selection over four years after the date of the injury, and that such award could be made at any time after the services were rendered and within 245 weeks after the date of injury. In 1917 the act was again amended to read as we have quoted it above. From its provisions it will be noted that the right of the employee to receive and the liability of the employer to furnish medical treatment is not expressly limited to 240 weeks, nor is this right or liability expressly limited to any period whatever. The only limitation which petitioner contends is to be found in the act as now in force is that implied in the words "as reasonably may be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury." Petitioner insists that these words just quoted plainly express a purpose and intent to limit medical treatment to those cases only in which the condition of the injured employee is not permanent and, therefore, which may be cured and relieved from the effects of the injury by medical treatment. Petitioner contends that a physical condition which has become permanent is a condition which is changeless, and consequently the condition could neither be cured nor relieved by medical treatment. In support of this contention petitioner relies upon orders of this court denying a petition for review, and for rehearing, in a proceeding referred to as the "Elmore case," and entitled Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation v. Elmore, 4 I. A. C. 359. In that proceeding the commission refused to order the employer to furnish medical treatment for an injured employee on the ground that the medical treatment provided for in section 15 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, as amended in 1915, "did not include treatment for a disabled condition such as had become definitely permanent and would not as a result of such treatment be cured or improved." Whatever force or effect might have been given to the orders of this court denying a petition for a review and a petition for a rehearing in the Elmore Case at one time has been completely overcome and nullified by the more recent consideration and determination given by this court to the various petitions before us in the Blankenhorn Case, which have already been referred to. It is evident from the action taken by this court upon the hearing of these different petitions in the Blankenhorn Case that we were not in accord with the conclusions reached by the commission in the Elmore Case, and that we favored a more liberal construction of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act than that given to it by the commission at the time the Elmore Case was before it.

Petitioner has called to our attention certain statements appearing on page 40 of our decision in the case of Union Iron Works v. Industrial Accident Com., 190 Cal. 33 (210 P. 410, 413), to the following effect: "It therefore follows that the medical and surgical services contemplated and called for by the statute in question should be such as will tend to secure the return of the workman to productive employment. In other words, and perhaps more precisely stated, the treatment required by the statute is such as will reasonably and seasonably tend to relieve and cure the injured employee from the effects of the injury. * * *" From this language petitioner draws the conclusion that the sole object and purpose of medical and surgical treatment as provided for in the act is to restore the injured workman to productive employment, and that when this object and purpose cannot be accomplished—and it is self-evident that it cannot in case the injury has become permanent—the injured workman is no longer entitled to have any further medical or surgical treatment furnished to him by his employer. A reading of the opinion in the case of Union Iron Works v. Industrial Accident Com., supra, however, we think, makes it apparent that the court was not discussing medical treatment, provided by the statute, in its relation to an injury that had become permanent. In that case the injured employee became dissatisfied with the medical treatment furnished him by his employer for the reason that it was not curing his injury. He refused, therefore, to accept such treatment, and employed a physician and surgeon of his own choice, under whose treatment he was restored to health. The Industrial Accident Commission made an award in his favor for the services rendered by the privately employed physician and surgeon, and the court affirmed the award. In so doing it held that, as the commission had found that the medical treatment furnished by the employer was not such as would tend to secure the return of the employee to productive employment—that is, it did not tend to cure the injured employee—the latter was justified in his refusal to accept such treatment, and in securing treatment which would cure his injury. In discussing the nature of the treatment to which the injured employee in that case was entitled, and who had not sustained a permanent injury, the court used the language relied upon by petitioner. This language has no application to the facts in the present proceeding, where the injury of the employee is concededly permanent in its nature.

[1] Having disposed of the authorities relied upon by petitioner to sustain its contention that under the statute an employee whose injuries are permanent is not entitled to any medical, hospital, or surgical treatment, we will now turn to the statute itself in an endeavor to ascertain its meaning. As before noted, section 9 (a) of the act provides that the employer shall furnish to his injured employee such medical treatment, including nursing, as may reasonably be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury. To hold that an employee who has sustained permanent injuries is not entitled to medical treatment for the reason that his condition is beyond cure would be to eliminate entirely the word "relieve" from the above section of the act. It must be presumed that the Legislature had some purpose in mind in the use of the word "relieve" as it is found in the act, and it is the duty of the courts, so far as they are able, in construing said act, to give effect to this word, as well as to all other words and provisions of said act. By section 69 of said act it is provided that, whenever any part or section of said act is interpreted by the court, "it shall be liberally construed by such court with the purpose of extending the benefits of the act for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment." If we should follow the ordinary rules of construction applicable to the interpretation of statutes, in determining the meaning of section 9(a) of said act, providing that the employer furnish such medical treatment "as may reasonably be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury," we would hesitate to hold that "cure and relieve" meant simply to cure, and that an employee permanently injured was not entitled to medical treatment for the reason that his injury was beyond cure, if such treatment would tend to relieve said injury. We would find it difficult to conclude that the Legislature did not intend to provide medical treatment for the relief as well as for the cure of his injuries, and that in the case where the injury was permanent and could not, therefore, be cured, it was not intended that the injured employee should be furnished with such medical treatment as might be required to relieve him from the effects of his injury. When, however, we seek to construe this section of the act in the light of the injunction found in section 69 thereof, we think that there can be no question as to our duty to give it that liberal construction which its phraseology clearly warrants, and which will result "in extending the benefits of the act for the protection" of the injured employee Hardy. This may necessitate holding that the words "cure and relieve" were intended to mean the same as "cure or relieve." In our opinion this is the only reasonable conclusion that can be reached when we consider the act as a whole and its objects and purposes. A similar conclusion was reached by the Supreme Court of Minnesota in the case of Eberle v. Miller, 170 Minn. 207, 212 N. W. 190. The facts were substantially the same as those before us in the present proceeding. The statute of that state upon the subject was practically identical with the Compensation Act of our own state. On page 191 of the opinion (170 Minn. 209) the court said: "The controlling issue here under consideration is whether an employee who has sustained accidental injury in the course of his employment, resulting in total permanent disability, is entitled to further medical and hospital treatment when all has been done that can be done to cure or improve his condition resulting from such injury. * * * We think the words cure and relieve were intended to mean the same as cure or relieve and should be so construed." As before stated, we think this to be the reasonable construction to be given to our own statute. Under such a construction the injured employee, although permanently injured, would be entitled to such medical and hospital treatment as may be reasonably required to relieve him from the effects of his injury.

[2] It is further contended by the petitioner that the award of the department is void for uncertainty in that it cannot be ascertained therefrom what was the reasonable value of the medical services to be rendered, nor the amount to be awarded, nor the persons to whom the awards were made. Petitioner relies upon the case of Garratt-Callahan Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 171 Cal. 334, 153 P. 239. By comparing the award involved in that action with that in the present action, it will readily be observed that they differ in many essential features. In fact, they are entirely different. The award in the present proceeding as to medical treatment is a clear and direct command to the petitioner "to furnish to employee the medical, surgical and hospital treatment, including nursing, as may be reasonably required to cure and relieve him from the effects of said injury." There is nothing uncertain as to the meaning of this order. The petitioner in explicit language is directed to furnish the injured employee certain treatment which is aptly described in the order of award. There is no mistaking its terms. The petitioner will, we anticipate, find no difficulty in complying with the requirements of the award in so far as understanding just what said requirements consist of. Petitioner contends, however, that upon its refusal to furnish said treatment the department is powerless to make any further order in said matter, as more than 245 weeks have elapsed since the employee was injured. There is some doubt as to whether this question is properly before us at this time. Just what the department may do in case petitioner refuses to comply with said award must be determined in the future. In the Blankenhorn Case, upon the refusal of the insurance carrier to furnish the treatment provided for in the award, the commission, after the lapse of 245 weeks after the date of the injury to the employee, held a hearing and determined the amount that had been expended for the purpose of securing adequate treatment for the injured employee, and ordered said insurance carrier to pay the same. We denied a petition to annul said order. Notwithstanding the uncertainty as to whether the question of the effect of such an order, made more than 245 weeks after the date of the injury, is not involved in the present proceeding, the parties hereto have presented argument upon the same to all intents and purposes as if it were properly before us. This has been done no doubt for the reason that, if the department is without power to make any further order in this matter or to take any action in enforcing its award of July 10, 1928, then said award is a nullity and its direction to petitioner to furnish said treatment is but an idle gesture. We, therefore, think that it is but proper that we should give this question some consideration and answer it for the future guidance of the parties hereto.

[3] We have decided that the award in this case which provided for medical treatment for said injured employee beyond the 240 weeks' period is valid and is sanctioned by the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Section 20 (d) of said act provides: "That no award of compensation shall be rescinded, altered or amended after two hundred forty-five weeks from the date of the injury." "Compensation" as used in the Workmen's Compensation Act is a comprehensive term and includes not only liability payments provided for in section 9 (b) of said act, but also medical treatment provided for in section 9 (a), as well as death benefits provided for in section 9 (c). See sections 1 and 9. Would an order of the department (in case petitioner refuses to furnish medical treatment to the injured employee, and in case said treatment shall be furnished by a third person as was done in the Blankenhorn Case) directing that petitioner pay to said third person the amount expended for such treatment be either a rescission, an alteration, or amendment of the award of compensation, and, therefore, in violation of section 20 (d) of said act? We think not. Whatever future orders the department may be required to make in order to enforce said award will not in any way change or alter the terms thereof. The award itself will stand as made by the department. The orders, in case the department may hereafter find it necessary to promulgate any, will simply fix and determine the cost of the treatment furnished under said award to the injured employee from time to time, and for which the petitioner has refused to pay. On the other hand, if the award is complied with, no further action on the part of the department will be necessary, and no future orders will be required of it in order to enforce the award. We think this can be done without in any way violating the provisions of section 20 (d) of the act. That the department has the authority to take any and all necessary steps to make effective the award made by it, we think, was foreshowed by the enactment of section 63 (a) of said act, which reads as follows: "The commission is hereby vested with full power, authority and jurisdiction to do and perform any and all things, whether herein specifically designated, or in addition thereto, which are necessary or convenient in the exercise of any power, authority or jurisdiction conferred upon it under this act."

It would be idle to give the department authority to make an award for the medical treatment required to relieve an injured employee suffering from a permanent injury, which treatment would in many cases be required long after the expiration of the 245 weeks' period, without vesting in the department the power to enforce such award. If there were any doubt that this authority was possessed by the department from the general terms of the act authorizing it to make such an award, we think this doubt is entirely dispelled by the enactment of said section 63 (a) above quoted. Our conclusion is, therefore, that the department had the power and jurisdiction to make the award of July 10, 1928; that the department has the further authority and power to enforce said award by appropriate orders, to be made hereafter, as it may find necessary in order to provide the injured employee the relief to which he is entitled by virtue of the terms of said award; and that the granting of such necessary orders will not in any way alter, amend, or rescind, or otherwise affect said original award.

The writ is denied, and the award is affirmed.

HURST v. BIGELOW et al. (Civ. 6664.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 6, 1929.

Master and servant 🔑82(2)—Superintendent of grounds and caretaker at golf course suing for labor and services held not entitled to lien (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183, 1192).

In action for labor and services, defendant held not entitled to lien, where he acted as superintendent of grounds and caretaker of golf course and did practically no work of lienable character under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, especially where claim of lien was not filed in time and owner of property had no knowledge of alleged work performed so as to charge him with lien under section 1192.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by Frank Hurst against Guy J. K. Bigelow and others. From the judgment plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William S. Bayless, of San Francisco, for appellant.

G. W. Murphy, of Santa Rosa, Dudley D. Sales, of San Francisco, and Thomas P. Boyd, of San Rafael, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiff sued for $3,500 for labor and services for fourteen months at $250 per month and prayed that the claim be foreclosed as a mechanics' lien. He was given judgment against his employer for the amount but was denied the lien and now appeals from the judgment.

Defendant Bigelow was the owner of 238 acres of land and orchard in Sonoma county. He leased it to a group of associates acting for the Moon Golf and Country Club for five years. The lease carried an option to purchase. These lessees assigned to defendant Lichtenberg who gave defendant Partridge an option. The latter gave an option to Mr. Woodburn, president of defendant Peninsular Development Corporation. This company employed plaintiff at a salary of $250 per month to manage, supervise, and keep in a state of repair the 50 acres of the leased premises which had been used and which it was intended to again use as a nine-hole golf course. Plaintiff commenced his period of employment January 11, 1925. He continued in the said employment until and after March 11, 1926. What work he did during this period is not clearly enough described in the evidence to form the basis of a detailed account. He styled himself a hotel man by occupation, and in one part of his testimony stated that his work was that of a hotel man employed to superintend the placing of the golf grounds in condition. He seemed to have acted as a superintendent of grounds and caretaker.

The court made written findings of fact to the effect that his claim of lien was not filed in time; that the owner of the property, Bigelow, did not have knowledge of the alleged work performed so as to charge him with a lien under Code of Civil Procedure § 1192; and, further, that plaintiff did almost no work during that time of a lienable character. The court found "that aside from the work of said plaintiff in mowing or causing to be mowed the grass on said links or golf course, and repairing said pipes that run to said golf course, and spending one and one-half days' time in patching the tees on said golf course, said Frank Hurst did not perform any work or labor or services on said golf course or any part thereof."

We have examined the evidence and find this finding to be supported by substantial evidence. The plaintiff appeared to be unable upon his examination to give details of time spent upon such parts of his work as might be considered of a lienable character so that the date and reasonable value thereof might be ascertained. The witnesses adverse to him testified that he did practically no work of that character, and particularly that he did no work after July, 1925, when a court receiver was appointed. His notice of lien was filed March 19, 1926, which was much more than the statutory time after the last item of work was performed which could possibly be considered to be work upon any such structure for which liens are allowed by Code of Civil Procedure, § 1183. The reasonable value of no item of work was proven.

The points on appeal depend upon an attack upon the findings of the court, which we find to be supported by the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

er, held not to comply with rule 26, § 4, of Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, in that it does not clearly state all material evidence, and does not show what matters were included in application for rehearing.

Application by L. J. Seckels for writ of review to be directed to the Department of Industrial Relations to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Boone Kirk for injuries in proceedings by Kirk before the Commission against petitioner and his insurance carrier. Petition denied.

J. L. Kearney, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco (W. F. Beem, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent Commission.

CONREY, P. J. Petitioner, Seckels, was the employer of respondent Kirk, who sustained an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment. Kirk instituted a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission against Seckels and his insurance carrier. In that proceeding an award was made against the insurance carrier, and an additional award based upon serious and willful misconduct of the employer was made against said employer. Thereafter the employer applied to the commission for a rehearing, which was granted. After the taking of some additional evidence, the original award was affirmed.

Petitioner now asks for a writ of review, and in his petition claims that the commission, in rendering said decision and making said award, acted without and in excess of its jurisdiction; that there is no evidence that Kirk's injury was proximately caused by the serious and willful misconduct of his employer; that the commission in making said award acted without and in excess of its jurisdiction, in that the commission refused to hear the testimony of witnesses of the defendant employer, and of the defendant himself, who would have testified to material facts pertinent to the issues; and that said arbitrary refusal by the commission to hear said testimony constituted a denial of petitioner's right to due process of law in the proceeding against him.

"The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state relating to writs of review shall, so far as applicable and not in conflict with this act, apply to proceedings * * * under * * * this section." Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917, p. 876, sec. 67(d). The petition for a writ of review must be verified. Code Civ. Proc. § 1069. The answer of an officer of the state to a complaint or petition need not be verified. Code Civ. Proc. § 1109, and section 446. An application for a writ of review, in a proceeding for review of an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, should conform to the requirements of rule 26, § 4, of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal. It is there provided that "such application, if based upon a want of evidence sufficient to warrant the conclusion of the Commission, must fairly state all of the material evidence relative to the point as to which such want of evidence is claimed to exist." The answer of the commission "shall be limited to a brief statement of the grounds of the order or award, and to the supplying of any evidence omitted or misstated in the application." In making an application to the commission for a rehearing in respect to any matter covered by its order, the application shall set forth specifically "every issue to be considered by the Commission." The applicant is deemed to have finally waived "all objections, irregularities and illegalities concerning the matter upon which such rehearing is sought other than those set forth in the application for such rehearing." Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917, p. 873, § 64(c).

The petitioner in this case claims that there is no evidence that Kirk's injury "was proximately caused by the serious and wilful misconduct" of his employer. The petition does not "fairly state all of the material evidence" relative to this issue. This is the more manifest when we read the brief filed with the petition, which refers to several items of evidence (not mentioned in the petition) relating to the conditions under which the employee's work was being done. Counsel says that Kirk was not ordered or instructed to go out to the place of danger where the accident occurred. But the answer filed by the commission shows that there was evidence to the effect that the employer's superintendent saw the employee get outside of the wall from which he fell and made no protest and gave no orders, nor had the superintendent made any protest or given any order on several previous occasions when the same thing was done in his presence; that on the contrary, on this particular occasion, when the employee went outside the wall to hammer a cement form into place, the superintendent said: "Let's get it in"; also that there was no life-line or belt furnished; that the superintendent was familiar with the orders of the commission, one of which (order 1143) requires the use of life-lines and safety belts "whenever it becomes necessary for workmen to crawl out on thrust-outs and such other places where no other protection is afforded them."

The petition herein, in its statement of facts, is not sufficient to support the claim of petitioner that, on the rehearing before the commission, the commission arbitrarily refused to hear the testimony of witnesses on the part of the defendant "who would have testified as to material facts pertinent under the pleadings in this case." As the petition does not show what matters were included in his application for a rehearing before the commission, or what facts he sought to prove by said rejected witnesses at the time of rehearing, we have in the petition no foundation for even a prima facie assumption that the offered testimony was pertinent to any issues upon which, at such rehearing, it was the duty of the commission to receive evidence.

The petition for a writ of review is denied.

(Civ. 6479, 6480.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 25, 1929.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court June 24, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⚩32—Right of appeal to District Court of Appeals from judgment of superior court reversing judgment of municipal court held not affected by fact action was transferred from superior court of another county (Const. art. 6, §§ 4b, 5, as amended in 1928).

Right of defendant under Const. art. 6, §§ 4b and 5, as amended in 1928, to appeal to District Court of Appeals from judgment of superior court reversing judgment of municipal court, with directions to enter new judgment after action had been transferred from superior court of another county, is the same as the right to appeal from any other judgment of the municipal court, and fact that defendant would have right of appeal from judgment of superior court transferring action would not give him right of appeal from judgment rendered.

2. Constitutional law ⚩249—Courts ⚩160—Constitutional provision relating to appeal from municipal court does not deny equal protection (Const. Cal. art. 6, §§ 4b, 5, as amended in 1928; Const. U. S. Amend. 14).

Const. Cal. art. 6, §§ 4b and 5, as amended in 1928, relating to appeal from municipal court, is not violative of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, guaranteeing equal protection of the laws.

3. Constitutional law ⚩23—Constitutional amendment relating to remedy only held to govern right to appeal, though action was commenced prior to adoption of amendment (Const. art. 6, §§ 4b, 5, as amended in 1928).

Since Const. art. 6, §§ 4b and 5, as amended in 1928, governing appeals from municipal courts, relate to remedy only, it governs right to appeal from judgment of superior court reversing judgment of municipal court, with directions to enter new judgment, though action in question was commenced prior to adoption of constitutional amendment.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action on surety bond by G. L. Moye against the National Surety Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion granted, and appeal dismissed.

Joseph H. Call and Wm. G. Allen, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bailie, Turner & Lake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. On motion to dismiss appeal. There are two judgments of the superior court, and two appeals, in form; but, in substance, they are one judgment and one appeal, and will be so considered for the purposes of this decision.

The action upon which the proceeding before this court is predicated was upon a bond executed and delivered within the city of Los Angeles. Plaintiff originally filed a complaint in the county of Ventura. On motion presented by defendant to the superior court of that county, the place of trial was changed from Ventura county to the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, in which court a trial resulted in judgment for plaintiff. On appeal to the superior court of the county of Los Angeles from the judgment, and from an order made after judgment, the judgment and order of the municipal court were reversed, and the case was remanded to the municipal court with directions to enter a new judgment in favor of the defendant and against plaintiff. From the judgment in the superior court plaintiff has appealed to this court, and the present proceeding is a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that this court is without jurisdiction to entertain or act upon the appeal attempted to be taken.

[1] It is contended by the defendant that, under the provisions of sections 4b and 5 of article 6 of the Constitution as amended in 1928, this court has no jurisdiction of the appeal. In resisting the motion to dismiss the appeal, plaintiff urges that, inasmuch as the cause of action was "transitory," the superior court of Ventura county had jurisdiction thereof. The argument seems to be that, as he would have had a right of appeal to this court from a judgment of the superior court of Ventura county, if a judgment had been rendered against him in that court, he has a right of appeal to this court from the judgment when rendered against him by any other court to which the cause was transferred. We fail to see that any such conclusion follows. The action having been transferred to the municipal court, the right of appeal from its judgment was in no respect different from the right to appeal from any other judgment of that court.

[2] Plaintiff also maintains that section 4b of article 6 of the Constitution is violative of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees "to each person the equal protection of the laws." In principle, the case of Missouri v.

Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 25 L. Ed. 989, is decisive of the point against plaintiff's contention. See, also, Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68, 7 S. Ct. 350, 30 L. Ed. 578; Zikos v. Oregon R. & N. Co. (C. C.) 179 F. 893.

[3] Finally, plaintiff urges that, because at the time the action was commenced (which was prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendment to which reference has been had) he had a right of appeal to this court, such right could not be taken from him by subsequent legislative or constitutional enactment. However, aside from other considerations, it is clear that, so far as the instant matter is concerned, as the constitutional amendment in question related to a change in remedy only, the point advanced by appellant is not well taken. People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 65, 112 P. 866, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1148; Pacific Gas Radiator Co. v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. App. 200, 232 P. 995.

On authority of the provisions contained in sections 4b and 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, as well as the authorities to which reference has been had herein, it is ordered that the motion to dismiss the appeals be, and it is, granted, and the appeals are dismissed.

CAPTAIN CHARLES V. GRIDLEY CAMP, NO. 104, UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS, v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF BUTTE COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3823.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 29, 1929.

1. Injunction 🔑114(2)—Organization of veterans not showing illegal expenditure or proving status as taxpayer could not enjoin supervisors from permitting use of veterans' memorial building by outside organizations (Pol. Code, § 4041f, subds. b, d, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1; Code Civ. Proc. § 526a).

Organization of Spanish War veterans using veterans' memorial building erected under Pol. Code, § 4041f, subds. b, d, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1, held not entitled to injunction against supervisors to prohibit use of building or rooms therein by other organizations than those composed of veterans, where there was no showing of any illegal expenditure of money or waste or injury to property under Code Civ. Proc. § 526a, or that plaintiff had status of citizen or taxpayer, or that incidental use of building by other organizations interfered with use thereof by veterans' organizations.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑716—Building constructed for municipal purposes may be incidentally leased for hire when not presently needed.

Municipality cannot embark on construction of buildings for renting or commercial purposes, but building constructed for municipal purposes may be leased incidentally, or rooms therein may be leased for hire for limited time when building is not in use and when such leasing will not interfere with purposes for which building has been erected.

3. Army and navy 🔑54—Supervisors may incidentally lease for hire memorial building or rooms therein for use by other than veterans' organizations, where veterans' use thereof is not interfered with (Pol. Code, § 4041f, subds. b, d, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1).

Board of supervisors having authority over memorial building erected for use of veterans' associations under Pol. Code, § 4041f, subds. b, d, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1, held to have authority to permit temporary use of building or rooms therein by organizations of persons other than veterans where charge is exacted to assist in upkeep of building, and building is not at the time necessary for use of veterans' organizations.

4. Army and navy 🔑54—Veterans' organization could use meeting room and incidentally use other portions of memorial building gratuitously under statute authorizing supervisors to purchase "supplies" (Pol. Code, § 4041f, subds. b, d, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1).

Veterans' organization held entitled to use memorial building erected for patriotic purposes under Pol. Code, § 4041f, subds. b, d, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1, without paying compensation in so far as use of meeting room and incidental use of other portions of building in line with purposes of organization are concerned, since subdivision b authorizes the supervisors to provide necessary supplies, and word "supplies" carries with it the idea of those things necessary for the enjoyment and occupation of the premises, and included heat and light (citing Words and Phrases, Third Series, "Supply").

5. Statutes 🔑227—Language of statute, permissive in form, will be treated as mandatory if it becomes necessary that power given for benefit of third persons should be exercised.

Where purpose of law is to clothe public officers with power to be exercised for benefit of the public or third parties and public interest or private right requires that the thing authorized should be done, language of statute, though permissive in form, will be construed as mandatory.

6. Army and navy 🔑54—Statute empowering supervisors to provide proper maintenance for memorial building, erected for veterans, is mandatory, where building has been constructed (Pol. Code, § 4041f, subd. b, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1).

Pol. Code, § 4041f, subd. b, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1, giving board of supervisors of memorial building, erected for use of veterans, power to make repairs and provide necessary custodians, attendants, and supplies for proper maintenance thereof, held mandatory and not merely permissive, where board had exercised its election and constructed building, since both public interests and private rights were involved.

7. Mandamus ⚷113—Court will not order supervisors to levy tax to maintain memorial building where necessity for tax levy does not appear (Pol. Code, § 4041f, subds. b, d, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1).

Court in mandamus suit by veterans' organization could not require board of supervisors of memorial building, erected under Pol. Code, § 4041f, subds. b, d, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1, to make tax levy for maintenance of building where it did not appear that there was any occasion for doing so; such order being dependent upon proof of facts making a tax levy necessary, though subdivision b, requiring supervisors to maintain building, is mandatory.

8. Army and navy ⚷54—Supervisors may adopt such reasonable rules for occupation of memorial building as will give all veterans' organizations equal facilities (Pol. Code, § 4041f, subds. b, d, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1).

Board of supervisors by ratifying act of committee appointed to look after memorial building, erected for veterans' organizations under Pol. Code, § 4041f, subds. b, d, as amended by St. 1927, p. 207, § 1, may adopt such reasonable rules and regulations for its occupation as will provide equal facilities and opportunities to all organizations entitled to use the building.

Original application by the Captain Charles V. Gridley Camp, No. 104, United Spanish War Veterans, for writ of mandamus to be directed to the Board of Supervisors of Butte County and others. Writ granted, with limitations.

King & King, of Gridley, for petitioners.

Seth Millington, of Gridley, and Bond & Dierup, of Chico, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us upon an original application for a writ of mandate by the above-named petitioners praying for an order of this court, directed to the respondents, commanding them to admit the petitioners to the use and occupation of a certain memorial building situate at Gridley, in the county of Butte.

The record before us shows that the county of Butte has erected four memorial buildings for the use of patriotic associations, one of said buildings being located in each of the following cities: Oroville, Chico, Paradise, and Gridley. The record further shows that prior to the erection of any of said buildings the board of supervisors of Butte county was petitioned to do so by the representatives of the various organizations of veterans of said county; that said organizations represented to the board of supervisors that if said memorial buildings were constructed at the expense of the county, that they would be so conducted and managed that there would be no charge against said county or the taxpayers thereof for the maintenance and care of the same; that each of said buildings would be self-sustaining and the county would not be looked to for any financial assistance on account thereof; that for some time after the erection of the memorial building at Gridley it was occupied and used only by South Butte Post No. 210, American Legion. The association or organization known as Captain Charles V. Gridley Camp No. 104, United Spanish War Veterans, was organized after the erection of the building just referred to. The memorial building at Gridley was completed in the year 1927 and dedicated on the 3d day of May of that year. The record shows that after the erection and dedication of said building the board of supervisors appointed a committee of ex-service men and a supervisor to manage and control the respective buildings, one member of the board of supervisors from the district in which one of the memorial buildings was situate being a member of that committee, for the purpose of controlling and looking after the building situate in the district represented on the board of supervisors. After its appointment the committee took charge of the respective buildings referred to, and during the year 1928 adopted the schedule of charges for the use and occupation of different rooms in the memorial buildings, based upon the expense of lighting, heating, and janitor service, so calculated and adjusted that each organization or society using any particular room in any particular building would pay a sufficient sum to cover the actual expense attendant upon such use. Thus, for the main auditorium for afternoon meetings the schedule called for a payment of $15; for evening meetings, up to midnight, $15; after midnight, an additional $5 per hour. This schedule was for the portion of the year beginning with April 1 and ending with September 30, and for the period of time between October 1 and March 31 the charge for the main auditorium was $25 both for afternoon and evening meetings. For clubrooms, afternoon meetings, $7.50; evening meetings, $10; banquet room and kitchen, $7.50; for meetings of veteran societies and their auxiliaries where the hall used by such associations was regularly used for evening meetings, $2.50; after midnight, an additional charge of $1.50. The building at Gridley, according to the record and stipulation of counsel, consisted of a main auditorium capable of accommodating 1,200 people; two rooms called clubrooms, for want of a better designation, capable of accommodating about 100 persons each, a banquet room, and kitchen. These rooms were used for the regular meetings of the different organizations, the main auditorium being used only for special purposes, such as public installations, public funerals, dances, and public entertainments; the banquet room and kitchen being used when banquets were being given.

Under the management of the committee to which we have referred, different rooms in the building, including the main auditorium, have been rented to other societies than those composed of veterans, for entertainments and kindred purposes. For this use compensation has been made based upon a schedule of charges calculated to make the building self-sustaining.

After the organization of the petitioners herein, one of the rooms heretofore called a clubroom, but in fact a meeting room for organizations such as the petitioners, was used by them as a meeting place. The petitioners' organization consisting of about 30 members, continued to occupy and use one of the meeting rooms from the date of its organization until on or about the month of October, 1928. During that time it appears that the petitioners held a public function, entertainment, and dance in the main auditorium, using the same from about 1 o'clock one afternoon until 2 o'clock the following night, or, rather, the following morning, and in so doing consumed, in heating and lighting of main auditorium, electric current to the value of $47.50, and also otherwise used electric current aggregating in all the value of $160. The petitioners declining to pay said electric bill, or any portion thereof, were requested to give up their key to the building, and have so done. This action seeks a judgment restoring the petitioners to the use of said building, and declaring their right to use and occupy the same without payment of any charge therefor. The contention of respondents is that the act under which the building was constructed permits a reasonable charge for the use and occupation thereof. The petitioners also pray for an injunction from this court restraining and prohibiting the use of said building, or any room thereof, by any organization other than that composed of veterans, insisting that the expense of maintaining said building, including lighting, heating, and janitor service, should be defrayed by the county of Butte out of funds raised by taxation. The respondents, on the other hand, contend that when any room in said building is not in use or occupation by any of the veteran organizations, it is permissible to rent the same to defray the expenses of lighting, heating, and janitor service. In other words, to make the building self-sustaining; and that in so doing, the building is not being commercialized. In this particular our attention is called to the practice which prevails in many cities of the state where memorial buildings have been erected, to lease the main auditorium and other rooms therein at such time, and for such purposes as do not in any wise interfere with the full and comfortable enjoyment and occupancy of the different rooms of veterans' organizations; the contention being that when the main auditorium or any particular room would otherwise remain vacant, it is for the benefit of the veterans' organizations that some revenue be derived from the building rather than to permit the same to remain unused and a charge either upon the organizations composed of veterans or of the counties of which such veteran organizations are residents and taxpayers.

[1] We do not need to further follow the allegations of the petition or to the answer thereto, further than to state that the petition concludes with the prayer that the petitioners be let in to said building; that they be permitted to use the same without making any compensation therefor; and that the board of supervisors be prohibited from permitting said building to be used by any person or organization other than organizations composed of veterans, save and except as to what is called auxiliary associations. To the petition the respondents filed a demurrer as well as an answer, the demurrer being to the effect that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In so far as injunctive relief is asked for in the petition, we find no statement of facts which would justify the issuance of any prohibitory order herein. There are no facts set forth in the petition complying with section 526a of the Code of Civil Procedure; there are no facts stated which show any illegal expenditure of money, which indicate any waste or injury to the estate or property of the county. In order that injunctive relief may be had, in addition to showing what we have here mentioned, section 526a, Code of Civil Procedure, limits the right of action to persons possessing the qualifications stated in the section, such as being citizens and taxpayers. The circumstances, so far as the record before us shows, are very similar to the case of Amusement Syndicate Co. v. City of Topeka, 68 Kan. 801, 74 P. 606, where the Supreme Court of Kansas said: "A private citizen cannot maintain an action to enjoin city officers from allowing use of the city auditorium for entertainments for private profit, even if it is wrongful; there being no damage peculiar to him." That was an action for injunction to restrain the leasing of an auditorium, and it was held that a private citizen not suffering any special damages peculiar to himself was not entitled to maintain the action, and that such action could only be maintained by relation of the Attorney General.

The buildings to which we have referred were erected in pursuance of the authority given by section 4041f of the Political Code, which reads: "Any County may provide and maintain (1) a home or homes for veteran soldiers, sailors and marines who have served the United States honorably in any of its wars; (2) buildings, memorial halls, or meeting places for the use of patriotic, fraternal and benevolent associations of such persons. For these purposes the Board of Supervisors of any county shall have jurisdiction and power." Then follow seven subdivisions of this section, as amended by the Legislature in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 207). Subdivision (b) relative to the power of the board of supervisors, reads: "To purchase, construct or lease, build or rebuild, furnish or refurnish, or repair any and all such buildings, and to provide all necessary custodians, employees, attendants and supplies for the proper maintenance of the same." And subdivision (d) empowers the board to levy a tax not exceeding three mills on the dollar, on all taxable property in the county, for the purposes of the act. There is nothing in any of the subdivisions of the section referred to which in terms excludes the power of the board of supervisors to permit the use of any such building or any room therein, for other purposes or other associations than that of veterans, when the same does not interfere with the comfortable, ordinary, and accustomed use of such buildings and the different rooms thereof by organizations composed only of veterans.

In behalf of the petitioners it is argued that the case of Allied Architects' Association of Los Angeles v. Payne, 192 Cal. 431, 221 P. 209, 30 A. L. R. 1029, holds and adjudges that the board of supervisors, or the committee or custodian placed in charge of such building, possesses no authority to permit the use thereof by any other than a veteran association. While there is language in the opinion in that case which is open to the construction that the author of the opinion entertained the idea that such buildings should properly be limited to the exclusive use of such organizations, and the case does hold that the board of supervisors may erect a building under the act which is devoted exclusively to the use of such organizations, yet the case does not go to the extent contended for by the petitioners. It is to be observed also that the case primarily was based upon a resolution of the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles, which specified that the building to be erected should be exclusively used as a meeting place for patriotic, fraternal and benevolent associations "whose membership shall be composed only of veterans," etc.

[2, 3] While we are of the opinion that under the section of the Political Code authorizing the construction of memorial buildings, boards of supervisors possess the authority and power to limit the use thereof and of every room therein, exclusively to veterans, it does not follow that the language should be so narrowly construed as to prevent the incidental use thereof or the incidental use of the rooms therein, such as the main auditorium, in such a manner as not to interfere with the main purposes for which the building has been erected, and at times when such rooms would otherwise be vacant. While the section of the Code authorizes the construction of such buildings, in the nature of things and in the ordinary course of events associations of veterans of wars that are past will cease to be. This is peculiarly applicable to cities no larger than the town of Gridley, and it would be carrying the idea further than we think the language of the act requires to hold that when the veteran associations referred to have ceased to be, the building must remain vacant or stand as an empty monument. The complaint in this case is directed particularly to the use permitted of the auditorium, but from the facts before us it is apparent that the auditorium having a seating capacity of 1,200 is designed for use only on special occasions, and under such circumstances we see no reason why the board of supervisors or the committee placed by it in control of the building, should not allow the incidental use of the auditorium for purposes not inconsistent with the objects for which the building was erected, or which do not obstruct or interfere with the use of the building by the different veteran organizations, either free of charge or for a stated compensation, and thus aid in defraying the expenses of maintaining the building. While the law appears to be well settled that a municipality cannot embark in the construction of buildings for renting or commercial purposes, there is very high authority that a building constructed for municipal purposes may be incidentally leased, or rooms therein leased for hire, when not in use, and when so doing does not interfere with the purposes for which the building has been erected. In 44 C. J. 1092, we find the law prevailing in a large number of jurisdictions stated as follows: "A municipality may either gratuitously or for compensation permit buildings erected for a municipal purpose to be used incidentally for lawful private purposes, which will not interfere with public use, such as the use of a city hall or other municipal building for lectures, entertainments, etc. While a municipality is without power to erect a building for the mere purpose of renting it out, yet after it has lawfully constructed or leased a building for municipal purposes, it has power to let, sublet, or rent for hire, the building, or a portion thereof, for a limited period of time, and for a lawful use, where the building, or portion thereof, is not presently needed for municipal purposes." This text is supported by a large number of authorities. Practically the same language is found in 19 Ruling Case Law, p. 771, § 77, where it is said, after stating that a municipality is without authority to engage in erecting buildings for the purposes of renting: "It seems, however, to be generally conceded that a municipality having erected a building in good faith, for municipal or public purposes, has the right, when such building is no longer used by the municipality, or when parts of it are not needed for public use, or when at intervals the whole building is not so used, and when it will not interfere with its public use, to permit it to be used either gratuitously or for a compensation, for private purposes. Such a temporary, casual and incidental use of unused public property, for the purpose of public economy, does not amount to an unconstitutional invasion of the rights of citizens," etc. In 16 Ann. Cas. page 1098, the same statement of the law occurs, supported by a large number of cases. In one of the cases (French v. Inhabitants of Quincy, 3 Allen [Mass.] 9) this language appears: "The court is of opinion that a town, having in its town-house rooms which it had authority to construct, as part of such building, and not having occasion to use them for the time-being, is not obliged to keep them unoccupied, but may derive a revenue from them by renting them, or may allow them to be used gratuitously."

The record shows no attempt whatever to commercialize the memorial building at Gridley, as that word is ordinarily understood. It shows, rather, an attempt to make the building self-sustaining, as appears to have been promised by the veteran organizations existing at the time the building was erected. It may be here stated that the record fails to show that the incidental use of the auditorium, as herein referred to, has at any time interfered with the accustomed, usual, and ordinary enjoyment of the building, by any organization of veterans. The fact that the board of supervisors has appointed a committee to look after the respective buildings does not appear to us to raise any valid legal objections. In the very nature of things there must be some one to look after such buildings. The committee appointed is but the agent of the board of supervisors, and as to each of the four buildings it appears that the board of supervisors of the district wherein the building is situate, is a member of the committee, and whatever is done by the committee is subject to the control, direction, and approval of the board of supervisors. Likewise, where there are several different organizations occupying the building, or different rooms therein, reasonable rules and regulations must be adopted in order that the occupation of the building by one organization will not interfere with the reasonable use of the building, or rooms assigned to it by other organizations. Nor do we see any legitimate objection if any one of the organizations using, say, a meeting room in the building, proposes to use the main auditorium for a public function which is in line with a public entertainment rather than within the limits of what is ordinarily termed a patriotic assemblage, to the exaction of compensation sufficient to cover the expenses attendant upon the use of the auditorium on such occasions. For illustration: If any one of the veteran organizations proposes to give a dance, it cannot be argued that the county would be under the obligation of hiring an orchestra; nor if any one of the organizations proposes to hold a boxing contest, to hire a referee. And if this is true, we do not see how it can be argued that the county would be under obligation to pay for light and heat on such occasions, irrespective of our views which are hereinafter expressed as to the right of petitioners to occupy the meeting room originally assigned to its use.

Upon the hearing of this cause it was conceded by counsel that the almost universal practice in the state is to permit the use of auditoriums by other than veteran organizations, and to exact a charge therefor to aid in the upkeep of the buildings.

[4] Have the petitioners, as claimed by them, a right to the use of the memorial building, or any portion thereof, without paying compensation therefor? The answer to this question depends upon the intent and purpose of the Legislature in adopting section 4041f of the Political Code. To what extent such occupation may go depends upon the reasonable necessities of the organization. If it be admitted that the petitioners have a right to the use and enjoyment of a meeting room in said memorial building, that concession can only go to the reasonable requirements of the organization. With a membership of only 30, we cannot avoid the conclusion that an assignment to it of a meeting room, of a sufficient capacity to accommodate at least 100 persons, is all that the section requires, together with such incidental use of the remainder of the building as functions in line with the patriotic purposes of the organization may require. With this in view we will examine the section. The second clause of the first paragraph empowers the board of supervisors to erect and build memorial halls or meeting places for the use of patriotic, fraternal, and benevolent associations of such persons. It was under this provision that the memorial building under consideration was erected. Subdivision (b) of the section carries out and further defines the power of the board of supervisors, to wit: "To purchase, construct or lease, build or rebuild, furnish or refurnish, or repair any and all such buildings, and to provide all necessary custodians, employees, attendants and supplies for the proper maintenance of the same." It is upon this subdivision that the petitioners base their contention that the Legislature intended the use of rooms in memorial buildings should be gratuitous. This subdivision provides for custodians, employees, attendants, and supplies. The word "supplies" has a different meaning from the word "materials." 7 Words and Phrases, Third Series, p. 309. If the clause had read, "and materials for the proper maintenance of the same," it is clear that the Legislature would have intended only the furnishing by the board of supervisors of such articles or substances as would enter into the construction of the building itself, in taking the place of those portions of the building which needed attention, reconstruction, or repairing; that the word "supplies" carries with it the idea of those things necessary for the enjoyment and occupation of the premises; it does not include furnishings as used in the subdivision because that word is used separately. Thus, it may be reasonably inferred that the intent of the Legislature was that light and heat, for the reasonable use and occupation, should go with the building. "Custodians, employees, and attendants" is just as comprehensive as the words "janitor services." Again, a reading of the whole section leads to the conclusion that the Legislature had in mind a double purpose—to subserve the public interests of the country by providing for the erection of structures where the thought of patriotism might be given wider currency, and at the same time enable organizations of persons who had engaged in hazardous service for their country to meet and aid in keeping alive the principles upon which the republican form of government must rest. Had it not been intended that the reasonable use of meeting rooms and other incidental uses of other portions of such buildings was intended to be gratuitous, there would have been no reason for providing that such buildings should be erected for the uses of organizations of veterans or of those who had shown themselves willing to make the extreme sacrifice for the maintenance of the government. If it had been intended only to provide a meeting place, and rent the same to any such organization, there would have been no occasion for the use of the language which we have stated. There would really have been no occasion for the erection of such buildings under the provisions of the Code contained in section 4041f, supra. If that was the purpose and intent of the Legislature, it added nothing to the uses and purposes of the organizations because they could otherwise have hired their own halls.

[5-7] Again, it is argued by the respondents that all the provisions of the law are permissive, that is, that the board of supervisors may erect a building, and after the erection thereof, they may provide for its maintenance, etc., or may elect not to do so. While the section of the Code appears to be permissive in form, yet when the board of supervisors has exercised its election and constructed a building, the carrying out of the purposes expressed in the section necessitates a different construction and changes the permissive form to a mandatory reading in order that the purposes of the act may not be frustrated. This court, in the case of County of Los Angeles v. State, 64 Cal. App. 290, 222 P. 153, had occasion to examine quite extensively the use of the word "may" in a statute or Constitution as interpreted by the cases having to do therewith, and there quoted with approval the following language: "The word 'may' as used in the statute or constitution is often interpreted to mean 'shall' or 'must.' Such interpretation always depends largely, if not altogether, on the object sought to be accomplished by the law in which that word is used. It seems to be the uniform rule that, where the purpose of the law is to clothe public officers with power to be exercised for the benefit of third persons, or for the public at large—that is, where the public interest or private right requires that the thing should be done—then the language, though permissive in form, is peremptory." In some of the cases there cited the permission given to public officers to levy a tax, in language permissive in form, was held to be mandatory. In the case at bar both public interest and private rights are involved, and the permissive form of the statute, in order to accomplish the purposes undertaken, must be held mandatory if the necessity therefor is shown to exist. This would include the levy of a tax as provided in one of the subdivisions of the section, to carry out the purposes for which the building has been erected. A judgment to that effect, however, must depend upon the necessities of the situation. If no facts or conditions are presented which necessitate a peremptory order directing the levy of a tax, then such order cannot properly be issued. If the maintenance of the building, if the accomplishment of the purposes for which it was erected are otherwise obtainable by legitimate means, the necessity for the levying of a tax does not appear. In other words, the board of supervisors cannot be required to levy a tax even though the section be held mandatory, when there is no occasion for the board of supervisors so doing. There is no showing in the record before us of any facts upon which such an order could properly be based. The facts rather lead to the conclusion that if the building is managed and controlled as we have indicated herein we think it may properly be, the general public may not be called upon, through taxation, to furnish the means of maintaining the building, and permitting to the petitioners gratuitous use of all portions thereof reasonably meeting their requirements. The petition asks for relief for an auxiliary association, but no facts are set forth in the petition showing that its membership is composed only of veterans, and therefore it does not come within the purview of the rights to which the petitioners are entitled.

[8] Our conclusion is that the petitioners are entitled to the gratuitous use of the meeting room to which they were originally assigned, and such incidental uses, gratuitously, to other portions of the building as may be in line with the patriotic purposes of the petitioners' organization, and that the board of supervisors, by ratifying the act of the committee appointed to look after the building, may adopt such reasonable rules and regulations for the occupation of the memorial hall as will secure to all of the organizations entitled to use the same, equal facilities and opportunities.

Let a writ issue as prayed for by the petitioners, limited in extent, as herein stated, placing petitioners in occupancy and possession without payment of the charge insisted upon by the respondents.

98 Cal. App. 706

SCHREYER v. FOSTER et al. (Civ. 5222.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 9, 1929.

1. Sales 🔑398—Court's findings held to support conclusion that buyer should recover sum paid.

Court's findings that terms of sale of automobile agency were never fully settled, that it was never determined just what portions of property should be included in inventory, nor when or how price should be paid, and that parties never reached agreement as to just when and how property should be transferred or paid for or conditions under which transfer should be made, supported conclusion of law that buyer should recover back sum paid in anticipation of reaching definite agreement.

2. Sales 🔑52(5)—Evidence held to sustain findings that terms of sale were never fully settled, nor property included and time and manner of paying price determined.

In action to recover sum paid by one negotiating for purchase of automobile agency, evidence held to sustain court's findings that terms and conditions of sale were never fully settled, nor portions of property included in inventory and time or manner of paying price determined.

3. Sales 🔑391(1)—One negotiating for purchase of automobile agency held entitled to recover sums paid on automobile company's refusal to accept him and associates as agents.

One negotiating for purchase of automobile agency, subject to approval of automobile company, held entitled to recover amounts paid on refusal of such company's assistant sales manager, under whose authority agreement contemplated that plaintiff and his associates should become company's agents, to accept them as sellers' successors because of insufficient capital.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Curtis T. Schreyer against C. R. Foster and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hewitt, Ford & Crump, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Robert E. Austin and John N. Helmick, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J. [1, 2] The defendants appeal from a judgment rendered against them and in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $1,500. The testimony of the respondent's witnesses establish the following situation: The appellants owned and operated an agency for Chevrolet automobiles at Watts and Compton. During the month of December, 1923, the respondent and Clyde H. Kettering opened negotiations with the appellants concerning the purchase by respondent and Kettering of this business. In reply to respondent's inquiry during the first conversation concerning the price, the appellant C. R. Foster stated that they wanted $8,000 for the good will and business plus the inventory value of the stock of accessories and automobiles, to which the respondent replied that he did not have a great deal of cash on hand, but that he did have a piece of property for sale, and that if he could dispose of the property he would consider the purchase of the agency. During all of the subsequent negotiations the making of final arrangements was stated to be conditional upon a sale of this property by respondent. It also appears that no definite agreement was ever arrived at. At one time the appellants offered to turn over the business to the respondent upon a cash payment of $8,000 and agreed to make arrangements by which the remainder could be paid later, and finally they agreed to accept a cash payment of from $5,000 to $6,000. These negotiations continued from some time in December through January, February, and into March. During this time the appellants induced the respondent to pay three different sums of money as follows: January 11, 1924, $200; January 19, 1924, $1,000; and January 30, 1924, $300. The receipt for the first payment recited that it was a deposit "to be returned if deal is not accepted by the Chevrolet Motor Company of California." The receipt for the second payment contained a similar statement, but the third receipt was silent with respect thereto. On two or three occasions the respondent or Mr. Kettering asked the appellant C. R. Foster if the deal would be accepted by the Chevrolet Motor Company if only a part of the purchase price were paid in cash, to which the latter responded that he did not think it was necessary to let the company know everything that was done. Finally, on March 28, 1924, Mr. Kettering wrote a letter to a Mr. Ray Wilson, assistant sales manager of the Chevrolet Company, who had the authority to pass upon such matters, and asked if the latter would consider their taking over the agency with an investment of from $5,000 to $8,000, allowing Foster to carry the remainder. Mr.

Wilson replied to this question by saying that much more capital would be required and regretting the inability of respondent and Kettering "to go ahead with the proposition." Some time during the month of February, according to the testimony of appellant C. R. Foster, the respondent and Kettering told him that he could let the Compton agency go and they would take the Watts place, but they never discussed the "price of the Watts agency separate from the Compton agency." After Mr. Wilson's failure to approve the proposed deal, the respondent brought this action to recover the sums paid to appellants.

The appellants contend that the respondent was only entitled to recover in the event the Chevrolet Motor Company refused to approve a transfer to respondent, which refusal it was incumbent upon the respondent to prove. Further they assert that respondent failed to prove a refusal on the part of the Chevrolet Company; that the findings which indicate that the court so found are without support in the evidence; and, lastly, that inasmuch as the receipt for the sum of $300 did not contain the clause that this sum was to be returned in the event the "deal is not accepted by the Chevrolet Motor Company," the finding of the court to the effect that appellants promised to return the entire sum of $1,500 if the deal were not approved is also without support.

We think the whole argument of appellants is builded upon a false foundation. In one finding of the court it is said, "The full terms and conditions of the sale were never fully settled," and in another: "That it was never determined just what portions of the property should be included in said inventory and it was never determined when or in what manner the price for said business should be paid. * * * The parties hereto never at any time reached any agreement as to just when or how the property which they were negotiating should be transferred or paid for, or the conditions under which said transfer should be made." Obviously, these portions of the findings support the conclusion of law drawn by the court that the respondent should recover back the sum he had paid in anticipation of reaching a definite agreement, and equally apparent it is that the facts which we have recited sustain the quoted findings.

[3] Furthermore, the approval of the Chevrolet Motor Company was essential to the completion of a contract of transfer, even if we disregard the writing. The agreement contemplated that respondent and his associates should become the agents of the company under, according to the testimony, the authority of the assistant sales manager, Mr. Wilson. When this gentleman failed to accept respondent and Kettering as the successors of appellants, upon the proposal to pay down only from $5,000 to $8,000, respondent brought himself both within the letter of the written promise and the spirit and intent of all the negotiations.

Judgment affirmed.

ROBSON et al. v. HAHN et al. (Civ. 5185.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 6, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 4, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 3, 1929.

1. Brokers ⚷67(1)—Brokers securing second listing of realty for smaller net price, without informing principals of purchasers' agreement to pay commission, committed fraud depriving them of right to compensation.

Brokers employed in confidential, advisory capacity by persons relying on them for advice and assistance committed a fraud, depriving them of right to compensation for services, by securing second listing of realty for smaller net price, without informing principals of purchasers' agreement to pay commission.

2. Brokers ⚷75—Complaint alleging that brokers charged both vendors and purchasers commission sufficiently alleged fraud to warrant oral evidence thereof.

Complaint alleging that defendant brokers charged and received commissions from purchasers as well as plaintiffs, who employed them to sell realty, sufficiently alleged fraudulent conduct to warrant admission of oral evidence thereof, though other fraudulent acts not alleged were resorted to for purpose of securing written contract to allow defendants amount received in excess of net selling price to plaintiffs as commission.

3. Brokers ⚷67(1)—Listing of property to sell for net price and retain excess held to constitute agreement to pay commission.

Listing of property with brokers to sell at net price to owners and retain any sum received in excess thereof as commission held to constitute an agreement to pay commission.

collected commissions from both. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and defendants appeal therefrom.

On August 8, 1922, the respondents employed the appellants to sell for them a piece of real property, which for the sake of convenience we may hereafter refer to as lot 8, for the sum of $21,000, agreeing to pay appellants 5 per cent. of the selling price as their commission. On August 12, 1922, at about 8 o'clock in the evening the appellants Hahn and Sheehan called at the home of Frank and Mary Caldwell for the purpose of inducing the Caldwells to buy the property. The appellants took Mrs. Caldwell to the property during the evening, and although she did not inspect the inside of the place she informed them she liked it and would take it, but that she would not sign up in the absence of her husband, Frank Caldwell. About noon of the day following the appellants called on the respondents and informed them that lot 8 could not be sold for $21,000 and induced respondents to sign another and different listing in which respondents agreed to sell for $19,000 net to them and allow the appellants as their commission any sum received in excess of the net selling price. A couple of hours later in this same day appellants again called on Mr. and Mrs. Caldwell, and informed them as they had Mrs. Caldwell on the evening previous that they had the property for sale at a net selling price to the sellers of $20,000 and the Caldwells would be required to pay to appellants for representing them as purchasers an additional $1,000 as commission. The Caldwells accepted the offer thus made and agreed to buy the property for the total sum of $21,000. The sale was handled in an escrow, and neither the sellers, the respondents, nor Mr. and Mrs. Caldwell, the purchasers, knew of the payment of a commission by the other until after the escrow was completed, and the escrow statement forwarded, although, as already indicated, the respondents knew that appellants were to receive as commission all sums in excess of the net selling value of $19,000. Mrs. Caldwell owned a piece of property on Crocker street which she required the appellants to sell for the sum of $23,000, and for which sale she only paid to them as commission $333.35. This property had to be sold in order that the Caldwells might have the funds with which to purchase lot 8. The escrow instructions signed by respondent John Robson did not disclose the purchase price of $21,000.

[1, 2] It is apparent from the facts which we have recited that proof was made of the representations found to have been stated to the respondents and to the Caldwells by oral testimony. Objection was lodged to all such testimony by the appellants on the ground that it was incompetent and outside the issues for the reason that the complaint did not charge that appellants had fraudulently or by mistake, trick, or device, secured the respondents to sign the second listing. The same objection was raised by demurrer. The objections to the oral testimony, like the demurrer to the complaint, were overruled. It may be fairly said that the entire appeal rests upon a settlement of this one problem.

There would seem at first blush to be much merit in this contention of the appellants, but a close analysis of the situation compels us to a different conclusion. The appellants were employed in a supposed confidential, advisory capacity for the respondents, who relied upon them for their advice and assistance. The betrayal of that confidence constitutes a fraud. Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 P. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189; Hageman v. Colombet, 52 Cal. App. 350, 198 P. 842. Or, as is said in Rauer's Law, etc., Co. v. Bradbury, 3 Cal. App. 256, 84 P. 1007: "Whenever he [the agent] has an interest in making the sale which is antagonistic to that of his principal, he is unable to discharge his full duty to the latter and by continuing to act as his agent, without disclosing to him the fact of such interest, he commits a fraud upon him which will deprive him of all right to compensation for his services" (citing a list of authorities). The case from which we have just quoted was in many respects similar to the instant cause. The agent there required the purchasers to pay a commission, which fact he concealed from the seller. When, therefore, the complaint in the present case alleged that the appellants had charged and received commissions from the purchasers as well as the sellers who employed them, it did in fact allege that they were guilty of a fraudulent act, and the door was thrown open to determine whether they had in fact been endeavoring to serve two masters. One of the earliest authoritative pronouncements, and one which illustrates the fraudulent nature of the act alleged, is found in the gospel of Matthew (chap. 6, v. 24), as follows: "No man can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one and love the other; or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon." The act alleged is said to be "against sound public policy and good morals." Glenn v. Rice, 174 Cal. 269, 162 P. 1020. This case also says: "His contract for compensation being thus tainted, the law will not permit him to enforce it against either party. It is no answer to this objection to say that he did, in the particular case, act fairly and honorably to both. The infirmity of his contract does not arise from his actual conduct in the given case, but from the policy of the law, which will not allow a man to gain anything from a relation so conducive to bad faith and double dealing." The irresistible conclusion, therefore, is that the allegation of double dealing is an allegation of fraudulent conduct sufficient to warrant the court in rending the veil of legality with which the transaction was cloaked by the admission of oral testimony, for the purpose of discovering the true conduct of the parties. Or as is said in Hageman v. Colombet, supra: "In case of fraud no mere form of words of which the parties have made use can shut out inquiry as to the real facts." And this is true regardless of the fact that other fraudulent acts, not alleged, may have been made use of for the purpose of securing a written contract presenting the surface of lawfulness.

[3] It is suggested that the second listing of the property by the respondents does not constitute an agreement to pay commission, but we find the authorities to have settled the question to the contrary. Sill v. Ceschi, 167 Cal. 698, 140 P. 949; 9 C. J. 581.

SCHUSTER v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.★ (Civ. 6083.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 2, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 31, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 1, 1929.

1. Courts 🔑514—Courts should not interfere because of dissatisfaction of litigants with decree of court of another state.

Dissatisfaction on part of litigants with orders of court of one jurisdiction should not prompt courts of sister state to attempt to interfere.

2. Courts 🔑514—Jurisdiction to control administration of trusts is limited to court which appoints trustee.

Trustee appointed by foreign court is amenable only to that court, and the fact that his residence is in another jurisdiction will not confer authority on courts of that jurisdiction to control administration of the trust or require accountability for trust property.

3. Courts 🔑514—Continuing jurisdiction of court administering estate to settle trust accounts is not altered, where trustees are appointed by will.

Fact that trustee is appointed by will and not by court does not deprive court administering estate of continuing jurisdiction to settle accounts under the trusts, to supervise management thereof, and oversee distribution of income and principal to beneficiaries.

4. Abatement and revival 🔑13—Where testator died in Arizona, will appointing trustee was probated there, and suit by beneficiaries was pending there to require accounting and removal of trustee, court could not assume jurisdiction of similar suit in California.

Where testator resided in state of Arizona, and his will appointing trustee was admitted to probate in that state, and trust estate was ordered to be distributed to trustees there, and beneficiaries had filed petition in Arizona court for accounting and to have one of trustees removed, California court, pending appeal in the suit commenced in Arizona, could not properly assume jurisdiction of similar suit brought by beneficiaries to compel accounting and for removal of trustee.

5. Prohibition 🔑26—Prohibition to restrain contempt proceeding in pending action could be granted on facts shown only by affirmative defense in that action, where facts were admitted.

In proceedings for prohibition to restrain trial court in contempt proceedings on ground of excess of jurisdiction, writ could issue based on facts set up by way of affirmative defense in the proceedings below, where such facts were admitted to be true and were substantiated by record, though they were not shown by the complaint.

6. Prohibition 🔑10(2)—Prohibition lies to prevent court from sentencing petitioner for contempt in failing to answer questions, where excess of jurisdiction was shown.

Where admitted facts disclosed that trial court was acting in excess of its jurisdiction, proper case was presented for writ of prohibition to prevent trial court from sentencing defendant for contempt for failure to answer questions, since there is no remedy by appeal from judgment of contempt, and such a remedy, if it existed, would not be adequate to protect petitioner against loss resulting from transferring records from one state to another.

Court for Los Angeles County and Walter S. Gates and Victor R. McLucas, Judges thereof. Writ granted.

Loewenthal, Lissner, Roth & Gunter, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Newlin & Ashburn and C. W. Johnson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J. This original proceeding is brought to prevent the respondent court from proceeding further in an action entitled Arthur Schuster et al., plaintiffs, v. Adolf Schuster et al., defendants, and particularly to prevent the respondent court from sentencing the petitioner for contempt of court, because of his failure to answer questions at the time fixed for the giving of his deposition. The principal contention of the petitioner is that the respondent court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, or, assuming that it has jurisdiction, it ought not to seek as a matter of comity to exercise the jurisdiction. The following constitute the salient facts: Benjamin Schuster, a resident of Apache county, Ariz., died December 10, 1911. His will was admitted to probate by the superior court of that county and state on January 29, 1912, and letters testamentary were issued to the executors named in the will, to wit, Adolf Schuster (the petitioner herein), Max Schuster (now deceased), and Josephine Schuster (the widow of deceased and one of the plaintiffs in the action now pending in the respondent court). By the terms of the will, a large portion of the estate was given to Adolf Schuster, Josephine Schuster, and Max Schuster as trustees, for the purposes of paying certain fixed portions of the income to Josephine Schuster, the widow, and to her for the maintenance of the children of the deceased, and, upon the arrival of the children at certain ages, to pay to them certain portions of the principal, and finally, upon the death of the widow and the attainment of a designated age by each of the children, to distribute to them the remainder of the principal. The children are Arthur Schuster, Marguerite Schuster Ellison, Lloyd Schuster, and Edward Schuster. All of these children except Edward Schuster are plaintiffs in the pending action; the plaintiff Lloyd Schuster being an incompetent, and appearing by Rolland Ellison, his guardian ad litem. Edward Schuster is made a defendant. On February 18, 1913, the trust estate was by an order of the superior court of Apache county, Ariz., distributed to the trustees named. Max Schuster died October 6, 1925, and Adolf Schuster was appointed executor of his last will and testament. On December 31, 1926, Marguerite Schuster Ellison and Arthur Schuster filed their petition in the Arizona court setting forth the death of Max Schuster, one of the trustees, and alleging that the trustees had not accounted, and that the petitioners' interests were adverse to those of the trust estate, and that Adolf Schuster had assumed sole control thereof, and asked the court to appoint a new trustee in the place of Max Schuster, deceased, for the purpose of securing a proper accounting. The petitioner here filed an answer thereto denying that his interest was adverse to that of his trust and admitting his failure to render a formal account, although he said the books had always been open to the petitioners and beneficiaries, and averring his willingness to account. It does not appear whether this petition has ever been heard or determined. It does appear, however, that a petition by Adolf Schuster to have ascertained the amount which should be distributed to Marguerite Schuster Ellison, prior to the decease of Josephine Schuster, filed by him on April 18, 1927, is still pending and undetermined in the Arizona court; the proceeding having been continued at the request of Marguerite Schuster Ellison. It also appears that, pursuant to the allegation of willingness to account already noticed, the trustees, by Adolf Schuster, did on April 14, 1927, file an account setting forth the assets and liabilities of the trust estate together with the income and disbursements thereof. The plaintiffs in the action pending in the respondent court, Marguerite Schuster Ellison, Lloyd Schuster, and Josephine Schuster, interposed and filed written objections to the report and account. A hearing was had from May 2 to May 9, 1927, upon these pleadings, in which all of the appearing parties were represented by counsel, and on September 3, 1927, the court made its order and decree settling the account. Some minor items were not allowed, but on the whole the report was confirmed. On October 26, 1927, Marguerite Schuster Ellison gave notice of appeal from the order and decree to the Supreme Court of the state of Arizona, and it is alleged that the appeal is still pending and undetermined.

Within two months after the appeal was taken, and on December 16, 1927, Marguerite Schuster Ellison and the others who filed their objections before the Arizona court and participated in the hearing commenced the action already mentioned in respondent court, in which they allege, in very similar vein to the proceeding in Arizona, that Adolf Schuster, the petitioner here, has exercised full control and management of the trust estate; that his interests are adverse to those of the trust estate by reason of his direction to the A. & B. Schuster Company, a corporation, which it is alleged he dominates, to take possession of certain of the trust property for its own use and benefit; that plaintiffs are entitled to an accounting in order to discover these transactions; that plaintiffs are unaware of the exact amounts which should have been paid to the children of the deceased, Benjamin Schuster, upon arriving at certain ages, to wit, 22 years and 27 years, and that petitioner has not paid them their full share in accordance with the provisions of the trust; that they are unable to determine the exact amount which should have been paid to the children until an accounting has been had, although it appears that the Arizona court has ratified and confirmed the payment of the amounts due to all the children on arriving at the age of 22 and the age of 27, except Marguerite Schuster Ellison, and has discharged the trustees as to these interests; and that Edward Schuster has acknowledged receipt of his full share payable to him at the age of 27. They ask that Adolf Schuster, the petitioner here, and the A. & B. Schuster Company, a corporation, which corporation they say is his alter ego, be required to account, and that petitioner be removed as trustee and some one else be appointed in his stead. There are other facts relating to the procedure by which it was sought to compel the petitioner to give his deposition and to punish him for contempt in refusing to answer the question, but it is unnecessary to state them.

[1] It is patent that the Arizona court has heretofore assumed and exercised, and is still exercising, jurisdiction of the trust, and a strange and anomalous situation would surely result if the California courts should remove a trustee who is appearing as such in Arizona, especially if the latter court should be of the opinion that he should not be removed. Furthermore, all of the parties to the action pending in the respondent court, with the exception of the defendant corporation, have appeared in, and submitted their contentions in, the foreign forum. Dissatisfaction on the part of litigants with the orders and decrees of that court should not prompt the courts of a sister jurisdiction to attempt an interference. There are other cogent reasons which might be enumerated, all of which point in the same direction and indicate to our minds a situation entirely different from that considered in Smith v. Davis, 90 Cal. 25, 27 P. 26, 25 Am. St. Rep. 92, and similar authorities. In the case cited, which is relied upon by respondents, a trust was created, by agreement executed in California, relating to lands situate in Washington territory. The trustee named in the deed of trust was incapable of acting, and declined to act. It was held that the courts of this state had jurisdiction to appoint a trustee to execute the trust on the general and well-recognized doctrine that equity acts in personam, and not in rem. We are confronted with a problem radically different.

[2] Indeed, our Legislature, sensing something of the situation which might arise by action of different courts in different counties of our own state, has said, in section 1699 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that, "where any trust has been created by or under any will to continue after distribution, the superior court shall not lose jurisdiction of the estate by final distribution, but shall retain jurisdiction thereof for the purpose of the settlement of accounts under the trusts," and has outlined the procedure therefor. It would also be utterly inconsistent with any proper concept of judicial authority to charge a court with the responsibility of settling the accounts of the trusts to say that it did not have the power to remove a recalcitrant or neglectful trustee. In Dowdall v. Superior Court, 183 Cal. 348, 191 P. 685, in drawing the distinction between the jurisdiction possessed by the court which distributed the estate to the trustee and that possessed by any other superior court of the state, our Supreme Court designated the former as "the primary jurisdiction," and stated that any other superior court to which might be presented a bill in equity relating to the accounts of the trustee should, upon being informed of the jurisdiction of the probate court, postpone the proceeding before it and allow the accounts to be settled in the court of primary jurisdiction. If this be true of the courts of our own jurisdiction, it will readily be appreciated that some considerable degree of importance in this case must be granted to the comity existing between sister states. We would be compelled to assume that the law of Arizona is the same as our own with respect to the retention of jurisdiction over the estate for the purpose of executing the trust, even though that court had not proceeded to and were not exercising its jurisdiction. Under such circumstances we find the language employed in Schwartz v. Gerhardt, 44 Or. 425, 75 P. 698, to be particularly apt. It reads: "It is undoubtedly a well-established principle of law that a trustee appointed by a foreign court is amenable only to that court, and the fact that his residence is in another jurisdiction will not confer authority there to control the administration of his trust, or to require accountability for the trust property. The rationale of this doctrine is that, the trust relations having been created by judicial decree of another country, the trustee is accountable only to the court creating the trust. He becomes the instrumentality of the court for the administration of the property entrusted to his care and custody, which is to be considered and treated as in custodia legis; and, if other jurisdictions were permitted to interfere with and to direct the execution of the trust, it would lead to great conflict of authority and inextricable confusion, which would hinder rather than aid in the rightful administration thereof. 2 Beach, Trust and Trustees, § 758; Campbell v. Sheldon, 13 Pick. [Mass.] 8; Jenkins v. Lester, 131 Mass. 355; Curtis v. Smith, 6 Blatchf. 537, Fed. Cas. No. 3505; Woodruff

v. Young, 43 Mich. 548, 6 N. W. 85; Vaughan v. Northup, 15 Pet. 1, 10 L. Ed. 639; Peale v. Phipps, 14 How. 368, 14 L. Ed. 459."

[3, 4] The obvious reply to this quotation, without saying that it is a correct one, would seem to be that here the trustees were not appointed by the court, but by the testator. And such we understand to be the effect of respondents' argument that the status of a testamentary trustee is essentially different from that of an executor. In other words, the respondents recognize the rule announced in Philbrook v. Randall, 195 Cal. 95, 231 P. 739, that "the court having jurisdiction over the administration of the estate and the executrix is the probate court" of a foreign jurisdiction which appointed the executrix, and "such court is therefore the proper forum in which to seek an accounting and settlement of the estate," regardless of the fact that the executrix may have been guilty of a devastavit by her neglect to account, but they attempt to avoid the force of the opinion in the instant case by pointing to the difference in the manner of the appointment. We must concede that a testamentary trustee is vested with some rights and charged with responsibilities prior to the time of distribution (Estate of O'Connor, 2 Cal. App. 475, 84 P. 317), but this does not militate against the continuing jurisdiction of the court administering the estate to settle the accounts under the trusts, to supervise the management thereof, and to oversee the distribution of the income and the principal when the time arrives, to the beneficiaries. In order that the situation may be made less free from doubt, let us suppose that the Arizona court, acting under a law comparable to section 1702 of our Code of Civil Procedure, which reads in part as follows: "The court in which the administration is pending shall have power at any time before final distribution to appoint some fit and proper person to fill any vacancy in the office of trustee under the will, whether resulting from such declination, removal, or otherwise; provided, it shall be required by law or necessary to carry out the trust created by the will, that such vacancy shall be filled; and every person so appointed shall, before acting as trustee, give a bond such as is required by section one thousand three hundred eighty-eight of this code, of a person to whom letters of administration are directed to issue" (italics ours), had appointed, for any of the causes therein mentioned, the trustee to take the trust estate, would we not be in exactly the situation described in the quotation from Schwartz v. Gerhardt, supra? What substantial difference does it make that the trustees have received recognition at the hands of the court by the distribution of the estate to them and the confirmation of their reports and accounts, but drew their appointment from the will rather than from the court probating the will?

Entirely aside, however, from the statutory enactments under which jurisdiction of the estate is retained, to which we have directed attention, we find some light in the case of Marsh v. Marsh Ex'rs, 73 N. J. Eq. 99, 67 A. 706. In that case a part of the lands were in New Jersey, and one of the heirs brought action there for a partition of the local realty and for an accounting of the rents received therefrom. The court says: "Prima facie the courts of the testator's domicile and of the probate have primary jurisdiction of the accounts of the trustees and their allowance, and the fact that the trustees' receipts are to some extent from the rents of lands in other states does not, I think, affect the right of the court of domicile and probate to pass on all the items of the trustees' accounts, both as to charge and discharge, according to the laws of this forum. This results from the fact that the trustees derive title through the probate of the will and the receipt of letters testamentary from the New York court, and that court has therefore jurisdiction for the settlement of the trustees' accounts, wherever they may reside. 1 Perry, Trusts, § 71; Chase v. Chase, 2 Allen (Mass.) 101. In Davis v. Davis, 57 N. J. Eq. 252, 41 A. 353 (1898), Vice-Chancellor Grey said that active trusts are usually to be enforced in the state of the domicile of the decedent. Complainant, having gone to those courts, has submitted himself to their jurisdiction for the purpose of settling the amount due to the cestui que trusts up to May 1, 1904, and Minnie Marsh [the plaintiff in New Jersey], the defendant, being a party to the proceedings for an accounting there, the court may certainly include all income and expenditures up to the time of its filing. And in these proceedings all questions arising on the accounting can be settled more satisfactorily than on an accounting here, because the law of the domicile is probably the law to be applied on the settlement of the disputed items." And again the court says: "The jurisdiction in New Jersey, so far as relates to the accounting for rents prior to May 1, 1904, or the filing of the cross-bill, is ancillary, I think, to the primary jurisdiction of the court of domicile and probate, and ordinarily should be exercised only for the purpose of preserving the rights of the parties pending settlement in the place of primary jurisdiction." We also read (5 R. C. L. § 110), "when a testamentary trust is created, and the trustee appointed and the parties interested are resident in the same state, there is no doubt that the laws of that state govern all questions in regard thereto." Confirming the text is the case of First Nat. Bank of Paterson v. Nat. Broadway Bank, 156 N. Y. 459, 51 N. E. 398, 42 L. R. A. 139. The force of the observation that, if the courts of other states were to interfere in instances like the one now before us, great conflict of authority and inextricable confusion would hinder the administration of justice, becomes apparent from the authorities. We are not here dealing with the different courts of our own state, whose jurisdiction is, subject to the Constitution, a matter of legislative control, but the judicial branch of government of a sister state, to whose acts and jurisdiction we owe the highest degree of courtesy and recognition. We are not disposed to say that there may not be instances where the exercise of jurisdiction by our own courts might not be invoked, but we are forced to conclude that the situation here presented does not warrant the court in taking jurisdiction, and that, when it assumes to act, it is acting improperly and in excess of its rightful authority. Weintraub v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 267 P. 733, quotes with approval from Broom v. Douglass, 175 Ala. 268, 57 So. 860, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 164, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1155, as follows: " 'By "excess of jurisdiction," as distinguished from the entire absence of jurisdiction, we understand and mean that the act, though within the general power of the judge, is not authorized, and therefore void, with respect to the particular case because the conditions which alone authorize the exercise of his general power in that particular case are wanting; and hence the judicial power is not in fact lawfully invoked.' " We cannot imagine language more apt to express the situation presented in the instant cause.

[5, 6] The respondents assert, however, that, inasmuch as the complaint in the action pending fails to disclose the proceedings in the Arizona courts other than to say that the plaintiffs have been endeavoring to secure an accounting "through proceedings in the superior court of the state of Arizona, in and for the county of Apache," and that it does not allege the fact that the personal defendants reside in that state, or that the testator was a resident there and his will probated there, but that said matters are set up by way of affirmative defense, the writ of prohibition will not lie. In the petition for the writ, however, the petitioner repeats and repleads all of the allegations of the affirmative defense, and the respondents have admitted their truth. It is true that in respondents' brief they suggest that they be permitted to amend to meet these allegations, but this suggestion, though it were made in the form of a motion, would be without appeal to our sense of justice, for the reason that it appears from the abstract of record filed in the cause pending in the Supreme Court of Arizona, and the abstract of the probate docket, together with copies of the instruments filed in the probate proceedings in Arizona, accompanying the report of the referee appointed by this court to take testimony upon one branch of the case, that the material allegations of the affirmative defense are true. What difference can it make, when the truth of the matter appears, whether it be by allegations of the petitions supplemented by admissions or in the complaint? Here the facts are to be considered as though fully settled, and, since a consideration of them discloses the excess of jurisdiction, the writ ought to issue. And this is true because there is no remedy by appeal from the judgment of contempt. Furthermore, it appears that, though there were a remedy by appeal, it would not be adequate to protect the petitioner against the loss bound to accrue to him by being forced to bring his records from Arizona to California.

The peremptory writ will issue.

WILLIAMS v. NIETO et ux. (Civ. 3767.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 1, 1929.

1. Mortgages 🔑459(1)—In action to foreclose mortgage, where complaint was verified, answer not pleading homestead was insufficient to put homestead in issue (Code Civ. Proc. § 437).

In action to foreclose a mortgage in which complaint was verified, answer was insufficient to put homestead in issue as against mortgage, where homestead was not pleaded in answer, under Code Civ. Proc. § 437, relating to pleading.

2. Homestead 🔑57(1)—In action to foreclose mortgage, burden was on defendants to show there was declaration of homestead which had been recorded and that claimant resided on property at time.

In action to foreclose mortgage, burden rested on defendants to show not only that there was a declaration of homestead and that it had been recorded, but also that claimant was resident on property at time declaration of homestead was made and recorded.

3. Homestead 🔑57(3)—In action to foreclose mortgage, evidence held insufficient to show there was valid declaration of homestead before execution of mortgage.

In action to foreclose a mortgage, evidence held insufficient to show there was a valid declaration of homestead on property prior to execution of mortgage.

4. Homestead 🔑118(1)—Where court found mortgage was executed and acknowledged by husband and wife, question whether there was valid homestead became immaterial (Civ. Code, § 1241).

In action to foreclose mortgage, where court found on sufficient evidence that mortgage was executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife, question of whether or not there was a valid homestead on property became immaterial, under Civ. Code, § 1241, providing that homestead is subject to execution or sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained on debt secured by mortgages executed and acknowledged by husband and wife.

5. Pleading ⚷129(2) — Where verified complaint contained copy of mortgage and verified answer did not deny execution, genuineness and due execution of mortgage were admitted (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 447, 462).

In action to foreclose mortgage, where complaint was verified and contained copy of note and mortgage, and answer was verified, but did not deny execution of either note or mortgage, genuineness and due execution of note and mortgage were admitted, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 447, 462.

6. Mortgages ⚷59—Mortgage was valid as against mortgagors, even if certificate of acknowledgment was defective and mortgage was not entitled to be recorded (Civ. Code, § 1217).

Under Civ. Code, § 1217, mortgage was valid as against mortgagors, even if certificate of acknowledgment was defective so that mortgage was not entitled to be recorded, since purpose of acknowledgment to mortgage on real estate is to obviate proof of its execution when it is offered in evidence and to entitle it to be recorded, but mortgage itself is valid between parties and against all persons, except subsequent purchasers or mortgagees for value in good faith, whose conveyance is first duly recorded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action to foreclose a mortgage by W. H. Williams against R. J. Nieto and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert J. Adcock, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff brought this action to foreclose a mortgage on certain real property situated in Kern county. A judgment and decree of foreclosure in the usual form was entered against both defendants. From this judgment, the defendants prosecute this appeal.

Said mortgage was given to secure the payment of a promissory note for the sum of $750, dated November 26, 1921. Appellants contend there was a valid declaration of homestead on said property and that the decree of foreclosure should have been made subject to said homestead.

The record reveals two complete answers to this contention:

[1] First. The homestead is not pleaded in the answer as a special defense against the mortgage; in fact, it is not mentioned in the answer at all. The answer contains, first, a general denial of the allegations of the complaint; second, the statute of limitations; and, third, want of consideration for the note and mortgage.

Section 437 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it stood on December 20, 1926, when the answer in this case was filed, provided: "The answer of the defendant shall contain: 1. A general or specific denial of the material allegations of the complaint controverted by the defendant. 2. A statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim.

"If the complaint be verified, the denial of each allegation controverted must be specific, and be made positively, or according to the information and belief of the defendant.

"If the complaint be not verified, a general denial is sufficient, but only puts in issue the material allegations of the complaint."

The complaint in the case at bar is verified.

In Doll v. Good, 38 Cal. 290, the court said: "The rules of pleading, under our system, are intended to prevent evasion, and to require a denial of every specific averment in a sworn complaint, in substance and in spirit, and not merely a denial of its literal truth.

* * *"

The answer in the case of Reeve v. Colusa Gas & Electric Co., 152 Cal. 110, 92 P. 89, failed to aver that the persons whose negligence caused the injury were fellow servants of plaintiff, and the court held that the defense could not be invoked unless pleaded. See, also, Layng v. Mt. Shasta Mineral Spring Co., 135 Cal. 143, 67 P. 48; Mott v. Minor, 11 Cal. App. 774, 106 P. 244; 21 Cal. Jur. 136, 137, and cases there cited.

In Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239, 24 P. 114, the court said: "A defense which is not pleaded cannot be considered, although shown by the evidence. The rule as to curing defects by litigating a matter without objection applies only where the pleading is defective, and not where there is a total absence of averment." See, also, Brians v. Superior Court, 32 Cal. App. 206, 162 P. 420; Kimball v. Richardson-Kimball Co., 111 Cal. 386–397, 43 P. 1111.

It seems clear that defendants are limited on appeal to the two issues raised by the answer, to wit: Lack of consideration for the mortgage and statute of limitations.

The trial court found against defendants and appellants on both of these issues and the evidence is amply sufficient to support said findings.

[2, 3] Second. If we assume for the sake of argument that the answer is sufficient to put the homestead in issue as against the mortgage, still the evidence is wholly insufficient to show that there was a valid declaration of homestead on the property prior to the execution of the mortgage in question. The only time that a homestead was mentioned in the trial court was during the examination of defendant R. J. Nieto by his own counsel, and then the following occurred:

"Q. Is there a homestead on the property? A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Aldrich (counsel for plaintiff): We object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, as against a mortgage executed by both husband and wife.

"Mr. Adcock (counsel for defendants): We contend that the mortgage never has been executed.

"The Court: I have ruled on that question. Sustain the objection."

No complaint is here made of the trial court's ruling. The homestead was not offered in evidence. Nothing was offered to show the date of the making or recording of the alleged homestead—whether it was before or after the execution of the mortgage. The burden rested entirely upon appellants to show not only that there was a declaration of homestead and that same had been recorded, but also to show that the claimant was a resident upon the property at the time the declaration of homestead was made and recorded. Machado v. Machado, 36 Cal. App. 646, 172 P. 1124; Michels v. Burkhard, 47 Cal. App. 162, 190 P. 370; Apprate v. Faure, 121 Cal. 466, 53 P. 917; 13 Cal. Jur. 558. These requirements appellants failed to meet.

From the state of the record in this case it is clear that appellants are in no position to urge upon this court that there was a valid declaration of homestead on the mortgaged property.

[4] Furthermore, the court found, upon sufficient evidence, that the mortgage was executed and acknowledged by both husband and wife; therefore, the question of whether or not there was a valid homestead on the property becomes wholly immaterial. Section 1241, Civ. Code.

[5] Appellants also contend that no evidence was introduced to show that Suzy Nieto, wife of defendant R. J. Nieto, signed or executed either the note or mortgage. This contention is based upon the fact that Suzy Nieto's signature to both the note and mortgage is by mark and there is only one witness to her mark. Section 17, Code Civ. Proc. The complaint is verified and contains a copy of the note and mortgage. The answer is also verified, but does not deny the execution of either the note or mortgage. Therefore the genuineness and due execution of both the note and mortgage are admitted. Sections 447 and 462, Code Civ. Proc; 21 Cal. Jur. 155, and cases there cited.

The testimony, however, shows, and the court found, that both defendants did, on November 26, 1921, for a valuable consideration, make, execute, and deliver to plaintiff the note and mortgage in question, and that no part of the money called for in said note and mortgage has ever been paid to plaintiff.

[6] The next and final contention of appellants is that said mortgage was not entitled to be recorded, because it was not properly acknowledged by Suzy Nieto. The certificate of acknowledgment is defective, but the acknowledgment is no part of the mortgage. The purpose of an acknowledgment to a mortgage on real estate is merely to obviate proof of its execution when it is offered in evidence and to entitle it to be recorded, but the mortgage itself is valid between the parties and against all persons, except subsequent purchasers or mortgagees for value in good faith, whose conveyance is first duly recorded. 1 Cal. Jur. 236.

It follows that appellants are in no position to object to the sufficiency of the acknowledgment, for the mortgage is valid as against them, whether recorded or not. Section 1217, Civ. Code; Downing v. Le Du, 82 Cal. 471, 23 P. 202.

We find no merit whatever in the appeal. The judgment is affirmed.

SALSBERRY v. JULIAN. (Civ. 6215.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 3, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 28, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑957(1)—Trial court's exercise of discretion in setting aside default will not be disturbed, except for manifest abuse (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Action of trial court, in exercise of discretion under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, in setting aside default judgment, will not be disturbed on appeal, unless abuse of such discretion clearly appears, and any doubt should be resolved in favor of application, to end that trial of cause on merits may be had.

2. Judgment 🔑143(15)—Setting aside default held not abuse of discretion, in view of defendant's illness and failure to notify attorney of date of service (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Trial court held not to have abused discretion in setting aside default, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, where defendant was ill for week after service of summons and complaint, and, although he gave attorney copy of complaint and summons on his recovery from such illness, he neglected to notify attorney as to date of service.

3. Judgment 🔑158—Where verified answer accompanied motion to vacate default judgment, affidavit of merits was not jurisdictional (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Where verified answer equivalent to affidavit of merits accompanies motion to vacate default judgment, affidavit of merits made by defendant in person is not jurisdictional element for granting relief, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

4. Judgment 🔑159—On motion to set aside default, affidavit that defendant stated all facts concerning "cases" to attorney was substantial equivalent of statement that he had stated all facts of present case.

On motion to vacate default, defendant's affidavit that he stated all facts concerning "said cases" to attorney, and acquainted such attorney with defense, was substantial equivalent of affidavit that he had stated all facts of present case to counsel.

5. Appeal and error 🔑224—On motion to set aside default, plaintiff, having filed counter affidavits and not having objected to filing of affidavit, held not in position to complain of filing on appeal.

On appeal from order setting aside default judgment, plaintiff held in no position to urge objection as to filing of affidavit of merits, where counter affidavits in reply thereto were filed by plaintiff, and no motion was made to strike affidavit from files.

6. Judgment 🔑162(1)—On motion to set aside default, truth of affidavit of merits cannot be controverted.

On hearing of motion or application to set aside default, truth of affidavit of merits, or of matters of fact set forth in affidavit as defense, or as basis of applicant's rights in original proceedings, cannot be controverted, and therefore counter affidavits going to merits are irrelevant and improper.

7. Appeal and error 🔑935(2)—Order setting aside default held presumed act of court, and not referred to court commissioner without examining record or exercising discretion.

Order setting aside default judgment held not erroneous, on ground that court did not examine record nor exercise its own discretion, but erroneously referred matter to court commissioner, where record on face did not show that motion was so referred, but only that records, proofs, and briefs filed by counsel were, on submission of motion, referred to court commissioner, since it is to be presumed that court itself passed on record, and that order was made by court itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by John Salsberry against C. C. Julian. From an order vacating a default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Culbert L. Olson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

David H. Cannon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order vacating a default judgment, granted against the defendant. The complaint was for money due, and was filed on September 29, 1926. A copy thereof, together with summons, was served on defendant in Los Angeles county on September 30th. Default was entered and judgment given and entered on October 14th. On October 18th defendant served and filed notice of motion to vacate and set aside the judgment, on the ground that the judgment was entered against the defendant through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect. The motion was based upon the affidavit of defendant's attorney and upon all records and files in said action, and upon the verified answer of the defendant offered for filing and served with said notice. The verified answer contained a denial of the material allegations of the complaint. The plaintiff filed several affidavits in opposition to said motion, which was set for hearing on October 25th. On October 25th, after the submission of the motion, defendant made and served upon the plaintiff an additional affidavit of merits, which was filed on October 26th.

[1] There was a decided conflict in the showing made by the respective parties as to whether defendant was ill between October 1st and October 8th, and also as to whether negotiations for settlement were pending at the time the default was entered. On this showing the court resolved the doubt in favor of the defendant. An application to be relieved from a default judgment, made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and it is a well-settled rule of this court that the action of the trial court in the exercise of such discretion will not be set aside upon appeal, unless an abuse of discretion shall clearly appear, and that any doubt that may exist in that regard should be resolved in favor of the application, to the end that a trial of the cause upon the merits may be had. Waybright v. Anderson, 200 Cal. 374, 253 P. 148; Gorman v. California Transit Co., 199 Cal. 246, 248 P. 923; Waite v. Southern Pacific Co., 192 Cal. 467, 221 P. 204.

[2] No such abuse of discretion clearly appears in the instant case. Serious illness, in connection with other circumstances, has been held a ground for relief in Fink & Schindler Co. v. Gavros, 72 Cal. App. 688, 237 P. 1083, Patterson v. Keeney, 165 Cal. 465, 132 P. 1043, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 232, Burns v. Scooffy, 98 Cal. 271, 33 P. 86, and Merchants' Ad-Sign Co. v. Los Angeles Bill Posting Co., 128 Cal. 619, 61 P. 277. The defendant was served with summons and complaint on September 30th. Defendant's affidavit recites that, at the time of service of the summons on defendant, affiant was busily engaged in important business transactions which required his constant and careful attention; that affiant placed the summons and complaint among his papers, intending to deliver them to his attorney, but because of the pressure of business affiant failed to indorse on the copy of the complaint and summons the date of the service thereof; that on October 1st affiant became so ill as to prevent his attending to his usual business until October 8th; that upon the return of affiant to his office after his illness he immediately delivered to his attorney the summons and complaint. The affidavit of defendant's attorney states that he was handed a copy of the complaint and summons by the defendant on October 8th; that defendant had just returned to his office after an absence therefrom occasioned by illness; "that said affiant was at the time he received the copy of the summons and complaint given the impression that said summons had just been served upon the defendant;" and that affiant did not learn that the summons was served on the defendant on September 30th until the date of the filing of the motion to set aside the default judgment on October 15th. In Brasher v. White, 53 Cal. App. 545, 200 P. 657, it was held an abuse of discretion to deny a prompt application for relief, where the attorney was laboring under a mistake as to the date of service of summons. In the case at bar the attorney was laboring under a similar mistake, and a prompt application for relief was likewise made. Pending negotiations for settlement, in connection with other circumstances, has also been held a ground for relief from a default judgment. Merchants' Ad-Sign Co. v. Los Angeles Bill Posting Co., supra.

[3] Appellant further urges that defendant failed to make a prima facie showing of merits in support of his motion to set aside the judgment. It may be conceded that the affidavit of defendant's attorney, to the effect that affiant had discussed with the defendant the matter of his defense, and that affiant was of the opinion, and had so advised defendant, that he had a good and meritorious defense, is deficient, in that said affidavit did not state that defendant had stated the facts of the case to his attorney; but it is also to be remembered that the verified answer of the defendant, denying the material allegations of the complaint, was on file with the motion, and could be considered by the court in determining whether the application was meritorious. Where a verified answer equivalent to an affidavit of merits accompanies the motion to vacate judgment, an affidavit of merits made by the defendant in person is not a jurisdictional element for granting relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. Waybright v. Anderson, supra; Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 308, 61 P. 932; Williams v. McQueen (Cal. App.) 265 P. 339; Eberhart v. Salazar, 71 Cal. App. 336, 235 P. 86; Sampanes v. Chazes, 54 Cal. App. 612, 202 P. 462; Fulweiler v. Hog's Back Con. Min. Co., 83 Cal. 126, 23 P. 65; Montijo v. Sherer & Co., 5 Cal. App. 736, 739, 91 P. 261. In Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 P. 353, the court said: "The further objection that there was no affidavit of merits is met by the consideration that a verified answer setting forth a defense to the cause of action alleged in the complaint was actually on file at the time the notice was served. That such verified answer meets all the requirements of an affidavit of merits is, of course, well settled. Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 423; Fulweiler v. Min. Co., 83 Cal. 126, [23 P. 65]; Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 308 [61 P. 932]. This answer, whether properly filed or not, was in fact one of the 'records and files in said action,' referred to in the notice, and was certainly available as an affidavit showing a meritorious defense. See Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525 [137 P. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737]."

[4] In addition to the affidavit of merits made by the defendant's attorney, which was also served upon the plaintiff on the day the application was submitted, but after submission thereof, an affidavit of merits by the defendant personally was presented. This rebuttal affidavit was filed on October 26th, the day after submission of the application. No objection to the filing was then made; but counter affidavits in reply thereto were thereafter filed by the plaintiff. Appellant objects to the sufficiency of the affidavit of merits filed by the defendant in person on the ground that said affidavit states that defendant "fully, fairly and completely stated to his attorney all the facts concerning said cases and acquainted his said attorney with his defense to said motions," instead of stating that defendant fully and fairly stated the facts of this case to his counsel. We observe no merit in this contention. An affidavit stating that defendant has stated all the facts concerning this case and a companion case is the substantial equivalent of an affidavit stating that defendant has stated all the facts of this case to his counsel. The affidavit includes all the requisites laid down in the cases cited by appellant.

[5] Appellant states that defendant's counsel, on submission of the motion, was not granted leave to file any additional or amended affidavit of merits, but following the submission of the motion defendant served on plaintiff's attorney, and on the following day, without leave of court, filed the affidavit of defendant. Appellant concedes that defendant had secured leave, when the motion was submitted, to file additional affidavits in rebuttal to plaintiff's affidavits after the submission of the motion. Appellant relies upon the case of Forrest v. Knox et al., 21 Cal. App. 363, 131 P. 894, and urges that the notice of motion to vacate the judgment was not based on this affidavit of defendant and that this affidavit was not referred to in the notice. In the case of Forrest v. Knox, supra, after submission of the motion, defendant, without notice to plaintiff and without his knowledge, obtained permission from the court to file another affidavit in support of his motion. In the present case a copy of defendant's affidavit was served upon the plaintiff in the day the motion was submitted, October 25th. Counter affidavits in reply thereto were filed by the plaintiff on October 26th. The motion was not decided until December 8th. Meanwhile plaintiff made no objection to the filing of defendant's affidavit and no motion was made to strike said affidavit from the files. It follows that plaintiff is in no position to urge this objection on appeal.

[6] Much of the showing made in plaintiff's affidavits goes to the merits of the case. On the hearing of a motion or application for relief the truth of the affidavit of merits, or of the matters of fact set forth in the affidavit as a defense, or as a basis of the applicant's rights in the original proceedings, cannot be controverted. Counter affidavits going to the merits of the case are therefore irrelevant and improper. 14 Cal. Jur. p. 1071.

[7] Appellant contends that the court itself did not examine the record and, on passing on the motion, did not exercise its own discretion based on its own knowledge of the record of the showings presented in support of and in opposition to the motion, but erroneously referred the same to a court commissioner upon whose conclusions, assistance or recommendations the motion was granted. The trial court certified "that said motion was submitted to the court without oral argument for lack of time of the court to hear oral argument, and for the same reason and to assist the court the records, proofs, and briefs filed by counsel were upon the submission of said motion referred to a court commissioner, with whose assistance the court considered said record before passing on said motion." We see no merit in plaintiff's contention. While we have been unable to find any authority for referring a motion to set aside a default judgment to a court commissioner for decision, yet the record on its face does not show that the motion was so referred, but only that the records, proofs and briefs filed by counsel were, upon the submission of said motion, referred to a court commissioner. On its face the certificate shows that the court considered the record, with the assistance of the commissioner, before passing on the record. It is to be presumed that the court itself passed on the record, and the order setting aside the judgment is made by the court itself.

The order setting aside the judgment is affirmed.

In March, 1924, appellants were at their request released from their "obligations" under this agreement and the deposit returned to them, less, however, the sum of $516.25, which was retained, over their protest as accrued interest on deferred payments. The present action is for recovery of that amount. Respondents pleaded and the trial court found that appellants had agreed to pay the $516.25 for the privilege of being relieved from their obligation to purchase, and had accepted the return of the balance of the deposit ($1,983.72) and the release as an accord and satisfaction.

The grounds upon which the appellants base their contention that the judgment against them was erroneous and should be reversed are thus stated in their opening brief: "There was no accord and satisfaction, for the reason that there was no honest dispute upon which, under the law, an accord and satisfaction can be predicated, because under the contract of deposit defendants, if they agreed to the rescission, or mutually rescinded, were not entitled to deduct any sums of money whatsoever, as interest or otherwise, for the reason that (a) the contract under which the deposit was made was void for want of mutuality in that the owner could cancel same at any time; (b) the voucher check which was cashed by the plaintiffs did not show an acceptance by them of a lesser amount in full satisfaction of the larger amount due under the contract, but showed clearly on its face that the lesser amount was being sent 'less interest'; and (c) that the contract was void, because by Statutes of 1907, page 290, the selling of lots by reference to an unrecorded map is prohibited, and the vendee may recover the money paid on such a contract."

[1, 2] An accord is thus defined: "An accord is an agreement to accept, in" extinguishment "of an obligation, something different from or less than that to which the person agreeing to accept is entitled." Civ. Code, § 1521. We have italicized the words "agreement" and "obligation" to emphasize the fact, first, that an accord, being an agreement, must be based on a valid consideration and, second, that that which is to be extinguished must be "a legal duty, by which a person is bound to do or not to do a certain thing." Civ. Code, § 1427.

That an accord must be based upon a valid new consideration has been held repeatedly. Deland v. Hiett, 27 Cal. 611 [87 Am. Dec. 102]; Dobinson v. McDonald, 92 Cal. 33, 27 P. 1098; Peachy v. Witter, 131 Cal. 316, 63 P. 468; Lapp-Gifford Co. v. Muscoy Water Co., 166 Cal. 25. 134 P. 989; Sierra, etc., Power Co. v. Universal Electric & Gas Co., 197 Cal. 376, 387, 241 P. 76; Cloyne v. Levy, 26 Cal. App. 637, 148 P. 224. The consideration which respondents claimed and the trial court found to be the basis of the accord was the release of the "obligation" on the part of appellants to purchase the lots, and the cancellation of the agreement hereinabove set forth. If, therefore, that agreement was void, the appellants were not obligated thereunder, they were under no legal duty performance of which the respondents could have enforced, its cancellation extinguished no obligation, and the transaction was devoid of two of the essential elements of an accord—consideration and the extinguishment of an obligation.

Release from or cancellation of an illegal or void contract can never be a valid consideration, since the party "released" has neither been accorded a right which he did not already possess nor excused from the performance of any act which he could have been compelled to perform. The principle is thus stated in Page on Contracts: "While the parties to a contract may make such terms and select such consideration as they choose, the consideration selected must be the forbearance or acquisition of some legal right. If they select something which is not a legal right, the acquisition or forbearance of it constitutes no consideration, though the parties may believe otherwise. * * * If the forbearance is of what the promisee has no legal right to do * * * no consideration exists." Section 301. "The promise must be such as to offer a legal right or the forbearance of a legal right to which the promissor would not otherwise have been entitled." Id., § 302. "Modification or abandonment of an illegal contract by mutual agreement cannot be a lawful consideration for a new contract based on such original contract, even if there is some additional consideration." Id., § 512.

[3] This brings us to the question of the validity of the agreement of November 15, 1923. That it must be construed as an offer on the part of appellants to buy and on that of respondents to sell lots by reference to an unrecorded map seems too plain to require any extended discussion. We have here a document requesting the reservation for the signers of two lots described only by reference to an unrecorded map, and which they state they desire to purchase at a specified price and on terms which are fully set forth, including a down payment or deposit of $2,500. It provides the time and amount of deferred payments and for interest thereon from the date of the instrument, payable quarterly; it has all the earmarks of an offer to buy, which, upon its acceptance by the Evans-Ferguson Corporation, became an agreement of sale, conditional, it is true, upon the actual recording of the map, but nevertheless such an agreement as comes clearly within the purview of section 8 of the statute relating to sales or offers of sale of lots by reference to unrecorded maps. The statement as to the understanding on the part of appellants that the map had not been recorded, and that respondents could not "sell or offer for sale said land in accordance with said map until it is so recorded," may have been incorporated in the agreement in a vain attempt to take it out of the statute, but, if so, the ostrich of invalidity has not succeeded in concealing itself by hiding its head in the sands of verbosity.

The act above referred to requires the preparation and recording of maps of tracts laid out into lots for purpose of sale. Section 8 is as follows: "No person shall sell or offer for sale any lot or parcel of land, by reference to any map or plat, unless such map or plat has been made, certified, indorsed, acknowledged and filed in all respects as provided in this act, or was filed or recorded prior to the taking effect of this act and in accordance with the laws in force at the time it was so filed or recorded, and no person shall sell or offer for sale any lot or parcel of land by reference to any map or plat other than such recorded map or plat or true and correct copy thereof." The next section provides: "Every person who violates any of the provisions of this act is guilty of a misdemeanor. * * *" Stats. 1907, p. 290; Act 4574, Deering's Gen. Laws. It has been held repeatedly that an agreement violative of this statute is void. King v. Johnson, 30 Cal. App. 63, 157 P. 531; Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14; Young v. Laguna Land & Water Co., 53 Cal. App. 178, 199 P. 810; Smith v. Bach, 54 Cal. App. 236, 201 P. 611; Hartzell v. Doolittle (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 527; Krause v. Marine Trust & Sav. Bank (Cal. App.) 270 P. 246; White v. Jacobs (Cal. Sup.) 267 P. 1087. As said in Young v. Laguna Land & Water Co., supra, such a contract "was void from the beginning and is unenforcible." This being the case, it is manifest that a "release" from the "obligation" to perform was a mere nullity and conferred no right which appellants did not already possess. There was not only an entire lack of obligation on the part of appellants, but under the decisions of our courts they were legally entitled to the return of the entire amount paid in on the illegal contract, and this notwithstanding their knowledge of the nonrecordation of the map.

In Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14, the action was by a vendee under a contract violative of the statute in question, seeking recovery from the vendor of a portion of the purchase price which had already been paid to the latter. The court said: "Concluding, as we do, that the contract in question is void, it only remains to determine the rights of plaintiffs to recover in this action. There are authorities which, while not denying the general rule that an illegal contract cannot be enforced whether malum in se or malum prohibitum, hold that all the consequences which attend a contract contrary to public morals do not attend one which is purely malum prohibitum, and that in the latter case courts will take notice of the circumstances and will give relief if justice and equity require a restoration of money received by either party thereunder. (13 Corpus Juris, p. 411, sec. 341.) In such a case the complaining party is protected, the prohibition being for his benefit, and not being in pari delicto he is entitled to relief. (Id., p. 501, sec. 443.) By the weight of authority where money has been paid in consideration of an executory contract which is illegal, the party who has paid it may repudiate the agreement at any time before it is executed and reclaim the money. In such a case it is the duty of the court in furtherance of justice to aid one not in pari delicto, though to some extent involved in the illegality, but who, as here, is comparatively the more innocent, and to permit him to recover back money paid on a contract as the circumstances of the case may require." On appeal from the judgment rendered on the second trial of the same case (54 Cal. App. 236, 201 P. 611), it was held: "The contract pursuant to which the money was paid by plaintiffs was for the purchase of certain lots referred to as delineated upon an unrecorded map, and hence, as declared by statute (see Stats. 1907, p. 290), it was null and void. Nevertheless, appellant insists that, as plaintiffs must be deemed to have had knowledge that the map was unrecorded prior to making the payments, they are estopped from maintaining an action to recover the sum so paid. In other words, appellant's claim is that parties by their acts may destroy and render nugatory the plain language of this prohibitory provision. The contention is wholly without merit. As said by the Supreme Court in discussing the question on the former appeal by plaintiffs (Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14); 'Where money has been paid in consideration of an executory contract which is illegal, the party who has paid it may repudiate the agreement at any time before it is executed and reclaim the money.'"

The rule announced by both the Supreme Court and the District Court of Appeal was reaffirmed by the former in the very recent case of White v. Jacobs, supra. In that case the trial court had given judgment on the pleadings in an action wherein it was sought to recover a deposit made on a contract for the sale of lots by reference to unrecorded maps. Affirming this judgment, the court held: "This being so, and the sole defense of the said defendants to the third count or cause of action being the defense that the plaintiff knew at the time of entering into the agreement therein set forth that the map therein referred to was an unrecorded map, it follows that, if the defendants' averments in that regard constituted no defense, the trial court acted correctly in granting the motion of the plaintiff for a judgment against said defendants on the pleadings. In the case of Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14, it was held by this court that the sale or offer for sale of lots of land by reference to an unrecorded map or plat was expressly prohibited by the terms of the aforesaid statute and that contracts for such sales based thereon were illegal and void. In a later decision of the same case by the District Court of Appeal (Smith v. Bach, 54 Cal. App. 236, 201 P. 611) it was held that the fact that the plaintiff, who was seeking to recover the money paid on account of such illegal and void transaction, knew that the map referred to therein was unrecorded, constituted no defense to her right of recovery. We have no doubt as to the correctness of the foregoing decision by the appellate tribunal and expressly approve the same, and, in so doing, hold not only that the trial court in the instant case acted correctly in granting the plaintiff's motion for a judgment on the pleadings and in entering such judgment, but that this appeal is frivolous and without merit and was taken for purposes of delay."

In Krause v. Marine Trust & Savings Bank, supra, we find this language: "The purchase price of the lot, which was paid pursuant to this void executory contract, was therefore without consideration, and hence was a proper claim for repayment in this action for rescission." The statement just quoted would seem to conclusively answer repondents' contention that appellant may not be heard to claim rescission of a void and hence legally nonexistent contract.

[4] Respondents urge that "the parties having tried the case in the court below upon the theory that there had been a valid and existing contract between the parties, the appellants cannot on appeal be heard to advance the theory that no such contract existed." We have examined the authorities upon which they rely for support of this contention, but find none of them in point in view of the state of the record in the case. The complaint alleged payment of the $2,500 deposit on the contract in question, which contract is set out in hæc verba as an exhibit and by reference made a part of the pleading. It further alleges a mutual rescission, a return of a portion of the deposit, and the refusal to return the balance. It was not necessary to allege that the contract was void. Its invalidity appeared upon its face, since it specifically stated that the map referred to therein had not been recorded. In Young v. Laguna Land & Water Co., supra, a similar contention was thus dealt with: "It is argued by appellants on this appeal that the invalidity of the contract by reason of the failure to record the map was not raised in the court below but that it was raised for the first time by respondent on this appeal. For this reason, it is argued, this court cannot consider the point. The question was raised by the plaintiffs in the amendment to their complaint, wherein they expressly alleged that the contract for the sale of this lot was made in reference to the map which was exhibited to the plaintiff Florence R. Young and which had been prepared for recordation at the date of said agreement but which was never recorded by said defendant at all. Thus, on the face of plaintiffs' complaint, the contract was void and unenforcible." (Italics ours.)

[5] Appellants urge as another and distinct ground for their contention that the contract was void and hence that there was a failure of consideration, the point that it was lacking in mutuality. This point, we think, is well taken. A brief analysis of the document in question demonstrates that it bound respondents to nothing. Under the last clause there is a reservation of the right in the owner of the property "to return the above money" at any time before a contract of sale is signed and approved by the owner, and the "acceptance" signed by the Evans-Ferguson Corporation is subject to this condition. As said in Stanton v. Singleton, 126 Cal. 657, 59 P. 146, 47 L. R. A. 334: "Of course, there is, on the face of the instrument, no mutuality of contract, for appellant [in that case] does not promise in it to do anything." It is the general rule that: "Where a contract imposes no definite obligation on one party to perform, it lacks mutuality of obligation, or of consideration, which means the same thing. If it is not binding on one party it does not bind the other." 6 Cal. Jur. 211; North Confidence Mining Co. v. Morrice, 56 Cal. App. 145, 204 P. 851; McCowen v. Pew, 18 Cal. App. 302, 123 P. 191; Brown v. San Francisco Savings Union, 134 Cal. 448, 66 P. 592; Levy v. Lyon, 153 Cal. 213, 94 P. 881. As said in Rourke v. McLaughlin, 38 Cal. 196, if a contract must be construed to give one of the parties the election to perform, it is devoid of mutuality, "for it would be leaving the existence of the contract to the will of one of the parties, which would be to say that there was no contract at all."

[6] The general rule is stated in 13 Corpus Juris at page 337, supported by reference to a number of decisions, that, where one party reserves the right of cancellation, mutuality is absent. See, also, Central Oil Co. v. Southern Refining Co., 154 Cal. 165, 97 P. 177. A party to an agreement which thus purports to bind him alone has the right to withdraw from it and to demand and recover whatever he has paid thereunder. Thus, in Hamlin v. Barnhart, 26 Cal. App. 632, 147 P. 1188, the court said: "The right of respondent to withdraw from the agreement seems clear. There was no mutuality of consideration provided for. On the one hand, it was proposed to bind respondent in absolute terms to perform on her part, while appellant's performance was made conditional. * * * In the event of his default, respondent had no remedy as against his caprice. * * * 'If a promise does not offer any enforcible legal right or forbearance it is not a consideration. This principle is sometimes expressed in the rule that promises, in order to be a valid consideration each for the other, must be mutual. * * * Where the parties assume to make a contract in which a promise is the consideration for a promise, and analysis shows that one of the promises does not impose any legal duty upon the party making it, such promise is not a consideration for the other promise.' (1 Page on Contracts, secs. 302, 303, 304.) * * * Treated as a mere offer to exchange, the proposal was revocable by respondent at any time before acceptance by appellant." Nor is such lack of mutuality in an agreement for the sale of land remedied by a subsequent offer of performance by the party not bound. Zaring v. Lavatta, 36 Idaho, 459, 211 P. 557.

The case of Weber v. Hulbert, 225 Ill. App. 321, well illustrates these principles of law, and in some respects presents a situation strikingly akin to that of the parties in this case so far as the question of mutuality or lack thereof is involved. The plaintiff in that case had signed a so-called "proposal" to purchase a lot from the defendant for a price and on terms specified therein. She paid a deposit and received a receipt from the owner's agent which concluded with the statement: "This receipt being issued subject to prior sale and to acceptance by Thomas H. Hulbert [owner]. The said sum to be returned in case of prior sale or non-acceptance." It was held that the agreement lacked mutuality, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover back the deposit. We quote from the opinion: "If the so-called proposal, as finally signed by the parties at the times shown, be considered as an attempt to incorporate into a contract all the terms of the purchase of the lot therein mentioned, it is void as a unilateral contract. When, on the morning of August 20, plaintiff gave Ham her check for $1,250, payable to defendant's order, she received a receipt signed by Ham, in which it was stated that the amount was received 'on account of her proposal for purchase' of the lot in question for the price of $12,500, and that the receipt was issued 'subject to prior sale and to acceptance' by defendant, and that said sum was to be returned to her in case of prior sale or such non-acceptance. When these things were done it is clear that defendant was under no obligation to make a conveyance of the lot to plaintiff. When later in the same day Ham again called on plaintiff and presented the duplicate proposals to plaintiff for her signature, and she signed them, and Ham had delivered them to defendant, it is equally clear that defendant was under no obligation to make such conveyance. And, in our opinion, after defendant had signed said duplicate proposals and after one copy thereof had been received by plaintiff by mail, defendant was not bound thereby to make a conveyance of the lot to plaintiff even though she should have thereafter elected to make, and did make, further payments up to $6,250. In the third clause of the proposal is the statement: 'The said above described property, if conveyed, is to be conveyed by a good and sufficient warranty deed,' etc. Then follows the recital of various restrictions and conditions. Then under plaintiff's signature to the proposal proper there follow certain statements in the form of a receipt, under which appears defendant's signature. He therein acknowledges the receipt from plaintiff of $1,250, 'as deposit on the above proposal,' but he does not accept the proposal as made. All the agreement on his part is, that, if all the subsequent payments agreed in said proposal to be made by plaintiff have been made promptly when due, said sum of $1,250, together with subsequent payments, is to be returned 'if for any fault, failure or neglect chargeable to me the said above recited property shall not be conveyed in accordance with the terms of the said proposal.' He does not promise to convey the lot to plaintiff even though the subsequent payments mentioned should be promptly made by her. The mere fact that he has the right, as stated, to return all moneys paid by her presupposes the fact that he has a right to refuse to convey the lot, if he should so desire. The contract, if it is a contract, is unilateral, lacking in mutuality and void."

[7] We are of the opinion that, because the original agreement was void in law, and in addition thereto was entirely lacking in mutuality, there was no "obligation" on the part of appellants which could be extinguished, and no consideration for an agreement to accept something less than appellants were entitled to, and that as a matter of law no accord and satisfaction was had. In expressing these views we are not unmindful of the rule laid down in Berger v. Lane, 190 Cal. 443, 213 P. 45, "that the compromise of a disputed or doubtful claim is in itself a good consideration [for an accord] and that no investigation into the character or value of the claim submitted will be gone into for the purpose of setting aside a compromise honestly made." We cannot agree, however, that there was a bona fide disputed or doubtful claim in this case. The absolute invalidity and illegality of an agreement to sell, or offering to sell, lots by reference to an unrecorded map had been so repeatedly pronounced by the decisions of our courts as to leave no room for doubt in the mind of any one. The language of the contract itself shows that the parties recognized this fact. In Berger v. Lane it is further said: "But, on the other hand, it is equally true that, to constitute a good consideration for a settlement by way of compromise, there must have been an actual bona fide difference or dispute between the parties as to their legal rights." In Lapp-Gifford Co. v. Muscoy Water Co., supra, quoted with approval in Berger v. Lane, it is said: "While it is not necessary that the dispute or controversy should be well founded, it is necessary that it should be founded in good faith. Without an honest dispute an agreement to take a lesser amount in payment for the liquidated claim is without consideration and void. An arbitrary refusal to pay, based on the mere pretense of the debtor, made for the obvious purpose of exacting terms which are inequitable and oppressive, is not such a dispute as will satisfy the requirements of the rule."

In all of the cases which we have examined dealing with this subject it is to be noted that the legality and validity of the original agreement was unquestioned, the dispute settled by the accord being one as to the rights, duties, and obligations of the parties thereunder. A dispute or contention as to the rights of parties under a valid legal contract, even though the contention of one of them be untenable or the result of a misconstruction of their agreement, may, under the rule laid down in such cases as Berger v. Lane, be the proper subject of an accord. Where the original contract is void because contrary to express statutory law, an entirely different rule applies. In Sierra Power Co. v. Universal Electric & Gas Co., supra, at page 387 of 197 Cal. (241 P. 81) we find this pertinent statement: "Since an accord is an agreement it is subject to the same rules applicable to other agreements (1 Cal. Jur. 127). 'The discharge of claims by way of accord and satisfaction is dependent upon contract express or implied; and it follows that the essentials necessary to valid contracts generally must be present in a contract of accord and satisfaction. Therefore there must be (1) a proper subject matter; (2) competent parties; (3) a consent or meeting of the minds of the parties; and (4) a consideration.' (1 R. C. L. 178, sec. 3.) The agreement of accord and satisfaction which the defendant here contends for could under the evidence arise only by implication. The statute expressly forbade the plaintiff to charge or receive compensation for electrical energy at any rate other than that specified in the contract duly filed. It therefore could not lawfully accept the amounts tendered by the defendant. In view of this situation counsel for the plaintiff very pertinently inquires, 'How can the law imply that plaintiff has done that which the statute expressly forbids?' We think the answer must be that a contract of accord thus arising cannot properly be brought into being with one of the essentials of a contract lacking, to-wit, a lawful subject matter." (Italics ours.)

We are of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

HAIGHT v. MARIN MUNICIPAL WATER DIST. (Civ. No. 6563.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 8, 1929.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court July 3, 1929.

1. Damages ⚷23—Damages recoverable for breach of contract are such as may be reasonably supposed to have been within contemplation of parties when making contract (Civ. Code, § 3300).

Under Civ. Code, § 3300, damages for breach of a contract are only such as may reasonably be supposed to have been within contemplation of parties, at time of making contract, as probable result of breach.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚷18(1)—Payment of consideration for option to purchase property rendered offer irrevocable.

Offeree's payment of $500 as consideration for option to purchase property rendered offer irrevocable.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⚷18(3)—Where offeree accepted offer before option expired, contract for sale of property automatically came into existence.

Where offeree, on last day of option period, accepted contract for sale of property, contract automatically came into existence.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⚷351(1)—Vendor water district, breaching contract, could not be charged with purchaser's resale profit, where officers had no knowledge of resale contract when giving option (Civ. Code, §§ 3300, 3306).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3300, 3306, relating to damages, municipal water district, giving purchaser option to purchase land, and later breaching contract after purchaser had contracted to resell, could not be charged with purchaser's resale profit, where officers of district had no knowledge of resale contract at time they gave purchaser option.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⚷351(1)—Vendor's knowledge of purchaser's resale contract, acquired after vendor gave purchaser option, was insufficient to charge vendor with purchaser's resale profit on vendor's breach of contract.

Knowledge acquired by officers of vendor water district, after they had given purchaser an option to purchase land, was insufficient to charge water district with purchaser's resale profit, where water district breached contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Charles O. Wellock against the Marin Municipal Water District. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Jessie Haight, as administratrix of the estate of Charles O. Wellock, deceased, was substituted as plaintiff after plaintiff's death. Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

George H. Harlan, of San Rafael, for appellant.

William Kehoe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

GOODELL, Justice pro tem. This appeal was taken from a judgment for $10,500 in favor of the plaintiff, Charles O. Wellock, and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. The plaintiff died after the appeal was perfected, and his administratrix was substituted herein as respondent.

The action was for the recovery of consequential damages, namely, a prospective profit of $10,000 which plaintiff failed to make because the district did not enter into a contract of sale with plaintiff after he had exercised an option to purchase from the district a tract of land for $50,000 at a time when he had third parties under contract to buy the same land from him for $60,000; also to recover $500 paid by plaintiff when the option was obtained.

The facts are that the district owned 459 acres of land at Deer Park, near Fairfax, in Marin county, for which it had no further need, and which it desired to sell. Its board of directors had, by resolution, authorized the payment of a commission of 5 per cent. of the selling price of any of its lands. By a later resolution, dealing only with this tract, the board set $50,000 as the lowest figure at which it would sell, and authorized its general manager to give an option at that price for not longer than 60 days, the consideration for such option to be $500 for each 15-day period, and the option money to be applicable to the purchase price in case of consummation.

On April 3, 1925, Mr. Wellock obtained a writing, signed in the name of the district by its general manager, granting him a 15-day option to purchase the tract for $50,000, for which option he paid $500. The option was silent as to terms of payment. On the next day, the 4th, a letter, signed in the name of the district by its general manager, was sent to the optionee, "confirming" the option of the day before, and setting out the terms as follows: 25 per cent. of the purchase price to be paid "upon delivery of an agreement of sale," and the balance in three equal installments, one, two, and three years after date, with the privilege of paying off before maturity, and the deferred payments bearing 6 per cent. interest. This letter of the 4th amplified the provisions of the option, containing, on the one hand, terms more favorable and workable for the optionee, and, on the other, reservations favorable to the district, not made in the option. Both letters had been drafted by the attorney for the district, and about three days later he drew up a proposed agreement of sale (with the date and names of purchasers left blank), designed for use in case the option was exercised, which draft was submitted to the optionee. This draft contained mutual promises and covenants usually found in such writings, and expressed in legal and formal style the terms and provisions found in the letter of April 4, but, just as the letter of April 4 had enlarged upon the option of the 3d, the draft of agreement enlarged somewhat upon both letters.

On or about the 14th the district's board learned that the optionee had negotiated a contract to resell the land in question to Messrs. Rice and Greisen for $60,000, and a special meeting of the board was called for the 15th to consider the revocation of the option. The meeting was attended by 10 of the 15 members, and the attorney for the district reported that the resale contract had been made, and that the optionee would thereby enjoy a profit of $10,000, while at the same time claiming a commission of $2,500 from the district under the 5 per cent. resolution. A resolution to cancel and revoke the option was then introduced, but failed of adoption on a 5 to 5 vote (8 votes being requisite for affirmative action). The optionee on the same day expressly waived any commission that might accrue to him, and stood only upon his rights under the option, in which he claimed to be dealing in his own right, as a principal.

The resale contract between the optionee and Rice and Greisen was made on the 6th, and called for consummation by the 17th of April, and a cashier's check for $22,500 was escrowed by Rice and Greisen with a title company in San Rafael, deliverable only upon the assignment to them of a contract of sale signed by the district. The proposed form of contract had been submitted to them by the optionee and had had their approval. The district never concerned itself with, or became a party to, this Wellock-Rice-Greisen escrow.

With matters in this condition the optionee, on the last day of the life of his option, April 18, gave written notice to the district of his acceptance of the offer contained in the letters of April 3 and 4. The board met on April 21, when its attention was for the first time called to the acceptance of the 18th, and, after discussion, adopted a resolution, by an 8 to 5 vote, expressly confirming the option and directing the executive committee to take up the matter of the agreement of sale between the district and the purchaser and report back at the next meeting three weeks later. Mr. Wellock was present with his counsel, and protested that a delay greater than one week would be fatal to his resale, and would cause him, consequently, the loss of the $10,000 profit. Rice and Greisen were present with their counsel and joined in the protest. The board nevertheless adjourned for three weeks. On April 23 Rice and Greisen withdrew from escrow the $22,500 check. This action was commenced a few days thereafter.

The appellant presents a number of points in urging a reversal, chiefly: (1) That Wellock was the agent of the district, and could not, therefore, realize any secret profits from the sale of his principal's property; (2) that the manager of the district had no authority to execute the option, such authority being committed by law to the president and secretary, and, therefore, that there was no valid offer or option for Wellock to accept; (3) that Wellock did not accept the option; (4) that there was no meeting of the minds of the parties as to any contract whatsoever; (5) that there was no tender either made, or waived, nor any showing that plaintiff was ready and able to perform; (6) that there was no breach; and (7) that there was no showing that plaintiff suffered any damage. Other points might be added, but they are subsidiary to those mentioned. The conclusion at which we have arrived renders it unnecessary to discuss at any length any of these, other than the question of damages.

The judgment awards $10,500 on the theory that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the $500 paid when the option was given and the $10,000 profit which he would have made if the resale contract had been carried through to a successful conclusion. On the resale the plaintiff's $10,000 profit would have come out of the pockets of the plaintiff's vendees who had contracted, voluntarily, of course, to pay him $60,000 for land costing him but $50,000. The judgment, however, takes it out of the treasury of the district as consequential damages, and this measure, we are satisfied, is not justifiable in the circumstances of this case.

Normally the measure of damages for breach of contract "is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom." Civ. Code, § 3300. The breach which gives rise to this action was the defendant's failure or refusal to enter into a formal contract of sale at the price of $50,000. Had such contract been entered into and then breached by failure to convey, the amount ordinarily recoverable would have been "the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach," etc. Civ. Code, § 3306.

In the case at bar there was no proof upon which to base a finding of the market value of the land, which finding in turn would form the basis, under section 3306 of the Civil Code, for an award of the ordinary measure of damages. Indeed, the theory of the plaintiff, as shown by his complaint, was that the resale contract, and it alone, advanced the market value to $60,000 for the time being, and that when the resale was lost the value of the land was no more than the original contract price of $50,000. The allegation in that respect is as follows: "That the market value of said property on said 21st day of April, 1925, and at the time of said breach by defendant was, because of said ability and willingness of said proposed purchasers to buy the same for sixty thousand ($60,000) dollars, the sum of sixty thousand ($60,000) dollars; * * * that when said offer of said proposed purchasers was withdrawn, as aforesaid, the market value of said property ceased to be more than fifty thousand ($50,000) dollars." This is only another way of saying that the plaintiff relies upon the resale price, rather than the market value, to establish his measure of damages, which means, in short, that consequential damages are claimed.

[1] The rule with respect to consequential damages is well settled in this state. In Hunt Bros. Co. v. San Lorenzo Water Co., 150 Cal. 51, 56, 87 P. 1093, 1095 (7 L. R. A. [N. S.] 913), it is said: "It is the well-settled general rule of damages for any breach of contract that the damages that can be recovered for a breach are only such as may reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract, as the probable result of a breach. Other damages are too remote." (Italics ours.) "* * * Such, as we understand it, is the rule declared by section 3300 of the Civil Code, as that section has always been construed by this court, and it is the rule enunciated in the leading case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, which has been universally accepted and followed. See Mitchell v. Clarke, 71 Cal. 165, 11 P. 882, 60 Am. Rep. 529."

In the Mitchell Case the rule referred to is quoted as follows: "Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to defendant, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from a breach of such contract which they would reasonably contemplate would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under the special circumstances known and communicated. But, on the other hand, if these special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he at most could only be supposed to have had in contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances from such a breach of contract." See, also, Wallace v. Ah Sam, 71 Cal. 197, 200, 12 P. 46, 60 Am. Rep. 534. And in Fraser v. Bentel, 161 Cal. 390, 396, 119 P. 509, 512 (Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1062), the following is quoted from 1 Sutherland on Damages, § 47: "In awarding damages for the nonperformance of an existing contract the gains or profits of collateral enterprises in which the party claiming them has been induced to engage by relying upon the performance of such a contract, and of which no notice has been given the other party, cannot be included." (Italics ours.) Other cases to the same effect are Schumann v. Karrer, 184 Cal. 50, 192 P. 849; Friend & Terry Lumber Co. v. Miller, 67 Cal. 464, 8 P. 40; Schnierow v. Boutagy, 33 Cal. App. 336, 164 P. 1132.

[2, 3] The contract upon which the respondent relies was concluded on April 18, 1925, being made up of an offer of the district, dated April 3, and an acceptance thereof by Wellock, dated April 18. When the offer was made, the offeree paid the offerer $500 as a consideration for the fifteen-day option, which, of course, rendered the offer irrevocable, and bound the district as effectively as if a bilateral contract had been then signed, for there was nothing it could do thereafter to retract or revoke. The acceptance which would convert this irrevocable offer into a contract, binding on both sides, was wholly in the power of the offeree. The district's hands were tied for 15 days without the offeree being bound in that interval, but such is the nature of an offer for which a consideration is paid. When, therefore, on the last day of the option period, the offeree accepted, the contract automatically came into existence.

There is nothing in the option of the 3d, or the modifying letter of the 4th, to show—or even to hint or suggest—that a resale was contemplated by Wellock to Rice and Greisen, or anybody else, and there was no oral testimony to that effect. From all that appears in the record, the officers of the district had no knowledge that Wellock had any resale in mind until, as alleged, the 7th, and as found by the court, the 14th, of April. By no possibility could the district have learned of the resale before the 6th, for the resale contract was not made until that day, as alleged by plaintiff. Whether the knowledge of the resale came to the district on the 7th, as alleged, or on the 14th, as found, can make no difference, for it certainly knew nothing about it on the 3d, when it bound itself irrevocably to sell.

Professor Williston in his work on Contracts, vol. 3, §§ 1356, 1357, in discussing the Hadley v. Baxendale rule and the basis for it, quotes the following from the decision in Globe Refining Co. v. Landa Cotton Oil Co., 190 U. S. 540, 543, 23 S. Ct. 754, 755, 47 L. Ed. 1171, where Justice Holmes says: "It is true that as people when contracting contemplate performance, not breach, they commonly say little or nothing as to what shall happen in the latter event, and the common rules have been worked out by common sense, which has established what the parties probably would have said if they had spoken about the matter. But a man never can be absolutely certain of performing any contract when the time of performance arrives, and in many cases he obviously is taking the risk of an event which is wholly or to an appreciable extent beyond his control. The extent of liability in such cases is likely to be within his contemplation, and whether it is or not, should be worked out on terms which it fairly may be presumed he would have assented to if they had been presented to his mind." (Italics ours.)

[4] We are satisfied that, before the defendant district can be charged with the plaintiff's resale profit, knowledge of such resale contract must be brought home to its officers before they bind the defendant. The district became bound, as indicated in the discussion above, not when the contract was technically concluded, on April 18, but when the irrevocable offer was made on April 3. The resale contract was not made until three days later, which would indicate that it was made because the irrevocable offer had been first definitely secured, and not that the offer was made with it in contemplation. When the facts in the instant case, particularly the time element, and the chronological order of events, are considered in the light of Justice Holmes' lucid exposition of the rule, can it be thought that the district would have bound itself (as it did on April 3) if its officers had known anything about a $60,000 resale contract?

In the case of Wallace v. Ah Sam, supra, the contract relied upon in the claim for consequential damages was made after the contract sued upon, just as the resale contract here was made after the District became bound. Commissioner Searls there says: "The rule adopted in the court below, if applied to contracts of this character, would tend largely to place it in the power of parties entitled to recover damages to regulate the amount of recovery to suit themselves." He adds: "We have no reason to believe that plaintiffs acted in bad faith in executing the leases specified in the record, and we only refer to the possibility of such conduct for the purpose of showing that the rule under which such a course may be pursued is inherently vicious." To the same general effect are the remarks of Justice Angellotti in the Hunt Bros. Case, supra, where, after discussing the rule of Hadley v. Baxendale, he says: "As has often been suggested by writers upon this subject, the remote effects of slight causes are so beyond all possible conception of the parties to a contract, both in character and extent, that any other rule would practically preclude the making of contracts altogether, for no sane person could be expected to assume such uncertain and limitless liability." Williston, at section 1357, says: "* * * No doubt notice subsequent to the formation of the contract though prior to the breach is insufficient. A suggestion was indeed made by Baron Bramwell that perhaps notice after the contract was made, and before breach, would be enough. This, however, has been rejected by later cases. * * * The true reason why notice to the defendant of the plaintiff's special circumstances is important is because just as a court of equity under circumstances of hardship arising after the formation of a contract may deny specific performance, so a court of law may deny damages for unusual consequences where the defendant was not aware when he entered into the contract how serious damage would flow from its breach."

[5] The respondent argues that when the directors of the district, at their meeting on April 21, "confirmed" the letters of April 3 and 4, they had knowledge of the resale contract, and that such knowledge is sufficient to satisfy the rule we have discussed. But we are satisfied that this is answered by the authorities cited herein. The contractual obligation of the district was settled and crystallized by its offer of April 3, for which it received a consideration, and a contract either was or was not concluded by its acceptance. The plaintiff's suit was brought upon the theory that it was. Anything that was done thereafter would not matter, as we see it. If the letters of April 3 and 4 had been disaffirmed, such action would not have unmade the contract; and, if once made, the "confirmation" of the 21st would not change or alter the contractual situation.

Respondent is not entitled under the evidence and pleadings to recover consequential damages, and the judgment is therefore modified by striking therefrom the sum of $10,000, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed; appellant to recover costs of this appeal.

PER CURIAM. Appellants in their petition for rehearing call our attention to the case of Jones v. Buck, 70 Cal. App. 368, 233 P. 82, which followed and adopted the rule announced in the case of Wolcott v. Hudner, 67 Cal. App. 704, 228 P. 46, holding that an appeal lies from an order relieving a party from default under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, for failure to present for settlement a bill of exceptions to be used on appeal within the time provided by the Codes; also to the fact that in 1915 the Code was amended to provide for bills of exception on appeals which are not used on motions for new trial; and also to the fact that the ruling in Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 675, 69 P. 497, relative to the relieving of a party from default on failure to present for settlement a statement on motion for new trial, is not applicable to circumstances such as were presented in the cases of Jones v. Buck and Wolcott v. Hudner, supra, which dealt only with the settlement of bills of exception to be used on appeal. While the language of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure would indicate that an appeal of the character involved in this action would lie, yet the question has been definitely settled contrary to the appellants' contention by the case of Lake v. Harris, 198 Cal. 85, 243 P. 417, and the two cases decided by the District Court of Appeal above referred to can no longer be considered as authority upon the right of a party to appeal from an order relieving one under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure from presenting, within the time allowed by law, a bill of exceptions to be used upon appeal.

The petition for rehearing is therefore denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by John E. Callahan and another against George Harm, F. M. Hodge, and others, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the San Joaquin Valley Transportation Company, and another. From the judgment, plaintiffs and defendant Transportation Company appeal. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, and Lasher B. Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Peckinpah & Carter, David E. Peckinpah, and F. W. Docker, all of Fresno, and Frank J. Creede and W. J. O'Connor, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. This is an action for personal injuries. The cause was tried with a jury and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants F. M. Hodge, John Kwis, and H. S. Rose, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of San Joaquin Valley Transportation Company, and against the defendant W. B. Lott in the sum of $4,500. The jury also returned a verdict in favor of the defendant George Harm. The transportation company made a motion for a nonsuit, which was denied. It also made a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, which was denied, and judgment was thereupon entered in conformity with the verdict. The transportation company appeals from said judgment in so far as it affects them. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment in favor of the defendant Harm. Both appeals are before the court upon one record and will be considered together. The appellant transportation company presents four grounds of alleged prejudicial error which may be considered together. The first of these is that the evidence fails to disclose any negligence on the part of the defendants. Second, even conceding that there is evidence of negligence, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Third, the court erred in denying its motion for a nonsuit, and, fourth, in refusing to enter judgment in favor of the appellant notwithstanding the verdict.

A proper consideration of these objections requires a statement of the evidence. The record discloses that on the 1st day of July, 1925, the plaintiff John E. Callahan was an employee of the Edward A. Soule Company in Fresno; that said company was engaged in the business of furnishing to the general public structural iron; that the defendant George Harm was engaged in the general trucking business in the city of Fresno; that Hodge, Kwis, and Rose were copartners engaged in the business of hauling freight from Fresno to other points in the San Joaquin Valley and were operating said business under the fictitious name of San Joaquin Valley Transportation Company. They will be hereinafter referred to as the transportation company. The defendant H. B. Lott was the driver of a motortruck belonging to the defendant Harm. That defendant Harm employed and paid the wages of defendant Lott to operate said truck; that Harm had a contract with the transportation company by which the truck in question with the driver Lott was rented to the transportation company for hauling freight for the latter within the city limits of Fresno; that they paid Harm the sum of $260 per month for the services of said truck and man. It was also the duty of Harm to furnish all the gasoline and oil for said truck and to keep the same in repair. The evidence also discloses that Lott received his orders from the defendant Rose; that the transportation company had an office in what is called the Union Terminal Depot in Fresno and that Lott had a box in said office, where orders were placed for him by Rose instructing him where to go and get freight. On the morning of July 1, 1925, Lott found an order in his box to go to the place of business of the Edward L. Soule Company and haul some structural iron to the Union Terminal Depot for shipment to Bakersfield over the line of the transportation company. Lott took a trailer belonging to the transportation company and hooked it to the rear of the truck belonging to Harm and thus equipped went to the place of business of the Soule Company. Upon his arrival there he stopped his truck on the opposite side of the street from the entrance door of the shed of the Soule Company where the structural iron was to be loaded onto the trailer. He thereupon detached the trailer from the truck and proceeded to back it by hand across the street to the entrance of the shed. The street was level. The trailer weighed about three tons and was not equipped with brakes. When Lott had succeeded in pushing the trailer to the entrance of the door of the shed, he called upon a man by the name of Lang and the plaintiff Callahan, both of whom were in the employ of the Soule Company, to help him lower the trailer down a concrete incline to the floor of the Soule shed. Previous to Lott's calling upon the plaintiff Callahan and Lang to help him both men had been directed by the manager of the Soule Company to help load the iron. When Lang and Callahan appeared, Lott ordered Callahan to pick up a board which was lying near and block the wheel of the trailer. Callahan thereupon picked up the board, went to the rear of the trailer, and with the aid of the board under the rear wheel attempted to block the trailer. He held the board, which was about six or eight feet long, under the rear wheel at an angle of about 45 degrees. Lott then took Lang to the front of the trailer and together they pushed it over the entrance and down the incline leading to the floor of the shed. Neither Lang nor Lott could see Callahan when he was at the rear of the trailer nor could Callahan see them. As long as the front wheels of the trailer were on the level with the street there appeared to be no trouble in the descent of the trailer into the shed, but as soon as Lang and Lott pushed the front wheels from the street onto the incline the trailer began to gather momentum and Lott and Lang were holding back on it. At this juncture plaintiff Callahan called to Lang and Lott "to hold her." Both men immediately let go of the trailer, went to the rear, and found plaintiff Callahan on the ground with the board across his leg and the trailer on the board. It further appears that Lott was an experienced driver. He had been engaged in the business of driving and handling trucks and trailers for a period of seven or eight years and was familiar with the handling of both of them. The plaintiff had had no experience whatever. The trailer weighed about three tons and was not equipped with brakes. These facts were known to Lott and unknown to Callahan.

The evidence further discloses that the plaintiff was seriously injured, and as there is no question raised as to the amount of damage awarded it becomes unnecessary to set forth the evidence relating to the nature and character of the injury.

It is claimed by said appellant that under this evidence there was no justification for the implied finding of the jury that the defendant Lott was negligent, but if such a holding is possible the evidence also shows that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and therefore in either event plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict.

[1] In the determination of this question it must be borne in mind that this court is not sitting as a jury; its only function is to determine whether there is substantial evidence to support the verdict. If so, then the question must be determined adversely to the appellant. Lott was familiar with trucks and trailers. He knew that this particular trailer weighed upwards of three tons and, further, that it was not equipped with brakes. He ordered the plaintiff to take the board and block the wheel. Thereafter, without further inquiry or investigation and at a point where he could not see plaintiff Callahan, he proceeded to roll the trailer down the incline and he and Lang began to hold it back. He said this was not difficult to do; that the trailer seemed to go down without trouble. He heard the plaintiff call to them to hold it, but instead of holding it both Lott and Lang let go of the trailer and went to the rear, where they found plaintiff on the ground with the board on his leg and the trailer on it. As illuminative of the attitude of the jury on the question of negligence, in addition to the general verdict, they answered certain interrogatories, one of which was: "Q. What act or acts did Lott do in connection with the management of the trailer that you found to be negligence? A. Lower the trailer down the incline without sufficient help or equipment." This answer we believe covers Lott's knowledge of the trailer, its lack of brakes, and implied gross carelessness in ordering one who the evidence shows had no knowledge of these things to take a position of danger in lowering the trailer. We are of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict of the jury.

[2] We are also of the opinion that the claim of said appellant that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence is not sustained by the evidence. Defendant Lott was in charge of the work of lowering the trailer. He ordered the plaintiff to take the board and block the wheels, and as heretofore stated plaintiff was unfamiliar with the handling of the trailer, and his conduct under such circumstances did not in itself constitute contributory negligence.

[3] There being sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, the court was also right in denying the motion for a nonsuit and denying the motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict. The authorities cited by appellant, Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 P. 38; Depons v. Ariss, 182 Cal. 485, 188 P. 797; Hagenah v. Bidwell, 46 Cal. App. 556, 189 P. 799, are authority upon the point that negligence is not presumed from the mere fact of injury, but are not applicable to the facts of this case.

[4] It is next claimed by said appellant that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that Lott was the servant of the transportation company. A brief epitome of the evidence on this subject shows that defendant Harm was in the truck business in Fresno; that he hired the truck and driver to the transportation company by the month and at a monthly rental of $260. Harm furnished the gasoline and oil and kept the truck in repair and also paid Lott his wages. The truck and driver were turned over to the transportation company, and Lott received his orders from defendant Rose, one of the members of the transportation company. Lott had an office with the transportation company and his orders were placed by Rose in a certain pigeonhole in a desk in that office. Harm gave no instructions whatever to Lott. On the day of the accident Lott took an order from the pigeonhole instructing him to go to Soule & Company's place of business and haul some structural iron to the transportation company depot for shipping over its line to Bakersfield. Lott took a trailer belonging to the transportation company, attached it to the Harm truck, and drove to the Soule place and proceeded to get ready to load some iron on the trailer preparatory to taking it to the depot of the Transportation Company. All of the foregoing acts were done in carrying out the order of Rose and solely in connection with the business of the transportation company. Defendant Harm was in no way interested in the transaction, except to the extent of his monthly remuneration. He had no control or direction over the defendant Lott in carrying out the business of the transportation company. Under similar circumstances it has been held that the general employer was not responsible for the negligence of his employee, but that such responsibility rested on the special employer, and we therefore hold that the implied finding of the jury that Lott was a servant of the transportation company is amply sustained by the evidence. We believe the case of Pruitt v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 189 Cal. 459, 209 P. 31, is in point. It was there held that an award against the owner of a motor truck for the death of the driver while the truck and driver were under hire by a third party was unjustified in the absence of any evidence that the owner exercised the slightest degree of control over the driver in connection with the employment by the third party. This doctrine is also laid down in Stacey Bros. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 197 Cal. 164, 239 P. 1072; Famous Players Lasky Corp. et al. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 194 Cal. 134, 228 P. 5, 34 A. L. R. 765; Ind. Indemnity Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 757. The cases cited by appellant are distinguishable from the case at bar. In Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 P. 721, cited by appellant, one Stevens, who was engaged in the business of "teaming and grading," offered to furnish for a compensation of $6 per day teams and drivers to a contractor engaged in performing work for the city and county of San Francisco in connection with its municipal railway line. Thereafter Stevens was notified by the contractor that he required a team. One was furnished, Stevens driving it himself. About a week later he furnished another team and driver for $6 per day, employing the driver himself and paying him $3 per day. Stevens was injured and demanded compensation. The industrial accident commission found that Stevens was an employee of the contractor. After examining the evidence the Supreme Court annulled the award and held that under the evidence the power possessed by the foreman of the railway contractor over Stevens was not such control of Stevens as to make his status that of an employee. In Billig v. Southern Pacific Co., 189 Cal. 477, 209 P. 241, also cited by appellant, it was held that the hirer of a truck and driver who was a general employer was liable for the negligence of his employee where the evidence showed without conflict that such employer never relinquished the right of control of the driver and truck while it was en route between given points hauling gasoline for the special employer when the accident occurred, and in addition that the general employer alone had authority to discharge the driver. In the case at bar the truck and driver were engaged solely in the work of the transportation company and the driver was acting entirely under the direction of Rose, one of the members of the transportation company, and, further, at the time of the accident Lott, the driver, was using a trailer belonging to the company and not the truck belonging to the defendant Harm.

Without further comment on the authorities cited, we are satisfied that Lott was the special employee of the transportation company and as such the transportation company was liable for Lott's negligence and not Harm.

[5] It is next claimed that plaintiff was a volunteer so far as the transportation company was concerned and that it owed him no duty except not to willfully injure him. In support of this claim counsel have cited Giannini v. Campodonico, 176 Cal. 548, 169 P. 80. In that case it was held that a stableman performing only menial duties had no implied authority to delegate his work or engage another to assist him and his request to a boy of 14 years to clean the stable could not impose any additional duties on the owner. But we are of the opinion that Fike v. San Joaquin Light, etc., Corp., 73 Cal. App. 712, 239 P. 344, states the rule applicable to the facts of the case at bar. In that case Fike, the deceased, was an employee of the Valley Ice Company engaged in general work around the plant. The defendant had high-power electric wires on the roof of the building occupied by the Valley Ice Company. The roof needed patching because of some holes which had been drilled in the roof by the defendant in the course of arranging its electrical equipment on the roof of said building. Nichols, the foreman of the defendant, requested Whitney, the foreman of the ice company, to have these holes closed up, which Whitney agreed he would have done. Whitney thereupon sent Fike to the roof to do the work. Fike went upon the roof to perform this service, came in contact with a live wire, and was killed. It was held in response to the same plea here made that the power company was liable for Fike's death.

In the case at bar Callahan was directed by his own foreman to assist in loading the trailer. When Lott, the employee of the transportation company, arrived on the scene, he directed Callahan to help him lower the trailer and told him just how to do it and in following these orders Callahan was injured. We think, under the circumstances, Callahan was not a volunteer under the holding in the case last cited, and the point is not well taken.

[6] It is contended by the transportation company that Lott, Lang, and Callahan were engaged in a joint enterprise, and under such circumstances even though Lott was negligent in the management, operation, and control of the trailer, his negligence is imputed to the plaintiff because plaintiff was actively and physically participating in the lowering of the trailer, the very act which resulted in his injury. As we understand, the rule on this subject is concisely stated in 20 Ruling Case Law, § 122, p. 149, where it is said: "If two or more persons unite in the joint prosecution of a common purpose under such circumstances that each has authority, express or implied, to act for or in respect to the control of the means or agencies employed to execute such common purpose, the negligence of the one in the management thereof is imputed to the others." This rule is cited with approval in Curran v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., 77 Cal. App. 462, 247 P. 236. While it is true as asserted by appellant that Callahan participated in lowering the trailer, he was acting under the direct order of Lott, the agent of appellant, and he had no right whatever to direct the movements of Lott or Lang with respect thereto. The point is not well taken.

[7] The next objection to the judgment may be stated in the language of the appellant transportation company, as follows: "If Lott was a servant of Hodge, Kwis and Rose and authorized to request and arrange for the assistance of Callahan, then Callahan became the special employee of the partnership and sole remedy is compensation." We are of the opinion that the claim is answered by the case of Murray v. Dwight, 161 N. Y. 301, 55 N. E. 901, 48 L. R. A. 673, where the same claim was made. In that case the servant of the truckman had been sent with a horse of his master to the warehouse to use the horse in operating a derrick for hoisting goods under the direction of the foreman for the warehouseman and was injured through the negligence of the warehouseman's employees. It was contended that the truckman's servant became the fellow servant of the employees of the warehouseman and was thus barred from recovering, but it was held that he was not a fellow servant. We think the same rule applies to the relation of Callahan to the transportation company. He was not a fellow servant of Lott and therefore would not be entitled to compensation as claimed by the appellant.

[8] Appellant contends that the special findings of the jury and their general verdict are in conflict. The special findings referred to are: "What act or acts did Lott do in connection with the management of the trailer that you found to be negligence? Answer. Lowering the trailer down the incline without sufficient help or equipment. (2) Was there any danger which was apparent to a person using ordinary care for his safety in or about the lowering of the trailer into the shed? * * * Answer. No." If we have correctly construed the effect of the evidence in this case on the question of negligence, then there is no inconsistency between said special findings and the general verdict of the jury.

[9] One further point requires consideration. It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to give a certain instruction offered by the defendant transportation company. This instruction deals with the liability of a general employer where he has rented an instrumentality along with the personal services of his employee. But when this accident occurred the instrumentality being used by Lott belonged to the transportation company and not to Harm, the general employer. The instruction was therefore not applicable to the facts of the case. What we have heretofore said applies with equal force to the appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment in favor of defendant Harm.

No good reason has been shown why the judgment should be disturbed, and it is therefore affirmed.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

FARBER v. GREENBERG. (Civ. 3751.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 7, 1929.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑150(1)—Landlord is under no common-law duty to tenant to make repairs, in absence of fraud, concealment, or express covenant, and landlord is not liable for damages from defective condition of premises.

At common law in the absence of fraud, concealment, or express covenant in the lease, there is no duty owing from the landlord to the tenant to make repairs, and landlord is not liable to tenant for damages resulting from defective condition of leased premises.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑106, 150(5)—Tenant on landlord's failure to repair may vacate premises or make repairs himself at landlord's expense after notice (Civ. Code, §§ 1941, 1942).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1941, 1942, requiring lessor of building intended for human occupation to put it in fit condition and repair subsequent delapidations, tenant may, in case of landlord's failure to repair, treat lease as breached and vacate premises or make repairs himself at the landlord's expense after notice to the landlord.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑177½—Lessee's assignee held not entitled to damages from lessor's grantee for forced eviction from leased apartment house by health authorities, where lease contained no covenant relating to repairs or warranty of fitness of premises for habitation.

Assignee of lessee of apartment house held not entitled to recover damages from lessor's grantee for forced eviction by city and governmental authorities under notice requiring vacation of premises as unfit for human habitation, where lease contained no express or implied warranty requiring landlord to put premises in fit condition or repair subsequent delapidations and there was no covenant relating to repairs and no fraud or concealment on the part of the lessor.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑177½—Lessor's agreement to complete repairs so as to insure occupancy when inside painting was completed held not to support action by lessee's assignee against lessor's grantee for damages for eviction by health authorities.

Agreement of lessor to complete repairs so as to insure occupancy of leased apartment house when inside painting was completed did not impose obligation upon lessor to make leased premises fit for human occupancy or to repair subsequent delapidations rendering premises untenable, so as to support cause of action by assignee of lessee against lessor's grantee for damages for forced eviction by city and governmental health authorities.

5. Landlord and tenant 🔑177½—Assignee of apartment house lease held not entitled to damages against lessor's grantee under statute for eviction by health authorities (Civ. Code, §§ 1941, 1942).

Assignee of lessee held not entitled to recover damages against lessor's grantor for forced eviction from apartment house by governmental and city health authorities, under Civ. Code, § 1941, requiring lessor to put building intended for occupation of human beings in fit condition for such occupation and repair subsequent delapidations rendering it untenable, where no notice to repair was given to original lessor or defendant as required by section 1942, and where there was no showing that any repairs were actually made or money expended in putting premises in tenable condition.

6. Landlord and tenant 🔑150(5)—Notice to repair must be given lessor or his assignee before lessee can recover for putting premises in tenantable condition (Civ. Code, §§ 1941, 1942).

Notice to repair must be given original lessor or his assignee before lessee can recover from lessor or his assignee expense of putting premises in condition fit for occupancy, under Civ. Code, §§ 1941, 1942.

7. Landlord and tenant 🔑152(6)—Lessor's grantee was not liable for breach of covenant to make repairs, where breach occurred before grantee acquired interest in premises (Civ. Code, § 1466).

If lease contained covenant to make repairs which ran with the land, lessor's grantee was not liable in damages for breach thereof resulting in eviction from apartment house under order of city and governmental health authorities, where grantee acquired no interest in property until long after the breach had occurred under Civ. Code, § 1466.

8. Landlord and tenant 🔑79(2)—There is no privity of contract between assignee of lease and landlord.

In absence of fresh contractual stipulations, there is no privity of contract between the assignee of the lease and the landlord.

9. Landlord and tenant 🔑152(8)—Lessor's grantee is under no duty to assignee of lessee to repair.

Grantee of lessor is under no duty to assignee of lessee to repair leased premises, since there is no privity of contract between them, but only privity of estate.

10. Appeal and error 🔑681—Reversal will not be granted for refusal to permit amendment of complaint, where record fails to show changes desired or that such changes were made known to trial court.

Reversal will not be granted for trial court's refusal to permit amendment of complaint, where record fails to show in what manner plaintiff desired to amend or that plaintiff disclosed to trial court nature of proposed amendments.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Israel I. Farber against A. L. Greenberg. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lissner, Roth & Gunter and Loewenthal, Lissner, Roth & Gunter, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John E. Biby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from defendant for being evicted by governmental authority from an apartment house occupied by him under a written lease, executed by defendant's predecessor in ownership.

The complaint is in two causes of action. A general demurrer was interposed to each cause of action upon the ground that said complaint, and each cause of action therein set forth, did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendant. The trail court sustained the demurrer to both causes of action and refused to allow plaintiff to amend, and rendered judgment for defendant. From this judgment the plaintiff, Israel I. Farber, prosecutes this appeal upon the judgment roll.

The first cause of action is based upon the following facts, which are set forth in the complaint: On July 5, 1919, one Isaac Burkhart was the owner of an apartment house situate in the city of Los Angeles, at 802, 804, 804½ and 806 Temple street, consisting of six apartments and twelve single rooms, with a cottage in the rear. On the said 5th day of July, 1919, Isaac Burkhart leased and let said apartment house and cottage to Emerson Turner. Said lease is in writing and, after omitting the formal parts, signatures and acknowledgments, is as follows: "That said party of the first part (Isaac Burkhart) hereby leases and demises unto the said party of the second part (Emerson Turner) that certain apartment house situated * * * together with the appurtenances of the same, for the term of ten (10) years beginning the 1st day of August, 1919, and expiring on the 31st day of July, 1929. The rent to be paid during the term of this lease is the sum of fifty-five ($55.00) dollars per month, payable in advance on the first day of each and every month. It is understood and agreed by both parties that in consideration of the first two months' rent, the said party of the second part is to paint and paper or calcimine the entire upper part of building at 804½ Temple Street, and the entire outside front of building, also rear porch floors and stairways, using good material, and in a workmanlike manner. It is also understood and agreed that the party of the first part is to pay one-half of water bill during the term of this lease, but party of second part is to see that faucets and toilets are kept in good repair at all times. It is also understood and agreed that the party of the second part shall have entire control of said apartment house and cottage in the rear during entire term of this lease. It is further understood and agreed, that the party of the first part is to complete in a reasonable time all new work and repairs, in a satisfactory manner, so as to insure occupancy of said apartment house when inside painting is completed. In the event the premises are destroyed by fire or the elements, the party of the second part will be relieved from paying further rent, and this lease will be considered terminated. Second party to keep house and yard clean. * * *"

The said lessee, Emerson Turner, after the execution of said lease, complied with all the terms, covenants, and conditions thereof and entered into possession of the leased premises and continued in possession under said lease until August 30, 1921, at which time he sold and transferred all his right, title, and interest in and to said lease to Israel I. Farber, the plaintiff and appellant herein. Appellant immediately went into possession of said leased premises, and continued in possession under and by virtue of said lease and assignment until on or about March 1, 1926. On October 1, 1923, said Isaac Burkhart, the lessor in said lease, sold the property leased to A. L. Greenberg, the defendant and respondent herein. The complaint, with reference to this purchase, alleges: "That thereafter, on or about the 1st day of October, 1923, prior to the commencement of this action, said Isaac Burkhart, lessor in said apartment house lease, sold the property leased and demised, and more particularly described in said apartment house lease, to A. L. Greenberg, defendant herein, subordinated to said apartment house lease, and said A. L. Greenberg purchased said property subordinated to said apartment house lease, and with notice of all its terms, covenants, conditions and stipulations, and did assume the same; that since said transfer from Isaac Burkhart to A. L. Greenberg, as aforesaid, said defendant Greenberg has been, and is now, the owner of said premises and all lessor's rights in said apartment house lease, and subject to, and responsible for, the full performance of all of lessor's covenants, stipulations and conditions therein contained."

During all the time that appellant was in possession of said premises, he kept and performed all of the terms and conditions of said lease and was at no time in default.

On February 3, 1926, the following notice was posted on said leased premises, to wit:

"Department of Health

"City of Los Angeles

"Notice

"Be it known to all parties concerned, that the building located at and known as No. 802–804 and 806 West Temple Street, situated in the City of Los Angeles, State of California, is hereby declared unfit for human habitation by reason of ordinance 50282 and is hereby ordered vacated within ten days from date hereof.

"This order is issued in accordance with the provisions of section 70 of Ordinance 30619 (N. S.) of the City of Los Angeles.

"George Parrish, M. D.
"Health Commissioner
"Dated February 3, 1926.
"By Ernest E. Huber."

On or about said 3d day of February, 1926, the duly authorized agent of the government of the city of Los Angeles and of the United States of America ordered and required appellant to give up and quit possession of said leased premises for the reason that said premises were not fit for human habitation, and pursuant to the order, and by direction of said governmental authorities of the city of Los Angeles and the United States of America, said appellant was forced to and compelled, and did, on or about March 1, 1926, vacate said leased premises. Appellant has not had the possession, use, or occupation of said premises since March 1, 1926, and pursuant to the order of said governmental authorities, said leased premises were, prior to the commencement of this action, destroyed and demolished.

Said complaint also contains this allegation:

"That at the time the said apartment house lease was made and executed, as aforesaid, the premises therein demised were and continued to be from the date of the execution of said lease until on or about March 1st, 1926, and were on or about February 3, 1926, the day on which said notice which is attached hereto and marked Exhibit 'B', was posted on said premises, unfit for human habitation, because of defects in the drainage, plumbing, ventilation and construction of the same, and specifically that because of said defects in the drainage, plumbing, ventilation and construction of said premises, said premises, and the whole thereof, did, on or about the date said lease was executed, as aforesaid, constitute and did continue to constitute from said date to on or about March 1st, 1926, and were on or about February 3, 1926, a rat harborage and a nuisance.

"That the ordinances referred to in said notice * * * entitled 'An ordinance providing sanitary regulations for the protection of the public health in the City of Los Angeles, and particularly to prevent the propagation and spread of bubonic plague through the medium of rats,' and Ordinance Number 30619 (New Series), entitled, 'An ordinance providing health, sanitary and quarantine regulations;' that each of said ordinances were duly enacted and ordained by the mayor and council of the City of Los Angeles, State of California. * * *"

The complaint further alleges that by reason of the facts alleged, plaintiff has been deprived of the possession, use, and occupation of said leased premises since March 1, 1926, without fault on his part and has sustained damages in the total sum of $10,250, etc.

Appellant makes this contention: "That section 1941 of the Civil Code reads into every contract made by a lessor, who has premises to demise which are expected to be occupied by human beings, the express warranty that such premises are at the time of their demise, in a condition fit to be used for that purpose." It must be remembered that defendant and respondent did not execute the lease in question, but that he is the grantee of Isaac Burkhart, the original lessor. However, for the purpose of the present discussion, we will assume that the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to bring respondent into the exact position of the original lessor.

[1] The rule is well settled that at common law, in the absence of fraud, concealment, or an express covenant in the lease, there was no duty owing from the landlord to the tenant to make repairs, and consequently no liability was incurred by the landlord to the tenant arising from the defective condition of the leased premises. Priver v. Young, 62 Cal. App. 405, 216 P. 966; Brewster v. De Fremery, 33 Cal. 341; Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 565; Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173, 18 P. 260; Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58, 22 P. 304; Daley v. Quick, 99 Cal. 181, 33 P. 859; Grazer v. Flanagan, 35 Cal. App. 724, 170 P. 1076; Callahan v. Loughran, 102 Cal. 476, 36 P. 835; Gately v. Campbell, 124 Cal. 520, 57 P. 567; DeMotte v. Arkell, 77 Cal. App. 610, 247 P. 254; Carty v. Blauth, 169 Cal. 713, 147 P. 949; 15 Cal. Jur. 704; Smelzer [Smelser] v. Kirche (Cal. App.) 263 P. 838; Nelson v. Myers (Cal. App.) 270 P. 719.

In Grazer v. Flanagan, supra, the court said: "At the common law a lessor is not liable to make repairs to a structure rented as a dwelling-house unless by force of an express contract or covenant; the tenant takes the premises for better or worse, and cannot involve the landlord in expense for repairs without his consent."

In Gately v. Campbell, supra, the Supreme Court, in discussing a similar question, thus states the law: "The controlling question left in this case is whether or not the landlord, in the absence of fraud, concealment, or covenant in the lease, is liable to the tenant for an injury suffered by him during his occupancy by reason of the defective condition or faulty construction of the leased premises. At the common law the lessor is not liable for such injury. (Keates v. Earl of Cadogan, 10 Com. B. 591; Howard v. Doolittle [10 N. Y. Super. Ct.] 3 Duer, 464; Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, secs. 175a, 382.) And, this court has often laid down the same rule. (Brewster v. De Fremery, 33 Cal. 341; Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 565; Sieber v. Blanc, 76 Cal. 173 [18 P. 260]; Wilson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58 [22 P. 304]; Daley v. Quick, 99 Cal. 181 [33 P. 859].)"

Robinson v. Leighton, 122 Me. 309, 119 A. 809, 30 A. L. R. 1386, was a case involving liability between landlord and tenant, and the rule is similarly stated as follows: "A rule similar to that of caveat emptor applying, it certainly may be defined as a general proposition applicable to premises actually let, that the lessor, in his relation to the lessee, does not warrant their condition, and that he is not liable for any injury suffered by the tenant during his occupancy by reason of defects. There must be proof of exceptional circumstances to make the landlord liable in such cases; some proof of fraud or misrepresentation, or direct concealment of a fact known to the lessor, which the lessee did not have any reasonable opportunity of discovering. There must be proof of some direct omission by the lessor of the performance of a duty which he owed to the lessee, in order to make the landlord liable. Libbey v. Tolford, 48 Me. 316, 77 Am. Dec. 229; McKenzie v. Cheetham, 83 Me. 543, 22 A. 469; Whitmore v. Orono P. & P. Co., 91 Me. 297, 39 A. 1032, 40 L. R. A. 377, 64 Am. St. Rep. 229; Bennett v. Sullivan, 100 Me. 118, 60 A. 886, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 108; Hill v. Day, 108 Me. 467, 81 A. 581, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 971."

[2, 3] In the case at bar no fraud or concealment is alleged; neither is there any express covenant in the lease that the lessor should place the leased premises in a fit condition to be occupied by human beings, or that the lessor should make or keep the premises in repair. Therefore, the right of appellant to any relief in damages against the lessor, by reason of the defective condition of the leased premises at the time the lease was executed, or at the time of the eviction, is purely statutory and such right must be measured solely by the provisions of the statute. 15 Cal. Jur. p. 704, and authorities above cited.

Section 1941 of the Civil Code provides that the lessor of a building intended for the occupation of human beings must, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, put it in a condition fit for such occupation, and repair all subsequent dilapidations thereof which render it untenable. Section 1942 of the same Code gives the option to the tenant, after notice to the landlord, to make repairs not requiring an expenditure of more than one month's rent, the same to be deducted from the rent, or to vacate the premises and be discharged from performance of the conditions of the lease.

In the absence of an express contract relating to repairs, sections 1941 and 1942 control; and in such case it is held that the statutory liability of the lessor declared in section 1941 is limited by the provisions of section 1942, so that for failure to repair, the lessee has either one of two remedies, viz.: (a) Treat the failure to repair as a breach of the lease and vacate the premises; (b) himself make the repairs at the expense of the landlord, after notice to him, provided they do not entail an expenditure of more than one month's rent. Van Every v. Ogg, supra; Grazer v. Flanagan, supra, Priver v. Young, supra; Gately v. Campbell, supra.

Therefore, in the case at bar it seems clear that no warranty exists, either express or implied, requiring the landlord to put the premises in a fit condition for human habitation, or repair subsequent dilapidations which make the premises unfit for human habitation; and the lease containing no express covenant relating to repairs, and no fraud or concealment by the lessor being alleged, the complaint fails to state a cause of action.

[4] For a second and distinct cause of action plaintiff, after repeating all of the allegations of the first cause of action, alleges: "That at the time said apartment house lease was executed, lessor therein expressly warranted to lessee that said premises, and the whole thereof, would be so improved and repaired as to insure to said lessee the occupancy of said premises and the whole thereof, from the beginning of the term of said apartment house lease to the end of the term thereof. That said express warranty is incorporated in said apartment house lease and is in words and figures as follows, to wit: 'It is further understood and agreed that the party of the first part (lessor) is to complete, in a reasonable time, all new work and repairs in a satisfactory manner so as to insure the occupancy of said apartment house when inside painting is completed.'"

From this allegation appellant relies upon what he terms "expressed warranty contained in the lease itself." It is apparent that the language relied upon in the lease, and set forth in the complaint, relates to an agreement on the part of the original lessor to do certain things by the time the lessee had completed the inside painting, to the end that the lessee would not be delayed in taking actual possession, beyond the time required for him to do the inside painting. No claim is made that the respondent, or even the original lessor, breached this agreement.

We have already seen that there is no express or implied covenant in the lease imposing any obligation upon the lessor to make the demised premises fit for human occupancy; therefore, the second alleged cause of action is wholly insufficient.

[5, 6] It is also clear that neither of the alleged causes of action set forth in the complaint states a cause of action under sections 1941 and 1942 of the Civil Code, because there is no allegation in the complaint that any notice to repair was ever given by appellant, or the original tenant, to respondent or to the original lessor. Such notice must be given before a tenant can enforce the remedies provided by said sections 1941 and 1942. Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 307, 13 P. 866; Sieber v. Blanc, supra; Green v. Redding, 92 Cal. 548, 28 P. 599.

Furthermore, had the giving of notice been alleged, still the complaint would not state a cause of action based on said sections of the Civil Code, for the reason it is not alleged that any repairs were actually made or money expended in putting the premises in tenable condition, nor does appellant ask reimbursement for any money expended.

The whole theory of appellant's complaint is based on the contention that he was ousted from possession of the leased premises through a breach of duty imposed upon respondent.

[7] The respondent makes this contention: "The complaint does not state a cause of action against respondent for the further reason that it appears therefrom that the breach relied upon by appellant occurred more than four years before respondent became the owner of the property."

We think this contention must be sustained. There is no express covenant in the lease to be performed by the lessor relating to any repairs, or imposing any obligation upon him to make the premises fit for human habitation, except the one above mentioned, and that covenant shows upon its face that it was to be performed at once; but if we assume there was such a covenant by the original lessor, and such covenant was one running with the land, still, no obligation for the breach thereof was imposed upon respondent because the breach alleged occurred long before respondent acquired any estate in the demised property.

Section 1466 of the Civil Code provides: "No one, merely by reason of having acquired an estate subject to a covenant running with the land, is liable for a breach of the covenant before he acquired the estate, or after he has parted with it or ceased to enjoy its benefits." Gardner v. Samuels, 116 Cal. 84, 47 P. 935, 58 Am. St. Rep. 135; Bailey v. Richardson, 66 Cal. 416, 5 P. 910; Handleman v. Pickerill, 84 Cal. App. 218, 257 P. 890.

[8, 9] Furthermore, the law is also well settled that, in the absence of fresh contractual stipulations, there is no privity of contract between the assignee of the lessee and the landlord. Bonetti v. Treat, 91 Cal. 223, 27 P. 612, 14 L. R. A. 151; 15 Cal. Jur. p. 753; Realty & Rebuilding Co. v. Rea, 184 Cal. 569, 194 P. 1024. No such stipulations are alleged in the complaint. Therefore, under the allegations of the complaint in this case, there could be no privity of contract between appellant, who is the assignee of the lessee, and respondent, who is the grantee of the lessor. Privity of estate only exists between them, and this relation alone would impose no duty upon respondent to repair the leased premises for appellant.

It follows from what has been said that we are of the opinion that neither count of the complaint states a cause of action against respondent.

[10] Appellant also complains that the trial court abused its discretion in denying him the right to amend. The record does not show in what manner appellant desired to amend—what changes or additions he proposed to make to his complaint. There is nothing in the record to indicate that he specified in the trial court the nature of the proposed amendment or amendments. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that the court below abused its discretion in denying leave to amend. Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 252, 81 P. 516; Dukes v. Kellogg, 127 Cal. 563, 60 P. 44; Burling v. Newlands, 112 Cal. 476, 44 P. 810; Hansen v. Carr, 73 Cal. App. 518, 238 P. 1048; Lapique v. Walsh, 50 Cal. App. 86, 195 P. 296. Indeed, we are unable to perceive, if the facts alleged in the complaint be true, how appellant could amend his complaint to state a cause of action against respondent.

We think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

VAN NOY et ux. v. GOLDBERG et al.

(Civ. 3753.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1929.

1. Usury ⚷115—Parol evidence is admissible to show actual transaction on charge of usury (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757).

On charge of usury, under Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, parol evidence is admissible to show actual nature of transaction.

2. Usury ⚷117—Existence of usurious agreement must affirmatively appear from evidence (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757).

Existence of illegal agreement, in violation of Usury Law (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757), must of necessity appear affirmatively from evidence adduced on trial on charge of usury.

3. Usury ⚷113—Person challenging note as usurious had burden of showing note provides for usurious interest (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757).

Burden of showing that note provides for usurious interest is on him who challenges transaction as illegal under Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757.

4. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Appellate court will assume usurious agreement was not made, where evidence of usury was conflicting and judgment went for defendant (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757).

Where evidence, in action to set aside trust deed on ground that Usury Law (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757) was violated, was conflicting, and judgment went for defendant, District Court of Appeal will assume that no usurious agreement was made.

5. Bills and notes 🔑525—Mortgages 🔑270—Usury 🔑117—Evidence held not to show direct loan from defendant to plaintiff and execution of trust deed to dummy to avoid usury law, but sustained finding that plaintiff was bona fide purchaser (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757).

In action to set aside trustee's conveyance of real property on ground that trust deed was usurious, under Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, evidence held not to show that trust deed for $7,000 was made to dummy for purpose of avoiding usury laws, and that transaction was in effect loan of $6,300 from defendant with bonus of $700, but sustained finding that defendant was innocent purchaser of note secured by trust deed.

6. Usury 🔑6—Usury Act is intended to prevent excessive interest, and may not be used to perpetrate injustice (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757).

Usury Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757) is intended to prevent charge of excessive rate of interest, and may not be used as engine to perpetrate injustice.

7. Mortgages 🔑345—Sale under trust deed may be set aside when debt has not matured at time of alleged default.

Sale under trust deed may be set aside when it appears that debt had not matured at time of alleged default.

8. Bills and notes 🔑129(2)—Note may provide for payment in installments and authorize holder to declare entire amount due on default in installment of principal or interest.

Note may appropriately provide for payment of principal in installments and authorize holder thereof to declare entire amount due on default in payment of any installment of either principal or interest.

9. Usury 🔑42—Note at 8 per cent. providing for payments of principal in installments, and maturity at option of holder on default of payments of principal and interest, held not usurious (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757).

Note for $7,000 at 8 per cent. interest payable quarterly, and providing for payments of principal in installments of $100 or more monthly, and that on default in payment of installments of principal and interest entire unpaid portion might become due at option of holder, held not to provide for payment of illegal interest under Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757.

10. Usury 🔑76—Agreement to pay usurious interest does not vitiate entire note nor prevent recovery of principal at maturity (Deering Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757).

Agreement to pay usurious interest will not vitiate entire note nor prevent holder from recovering valid principal sum at time of its maturity under Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by A. Van Noy and wife against Ann Goldberg and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Leslie H. Kranz, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Pacht, Pelton & Warne, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in a suit to set aside a trustee's conveyance to real property which was executed upon foreclosure sale for default in the payments of principal and interest secured by a trust deed. The appellants contend that the trust deed was executed in violation of the California "Usury Law" (Deering's Gen. Laws of 1923, Act 3757, p. 1384), and therefore void.

The appellants were the owners of lot 3, block C of Kurtz and Bradshaw's subdivision of the Schumacher tract of Los Angeles, Cal., which was subject to a mortgage of $11,000, upon which lot they had constructed a four-family dwelling flat. The builder of this house was George J. Diebolt. After the completion of the dwelling considerable indebtedness remained unpaid for the security of which a number of mechanics' liens had been filed. To complete the financing of this structure, R. F. Boyles, the son-in-law of appellants, who held their power of attorney for that purpose, negotiated the execution by appellants of a subsequent note dated September 18, 1925, to George J. Diebolt, for $7,000 at 8 per cent. interest, payable quarterly, secured by a deed of trust on said premises. By the terms of this note the principal became payable in installments of $100 or more on the first day of each month beginning with November, 1925, and continuing to and including September 18, 1926, at which last-mentioned date the whole principal and interest became due. For default in the payment of any installments of principal or interest, the entire unpaid portion became due at the option of the holder. This note and trust deed were executed subject to the prior mortgage for $11,000. Default in the payment of any installment of principal or interest due upon this first mortgage lien authorized the holder, by the terms of the trust deed involved in this litigation, to pay such deferred installments, and, after demand for repayment thereof, to also declare this entire second note due on that account. This $7,000 note and trust deed were subsequently sold and assigned to the respondent, Ann Goldberg, by Mr. Boyles through a broker by the name of Leon Shevitz for the sum of $6,300, which was paid in cash to the Union Bank & Trust Company of Los Angeles, named in said deed as trustee.

Five payments of $100 each were subsequently made upon this note discharging the installments due thereon only to the first day of March, 1926. On the first day of August, 1926, appellants were in default of the payment of two quarterly installments of interest aggregating approximately $170; five $100 installments of principal, and about $800 delinquent payments due upon the first mortgage lien. The respondent, Goldberg, made a fruitless demand upon appellants for the payment of these sums. August 7, 1926, due notice of default and sale of the premises pursuant to the provisions of the trust deed was given and published. August 31, 1926, the property was sold to the respondent Goldberg and a trustee's deed of conveyance was executed and delivered to her September 2, 1926. This suit was then commenced September 22, 1926.

Appellants' theory of the transaction is that respondent Ann Goldberg agreed to loan them $6,300 at 8 per cent. interest, in consideration of an additional bonus of $700, which is represented by the difference between the face amount of the note and the actual cash paid; that the note and trust deed are therefore in violation of the Usury Act of California and void, or at least that the appellants were not in default for the reason that the $700 bonus should have been applied to the payment of the deferred installments of principal and interest, and that the foreclosure sale was therefore premature and void. Appellants' theory is expressed in their brief in the following language: "The transaction was a loan from respondent Ann Goldberg to appellants of the sum of $6300.00, negotiations for which were handled by agents of the respective parties, Leon Shevitz being the agent for Ann Goldberg and R. F. Boyles being the agent for appellents, and George J. Diebolt being a mere dummy; that the purpose of using a dummy was to avoid the usury laws of California."

The court, however, adopted specific findings against the appellants on each of these issues, and the evidence amply supports these findings to the effect that they did not borrow $6,300, or any other sum from the respondent Ann Goldberg; that the $7,000 note and trust deed were not executed at the request of said respondent, but that she was a subsequent innocent purchaser thereof for a valuable consideration; that it is not true that the said George J. Diebolt, the payee named in said note and trust deed, was a mere dummy or nominal beneficiary thereof, but that upon the contrary the appellants executed and delivered said instruments to him at his request for an adequate consideration; and that said beneficiary thereafter sold and assigned them to the respondent at a discount for the sum of $6,300; that said instruments were not executed in violation of the Usury Law of California; and that the appellants defaulted in the payments of both principal and interest on account of which the respondent as a bona fide holder thereof declared the entire indebtedness to be due, whereupon the trustee foreclosed and sold said equity to the respondent Ann Goldberg pursuant to the terms of the trust deed, she being the highest and only bidder therefor. Respecting the original sale of this note and trust deed Mr. Shevitz testified: "Mr. Levy * * * told me that he knew of a party that had a trust deed for $7000 that could be bought at a discount. * * * Mr. Boyles * * * explained that he sent him (Levy) to me in regard to that trust deed. He told me that he had built a four-flat building and had gotten heavily in debt and that in settlement with the contractor he had given the contractor a trust deed in payment for the building of the property. * * * The name of the contractor was Diebolt. * * * He told me that there were liens on the property; that he was being annoyed, as well as the contractor, and that * * * the contractor would have to sell the trust deed immediately. * * * One or two days after (this) * * * he took me over to * * * Mr. Diebolt * * * (who) verified the statements made by Mr. Boyles. * * * I had called Miss Goldberg and told her that there was a trust deed for sale on a four-flat building, * * * a $7000 trust deed, to be bought for $6300."

[1-6] It does not appear from the terms of the note or trust deed that there was an agreement to pay illegal interest which is prohibited by the Usury Law of California. Upon a charge of usury, however, parol evidence is admissible to show the actual nature of the transaction. 27 R. C. L. 212, § 13. The existence of such an illegal agreement must of necessity appear affirmatively from the evidence adduced at the trial. The burden of showing that a note provides for usurious interest is upon him who challenges the transaction as illegal. 27 R. C. L. 268, § 71. Since the evidence upon this subject is conflicting, this court will be required to assume that no such agreement was made. The appellants' theory of the transaction is supported only by the testimony of their own attorney in fact and son-in-law, Mr. Boyles, and his contractor, Diebolt. It is a significant fact that neither of the appellants was called as a witness to deny the respondent's assertion that she was a bona fide purchaser of the note for the sum of $6,300. The trial court evidently assumed that a conspiracy may have existed between the makers of the note and their son-in-law and his contractor to finance the troublesome indebtedness for construction of the dwelling by the execution and sale of a promissory note, and to then attempt to defeat it by a claim of usury. At least the circumstances indicating this situation are suspiciously unfortunate. The Usury Act is intended to prevent the charge of an excessive rate of interest, and may not be used as an engine to perpetrate an injustice. Haines v. Commercial Mtg. Co., 200 Cal. 609, 621, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725.

[7] The appellants contend for a strict construction of the Usury Law, for the reason that the courts do not look with favor upon the harsh method of terminating the interest of a debtor in real property, by means of the foreclosure of a trust deed which reserves no right of redemption. Hodgkins v. Wright, 127 Cal. 688, 60 P. 431; More v. Calkins, 85 Cal. 177, 188, 24 P. 729, and 25 Cal. Jur. 83, § 67, are cited in support of this claim. A sale under a trust deed may be set aside when it appears that the debt had not matured at the time of the alleged default. Huene v. Cribb, 9 Cal. App. 141, 98 P. 78. The binding validity of trust deeds and their provisions for forfeiting the interest of a debtor for default in its payment have, however, been recognized by numerous California authorities. 25 Cal. Jur. 6, § 2.

[8-10] In the present case the default of the appellants for failure to pay both the installments of principal and interest was properly declared by the respondent. A promissory note, by its terms, may appropriately provide for the payment of the principal in installments, and authorize the holder thereof to declare the entire amount due upon default in the payment of any installment of either principal or interest. Haines v. Commercial Mtg. Co., supra. There existed in neither the note nor any secret agreement on the part of respondent concerning the payment of the original loan any provision for the payment of illegal interest. This disposes of appellants' contention that the entire note is void for the reason that it provided for the payment of an illegal rate of interest. But even if this were true, an agreement to pay usurious interest will not vitiate the entire note, nor prevent the holder from recovering the valid principal sum at the time of its maturity. In Haines v. Commercial Mtg. Co., supra, at page 622 of 200 Cal. (255 P. 806), it is said: "Even a casual reading of the statute itself shows that the legislative intent was not to declare the whole contract void, but only the portion thereof relating to interest." Rice v. Dunlap (Cal. Sup.) 270 P. 199.

The alleged defect in the notice of foreclosure also depends upon appellants' contention that there existed an agreement to pay an illegal rate of interest. For the reasons heretofore assigned, this claim is also without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ann GOLDBERG, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. A. VAN NOY et al., Defendants; A. Van Noy, W. D. Van Noy, R. F. Boyles, and Mrs. R. F. Boyles, Defendants and Appellants. (Civ. 3754.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1929.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Leslie H. Kranz, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Pacht, Pelton & Warne, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This case was tried and determined on the same evidence which was presented in the case of A. Van Noy et al. v. Ann Goldberg et al., in which an opinion of this court was rendered and filed this day (see 277 P. 538, supra), and upon the determination of which this appeal depends. Both appeals affect the same real property. In that case a judgment upholding the validity of the foreclosure proceedings and the conveyance of the property to this respondent, Ann Goldberg, was affirmed. No new issues are raised on this appeal. It follows that this respondent is entitled to the possession of the property, together with damages awarded for the unlawful detention thereof.

Upon the authority of A. Van Noy et al. v. Ann Goldberg et al., supra, the judgment in this case is affirmed.

DOWNS v. ATKINSON. (L. A. 9516.) ★

Supreme Court of California. May 16, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 13, 1929.

Highways ⚷113(4)—Complaint on contract for construction of highway did not disclose fatal variance, in that proofs showed only part performance.

Complaint to recover for performance of contract for construction of highway, whereby plaintiff was to receive 10 per cent. of the net profits, held not to disclose fatal variance with proof, in that plaintiff did not perform all the work contemplated by the contract, where essence of performance under the contract required plaintiff to be ready and willing to perform such work at such place and in such capacity as the other contracting party should determine, and latter directed that plaintiff work part of time elsewhere, which was done, and plaintiff was at no time discharged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by Millson William Downs against Lulu Atkinson, as executrix of the estate of Lynn S. Atkinson, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James S. Jarrott and John T. Gose, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry W. Hanson and Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. The judgment is affirmed, and we justify this action as follows:

The suit is upon three disallowed claims against the estate of appellant's intestate. Plaintiff had judgment in the sum of $4,491.19, interest and costs. The attack by appeal is upon the judgment as a whole; hence it is not necessary to consider the items that make it up.

The basis of the suit is a contract dated March 29, 1921, between plaintiff and the decedent, wherein decedent agreed to pay plaintiff 10 per cent. of the net profits received from a contract held by him for the construction of a section of the California state highway between Mojave and the Los Angeles county line; this payment to be made to respondent upon the proviso that he give his "entire time to the work in such capacity" as decedent "shall determine and direct." A further proviso was that plaintiff should advance to decedent $5,000 without interest, said sum to be repaid him at the time of final cash settlement in full upon the completion of said public work. It was further agreed that plaintiff should be credited with $100 per month during the life of the road contract, the amount due to be paid upon final settlement, and, lastly, decedent agreed to pay respondent's expenses and to purchase his Ford automobile for the sum of $350, likewise payable upon final settlement of the contract.

The complaint, among other things, charged "that plaintiff complied with all and singular the provisions of said contract to be kept and performed by plaintiff, giving his entire time to the work contemplated by said contract as determined and directed by said Lynn S. Atkinson. * * *" The answer denied "that plaintiff complied with all the provisions of said contract to be kept or performed by him"; denied "that plaintiff gave his entire time to the work contemplated by said contract as determined and directed by said Lynn S. Atkinson"; but, on the contrary, defendant averred therein "that in compliance with said order (an order alleged to have been given by the state highway engineer), and by reason of plaintiff's incompetence, inefficiency, improper conduct and inability to perform his duties as aforesaid, and in order that said Lynn S. Atkinson might fulfill his said contract with the California Highway Commission, the said Lynn S. Atkinson did discharge plaintiff and relieve him from all duties in connection with said work on or about October 1st, 1921. Thereafter plaintiff performed no services whatsoever in connection therewith."

The court made findings supporting in all respects the above allegations of the complaint and against the general and special allegations above quoted from the answer. The evidence showed that fourteen months were required for completion of the work and plaintiff worked for only about the first six months upon this particular road work; decedent then directed him to go elsewhere to seek information as to other work and similar contracts for highway construction for the joint account of himself and decedent. The court specifically found that plaintiff was never discharged from his employment, but, on the contrary, was ready and willing at all times to obey and did obey the directions of decedent.

The whole contention for reversal is contained in appellant's assertion that the proofs are at variance with the allegations of the complaint. This, she says, arises because the complaint mainly counts upon full performance of the contract, whereas the proofs show only a part performance and, at most, an excuse for nonperformance. Appellant cites cases regulating the pleadings where performance is not shown but an excuse for nonperformance is relied upon. This principle is to the effect that where a party does not perform a contract, but relies upon the consent of the defendant as an excuse, he must set up these facts in his complaint. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 116, 117, 24 P. 867; Estate of Warner, 158 Cal. 441, 445, 111 P. 352; Krotzer v. Clark, 178 Cal. 736, 738, 739, 174 P. 657, and the recent case of Kirk v. Culley, 202 Cal. 501, 505, 261 P. 994. Respondent, on the contrary, contends that this rule is inapplicable and that in point of fact respondent did perform all covenants and conditions on his part to be kept and performed under this contract; that all he was required to do was to be able, ready, and willing to perform such work at such time and such place and in such capacity as decedent might "determine and direct."

The question really is, then: Is the fact that plaintiff did not perform all the work contemplated by the contract upon this particular portion of the highway to be considered a failure to perform within the rule of pleading relied upon? It seems that the essence of performance under the contract was to be ready and willing to perform such work at such place and in such capacity as decedent should determine and direct and that he determined and directed that plaintiff work part of the time elsewhere, which was done. Plaintiff was at no time discharged. The fact that his work may have been unsatisfactory to the engineer of the highway commission, and that for this reason decedent directed him to work elsewhere, does not alter the situation so long as decedent retained respondent in his employment. The loan of respondent to decedent was at all times prior to final settlement unpaid, and this fact in connection with the joint efforts to secure other contracts may have been factors affecting the action and conduct of decedent towards respondent.

We therefore hold that the evidence and the findings of the court under the pleadings as made bring the case within the rule announced in Stone v. Bancroft, 112 Cal. 652, 657, 44 P. 1069, 1070, where a contract of employment was under consideration and, among other things, the court said: "And even conceding that during a great portion of this time plaintiff was not working at all, yet, if he was ready, and willing to work at all times if work had been offered, and no work was offered, and he had not been discharged, then the contract was in full force, and his right of action upon it cannot be gainsaid. It is no defense to an action upon the contract under such circumstances to say that plaintiff has not performed his duties thereunder." To the same effect, see Stone v. Bancroft, 139 Cal. 78, 80, 81, 70 P. 1017, 72 P. 717; Sexton v. Richardson, 6 Cal. App. 459, 92 P. 395; Webster v. Wade, 19 Cal. 291, 79 Am. Dec. 218.

These considerations have induced the conclusion above announced.

Ex parte BATTELLE. (Cr. 3239.)

Supreme Court of California. May 14, 1929.

1. Constitutional law 🔑79—Each branch of Legislature has power to conduct investigations to determine necessity and expediency of contemplated legislation, notwithstanding separation of governmental powers (Const. art. 4, §§ 7, 9, 17, 18).

Each branch of the Legislature necessarily has the power to conduct investigations to determine the necessity or expediency of contemplated legislation, and this power is not excluded or abridged by the constitutional provision for separation of governmental powers, except as expressly permitted by Const. art. 4, §§ 7, 9, 17, 18.

2. States 🔑40—Branch of Legislature has power to require and compel attendance of witnesses and production of documents before it or its duly accredited committees, and to punish as for contempt contumacy of witnesses.

The power of legislative bodies to conduct investigations in aid of prospective legislation carries with it the power, in proper cases, to require and compel attendance of witnesses and production of books and papers by means of legal process, and to punish as for contempt contumacy of witnesses in such proceedings, whether conducted by legislative body or a branch of it, directly or through properly constituted committees.

3. Constitutional law 🔑55—That legislative bodies customarily pursue judicial procedure in investigations and punishing witnesses for contempt is not invasion of powers of judicial department.

That legislative bodies, in conducting investigations and punishing contumacy of witnesses, customarily adhere to judicial procedural methods, does not constitute an invasion of powers intrusted to judicial department of government.

4. States 🔑39½—Power of Legislature to make investigations in aid of prospective legislation must be as broad as subject to which inquiry properly entered upon has relation.

The power of the Legislature, in enacting laws, to remedy wrong or defect of former laws to conduct whatever inquisitions are required, must be as broad as the subject to which the inquiry properly entered upon has relation.

5. Constitutional law 🔑52—Senate resolution for investigation of cement trust held not usurpation of judicial powers (Pol. Code, §§ 300–304; Cartwright Act, as amended by St. 1909, p. 593).

Senate resolution reciting conditions indicating existence of combination to control prices of cement, and appointing special committee to investigate and ascertain whether such illegal combination or conspiracy exists, and expressly referring to provisions of Pol. Code, §§ 300–304, and Cartwright Act (St. 1907, p. 984, as amended by St. 1909, p. 593), and requiring committee to report results of its investigation with such recommendations as it may deem proper, held to contemplate, not a purely judicial inquiry of past illegal practices in usurpation of judicial powers, but a legislative inquiry in aid of future legislation.

6. Constitutional law 🔑52—That senate resolution contemplated investigation of single industry is not indicative that it is invasion of judicial powers.

That senate resolution contemplated investigation of single industry to determine existence of conspiracy or combination to fix prices is not indicative that contemplated investigation is purely judicial in usurpation of judicial powers.

7. States 🔑40—Stipulation that contemnor was accorded opportunity before bar of senate to purge himself of contempt will not be treated as waiver of other defects on face of adjudication.

A stipulation, in habeas corpus proceedings to procure petitioner's release from custody for contempt in refusing to testify before senate committee, that it may be assumed to be a fact that, prior to contempt resolution, petitioner was afforded opportunity to purge himself of contempt before bar of senate by answering questions and producing documents, will be given effect, but not as waiving any other defects in the contempt proceedings in so far as validity of order and adjudication of contempt upon the face thereon is called in question.

8. Constitutional law 🔑52—Power to punish contempt is not purely judicial which state senate is precluded from exercising.

The power to punish witnesses for contempt is not a purely judicial power which state senate is precluded by Constitution from exercising.

9. States 🔑40—State senate in punishing witnesses for contempt must follow statutory rules of procedure (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1209, 1211).

Power of the state senate to punish witnesses for contempt must be exercised in strict conformity with rules of procedure which statutes provide, particularly Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1209, 1211.

10. States 🔑40—Senate contempt resolution not reciting facts constituting contempt held fatally defective, in view of stipulation that contemnors were afforded opportunity to purge contempt (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1209, 1211; Practice Act, § 481).

In habeas corpus proceedings to procure release from custody for contempt in refusing to testify before senate committee, in view of stipulation that contemnor was afforded opportunity before bar of senate to purge himself of contempt, order or resolution adjudging contemnor in contempt, which did not contain statement of facts constituting the contempt as required by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1209, 1211, and original Practice Act, § 481 (St. 1851, p. 127), was fatally defective; the stipulation characterizing the contempt as one committed in the immediate view and presence of senate.

11. Contempt 🔑63(4)—Order adjudging contempt of witness for refusal to answer questions or produce documents must recite questions, identify documents, and show materiality and pertinency to issues (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1209, 1211).

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1209, 1211, a witness before court or other inquisitorial body, who is otherwise orderly and respectful, cannot be adjudged guilty of contempt for failure or refusal to answer questions or produce documents, in absence of express recital in contempt order of facts affirmatively showing not only precise questions which he has declined to answer, or precisely specified documents which he has refused to produce, and also affirmatively setting forth facts showing materiality and pertinency of each of these forms of evidence to the issue before the tribunal.

12. States 🔑40—Senate contempt resolution, referring to excerpts from transcript of testimony for questions which witness refused to answer, held insufficient (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1209, 1211).

Senate contempt resolution, referring to excerpts from transcript of testimony submitted by committee for questions which witness refused to answer, held insufficient to satisfy precise requirement of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1209, 1211, requiring order to recite facts constituting contempt.

13. States 🔑40—Senate contempt resolution held insufficient, in not reciting that investigation in which contempt was committed was legislative in character.

Senate contempt order for witness' refusal to testify and produce documents was defective, in not reciting that investigation in which contempt was committed was so far legislative in character as to have empowered committee to ask and require answer of questions propounded to witnesses and to have required production of documents in question, notwithstanding sufficiency of original resolution authorizing investigation.

Original habeas corpus by H. T. Battelle against the Sergeant at Arms of the State Senate to secure petitioner's release from custody on charge of contempt for refusing to answer certain questions. Order of contempt vacated, and petitioner discharged.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein applies for release upon a writ of habeas corpus. His application is accompanied with those of eight other applicants who have separately presented petitions, similar in the main, for release from their alleged illegal detention, as a result of certain proceedings affecting all of said applicants and which are sought in each case to be reviewed. On January 17, 1929, the state senate, the California Legislature being then in session, adopted a resolution providing for the appointment by the president of the senate of five members thereof for certain purposes and with certain powers hereinafter to be set forth. The resolution itself was preceded by certain recitals which, briefly summarized, provided that, whereas the state of California and its political subdivisions have under way certain public improvements in the way of the construction of highways, bridges, dams, and other structures, certain of which are specifically set forth and which will require the expenditure of large sums of public money; that in the modern construction of such structures cement is one of the elements most used and most largely entering into the cost of such construction; that the experience of many years has shown that free competitive bidding is the best means of obtaining the materials for both public and private structures at the lowest cost, and that accordingly the laws of California provide that all supplies for public improvements shall be purchased upon competitive bids and from the lowest bidder; and that in order that this policy may be carried into effect it is necessary that monopolies, trusts, and conspiracies in restraint of trade affecting the prices of commodities, if any such exist, should be regulated and suppressed, to the end that the people may have the benefit of lower prices of material by free competitive bidding; "and whereas, there is a reputed cement trust in this state, composed of manufacturers and dealers in cement forming a combination to control and maintain high and uniform prices, by stifling free competition, thereby increasing the costs of all improvements in which cement is used, which is evidenced by reports from the State Purchasing Department, showing bids of all manufacturers bidding to be the same, thereby depriving the department of the benefit of advantageous prices through free competition, and the same conditions are reported in municipal purchases and by private contractors, now, therefore, be it resolved by the senate of the state of California, that a special committee of five members of the senate be appointed by the president of the senate to ascertain the fact whether or not an illegal combination or conspiracy exists among the manufacturers and dealers in cement, to control the market price of cement in the state of California by limiting production, suppressing free competition or other means, and upon the conclusion of such investigation to report to the senate the results thereof, together with such recommendations as the committee shall deem proper." The resolution then proceeded to define the authority and powers of the committee thus to be appointed: "That said committee be and it is hereby authorized and empowered to do any and all things necessary to make a full and complete investigation of the matters and subjects hereinbefore enumerated, or recited, and to that end to employ all necessary clerical, expert and legal assistants, and said committee is hereby authorized and empowered to summon witnesses, require the production of persons, books, accounts, agreements, minutes of meetings, documents, records and papers of every kind, to issue subpœnas and to take all necessary means to compel the attendance of witnesses and to procure testimony; and the members of said committee are, and each of them is, hereby authorized to administer oaths; and all the provisions of article VIII of chapter 2, title 1, part III of the Political Code of this state, relative to the attendance and examination of witnesses before the legislature and committees thereof, shall apply to the committee appointed under this resolution." The sergeant at arms of the senate was made the executive officer of the committee, with power to serve any and all subpœnas and orders that may be issued by said committee. The resolution finally provided: "That said committee be given leave to sit during the sessions of the senate and during the recess, at such place or places as the committee may determine; that it reported as speedily as possible, the results of its investigation to the senate, with such recommendations as it may deem proper, relative to abuses or wilful violation of the anti-trust law (Cartwright Act [St. 1907, p. 984, as amended by St. 1909, p. 593]), and the particulars, if any, wherein said law should be strengthened and made more effective to prevent illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade."

Pursuant to the foregoing resolution the president of the senate appointed the following five members thereof to constitute and function as such committee, viz.: Senators H. C. Jones, J. M. Inman, J. I. Wagy, F. S. Boggs, and Henry E. Carter. The committee presently organized by the selection of Senator H. C. Jones as the chairman thereof and the appointment of the necessary clerks, reporters, and others assistants. Later during the sessions of the committee Senator Jones became ill and unable to be present, and Senator Inman was thereupon somewhat informally selected to act as vice chairman of the committee. The sessions of the committee opened in San Francisco on January 24, 1929, whereupon it was made to appear that a communication had been sent by the chairman to a large number of companies or corporations manufacturing or dealing in cement, notifying them of the dates upon which the hearings of the committee would be held in San Francisco and also in Los Angeles, to the end that they might be present or represented by their officials or other representatives. There were a few appearances from among the number thus notified on the first day set for these hearings and others appeared later, until by their officials or counsel practically all of those who had been sent the foregoing notice had appeared. The committee opened its hearings on the day appointed therefor in San Francisco by receiving certain testimony and tabulations from members of the state purchasing department, showing that during the years 1926 to 1928 bids had been asked by the state through said department for supplying cement upon some 18 construction projects throughout the state of California; that as to these projects for public construction which had their situs in Northern or Central California the bidders were cement producers or dealers having their plants or offices in Northern or Central California, and as to these the testimony and tabulations of the state purchasing agencies showed that the bids of these were practically identical upon each and all of these projects. As to the projects which had their location in Southern California the bidders were in the main southern producers or dealers in cement and as to these it appeared that with certain minor exceptions a similar identity in the figures of the several bids was in each instance shown. It was further made to appear that the bids for cement to be furnished the state harbor commission of San Francisco made by these northern bidders were identical throughout. As to bids furnished upon state projects undertaken during the year 1926 a like identity in the figures of the several bidders was disclosed. Certain testimony with reference to the construction work of the East Bay municipal utility district was to the same general effect in so far as it disclosed similar identities in the bids offered upon the building projects of that organization. In the course of the foregoing branch of the committee's investigation it was made to appear that upon several occasions wherein identical bids were offered all of these bids were rejected for no other apparent reason than that their identical figures aroused among those calling for bids the suspicion of a concert among the bidders. In one instance an interesting and possibly suggestive variation occurred. That was in the case of the calling for bids in May, 1924, for the construction of the Exchequer dam on the Merced river not far from the city of Merced by the Merced irrigation district, the amount of cement required being estimated at 350,000 barrels. Bids were tendered by five Central California cement companies, which upon being opened were found to be identical in the amount bid, which was $3.69 per barrel. These bids were rejected and a new advertisement for bids for cement was ordered and had on behalf of the district. When this second set of bids was opened the same practical identity from the same set of bidders appeared. These bids were also ordered rejected and another advertisement was ordered and had. When this third set of bids was opened there was a marked variance in the amounts of the several bids, the bid of the Pacific Portland Cement Company being $3.32 per barrel of cement, which was 5 cents lower per barrel than that of the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, its nearest competitor. The Pacific Portland Cement Company was awarded the contract for the full amount of cement then required. Mr. Robert B. Henderson, president of the Pacific Portland Cement Company, and who had responded to the request of the committee, and was present without further subpœna, was next called upon to testify, and without being then sworn was questioned at considerable length and gave his answers freely and without objection to a wide range of inquiry into matters affecting the production and marketing of cement more especially by his own organization. He was then asked certain particular questions hereinafter to be identified and each of which, upon the advice of his counsel, he declined to answer. He was also requested by the committee to produce before it certain of the books, records, reports, and files of the corporation of which he was president for its inspection, or, in lieu of such production, to permit the inspection and examination of these by the expert auditors and accountants appointed to assist the committee in its said investigation. With each of these requests Mr. Henderson, upon the advice of counsel, refused to comply. He was then excused and was not recalled or subjected to further inquiry or subpœna; but at a later stage of the investigation H. T. Battelle, the petitioner herein and the secretary of the Pacific Portland Cement Company, was required to attend as a witness, under a subpœna and subpœna duces tecum and, being sworn, was asked by the committee through its acting chairman practically the same questions which had formerly been asked of Mr. Henderson, and which, upon the advice of counsel, he also declined to answer; and there was also demanded of him under said subpœna duces tecum the production or permission to inspect and examine the same books, documents, and papers which Mr. Henderson had refused to produce or give access to, and he also upon the advice of counsel repeated such refusal. During the course of the investigation and the sittings of the committee held in San Francisco, Los Angeles, and Sacramento, various other persons, including those representatives of the several cement companies who have also contemporaneously filed their applications for writs of habeas corpus, appeared before it, and submitted themselves and the organizations which certain of them in varying capacities represented, to the questionings of the chairman and members generally of the committee, and in the main responded cheerfully and willingly to inquiries extending over a wide range of inquest into the practical activities of the cement industry, and only declined to answer questions and furnish information or means of information concerning the same matters to which, in the main, the questions asked and the information sought by subpœna duces tecum had relation. Whether the questions asked and answered by these various persons other than the petitioner herein had or have a material bearing upon the right of this petitioner to stand upon his refusal to answer the inquiries or furnish the information or the means for obtaining it required by the committee will be hereinafter considered. The investigation having thus far proceeded, the committee, on March 8, 1929, made and presented to the state senate, then in session, the following report:

"Senate Chamber, Sacramento,
California, March 8, 1929.

"Mr. President: We, the undersigned, your committee to whom was referred the investigation of a reputed illegal combination or conspiracy among manufacturers and dealers in cement in the state of California for the control of the market price of cement and the suppression of free competition, with full power to act in the premises and to issue subpœnas and bring witnesses before it and examine them as to the facts or the purported facts as to such reputed combination or conspiracy, and to compel the production for examination by your committee of all necessary books, papers, documents, records and information, all as more fully and particularly set forth and provided in that certain resolution adopted by the senate on the seventeenth day of January, 1929, under and pursuant to which resolution we were appointed a committee, hereby report to your honorable body, the senate of the state of California:

"That we, your committee, undertook to make said investigation and held meetings in San Francisco on January 24 and 25, 1929; in Los Angeles on February 4, 5 and 6, 1929, and in Sacramento on February 25 and 26 and March 5 and 7, 1929, for the purpose of examining witnesses, and examining books, papers, documents, records, and information; that in the case of each witness and prior to his attendance we caused a subpœna duces tecum to be duly and regularly issued and served and the same was duly and regularly issued and served upon him requiring his presence to testify and requiring him to bring with him certain books, papers, documents, records and information in his possession or under his control, designated and described in the subpœna, and that the following named persons were present and appeared before your committee, viz.:

"Robert B. Henderson, W. H. George, George R. Gay, E. E. Duque, John Treanor, C. C. Merrill, C. A. Low, Arthur B. Shelby and A. Emery Wishon; that said witnesses hereinabove named were examined individually, and required to give certain testimony and to produce certain documents, records, and information for examination by your committee;

"That said witnesses and each thereof contumaciously refused and declined to answer questions material to the issues and refused to produce material and proper books, papers, documents, records and information required of them and in their possession or under their control, all as more particularly appears from the transcript of testimony given and proceedings had upon said investigation, which said transcript, consisting of five volumes, is filed herewith and by this reference as fully and completely made a part hereof as if fully set forth herein at length.

"Wherefore, we, your said committee, hereby render and file this report of said refusal of said witnesses so to testify or to produce said books, papers, documents, records and information, for such action as may be deemed necessary by the senate.

"Respectfully submitted,

"J. M. Inman,
"J. I. Wagy,
"F. S. Boggs,
"Henry E. Carter,
"Committee."

Accompanying the report of the committee, and expressly made a part thereof, there was filed and presented to the senate a voluminous transcript of the testimony taken and proceedings had before the committee during its said several sessions, and also the originals of the subpœnas and subpœnas duces tecum issued and served under the direction of the committee. Thereafter and on March 14, 1929, the senate in regular session adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas, this honorable Senate has undertaken to investigate as to the existence or nonexistence of a reputed illegal combination or conspiracy among manufacturers and dealers in cement in the state of California, for the control of the market price of cement and the suppression of free competition; and

"Whereas, on January 18, 1929, the president of this honorable Senate, pursuant to the resolution of said senate, adopted on January 17, 1929, appointed Senators Boggs, Carter, Inman, Herbert C. Jones and Wagy as a committee to investigate as to the existence or nonexistence of such reputed illegal combination or conspiracy, with full power to issue subpœnas and bring witnesses before it and examine them as to the facts or the purported facts as to such reputed combination or conspiracy, and to compel the production for examination by said committee of all necessary books, papers, documents and records material thereto; and

"Whereas, said committee so appointed by this senate undertook to discharge its said duty of investigation as to the existence or nonexistence of such reputed illegal combination or conspiracy; and

"Whereas, subpœnas duces tecum were duly and regularly issued and duly and regularly served upon Robert B. Henderson, W. H. George, George R. Gay, E. E. Duque, John Treanor, C. C. Merrill, C. A. Low, Arthur B. Shelby, H. T. Battelle and A. Emery Wishon, requiring each of the said persons to appear before said committee to testify, and requiring each of them to bring with him certain books, papers, documents and records, such being in his possession or under his control, and designated and described in the subpœna; and

"Whereas, in pursuance of said subpœnas duly and regularly issued and served, said persons appeared before said committee of investigation of this senate, and refused and declined to answer certain questions material to the issues and refused to produce proper books, papers, documents and records required of them, such being in their possession or under their control and material to said issues, all as more particularly appears from the report of said committee presented to and filed with this senate, on March 8, 1929, and from the supplemental report of said committee presented to and filed with this senate on March 11, 1929, said questions being also set forth in the 'Excerpts from the transcript of testimony' submitted to the senate, March 8, 1929, to which reference is hereby made; and

"Whereas, the truth as to the existence or nonexistence of such reputed illegal combination or conspiracy is supposed to rest and be within the knowledge of these said witnesses, or in the proper books, papers, documents and records required of them, such being in their possession, or under their control; and

"Whereas, the said committee has reported to this senate the contumacious refusal of said witnesses to answer questions material to the issues propounded to them by said committee and to produce proper books, papers, documents and records material to said issues, for such action as may be deemed necessary by the senate, now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the said Robert B. Henderson, W. H. George, George R. Gay, E. E. Duque, John Treanor, C. C. Merrill, C. A. Low, Arthur B. Shelby, H. T. Battelle and A. Emery Wishon be and they are hereby declared to be guilty of contempt of this senate; and be it further

"Resolved, That the said Robert B. Henderson, W. H. George, George R. Gay, E. E. Duque, John Treanor, C. C. Merrill, C. A. Low, Arthur B. Shelby, H. T. Battelle and A. Emery Wishon be taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and that they be committed to the county jail in the county of Sacramento, State of California, until they shall have purged themselves of this contempt by answering the questions which were propounded to them by said committee and by producing the proper books, papers, documents and records material to said issues required of them; that a copy of this resolution, duly attested by the Secretary of State, be the authority of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and the Sheriff of the county of Sacramento."

Under the direction of the foregoing resolution the sergeant at arms of the senate placed the petitioner herein under arrest and was detaining him thereunder and by authority thereof when the writ sought by the petitioner herein was issued. Subsequent to said arrest and detention and the issuance of said writ the following stipulation was entered into between counsel for this and the other several petitioners for similar writs and the Attorney General representing the state senate, in his official capacity:

"It is understood and agreed by the parties hereto that this court [the Supreme Court] in the consideration and determination of this matter, may assume it to be a fact that prior to the passage of the resolution by the Senate reciting that the petitioner was in contempt of the Senate, petitioner appeared before the bar of the Senate and was there given opportunity to purge himself of the alleged contempt by answering the questions and producing the books, papers, documents and information which had been previously refused by him, and not otherwise; and that he did not do so upon advice of counsel, for each and every reason assigned in the petition herein."

The sergeant at arms of the senate made in due course his return to said writ, which merely set forth that he was holding the petitioner under and by virtue of a warrant of arrest issued pursuant to the foregoing resolution of the state senate, and which resolution was made a part of his said return. A traverse to said return was filed, which presented no issue of fact, but the same questions of law as were urged in his said petition. The matter came before this court for hearing upon the record as thus made up, and, after argument and the filing of elaborate briefs, has been submitted for decision.

The basic contention which the petitioner herein urges against the validity, from their very inception, of the proceedings out of which his alleged unlawful detention has arisen, is that neither the State Legislature nor either branch of it had power to adopt the resolution which the state senate did adopt, calling into being a committee composed of certain of its membership for the purpose of conducting the proceedings provided for in the body of said resolution. This contention is predicated upon the following provision of the State Constitution:

"The powers of the government of the state of California shall be divided into three separate departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial; and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except as in this Constitution expressly directed or permitted." Const. art. 3, § 1.

[1] It is argued by the petitioner that the only exceptions which are embodied in said Constitution to the complete and exclusive segregation of these separate departments of the state government specified in the foregoing provision thereof are those which permit each house (1) to adjudge the qualification and election of the members thereof (section 7, art. 4), (2) to expel a member (section 9, art. 4), and (3) to sit as a court of impeachment (sections 17, 18, art. 4), and that outside of these express exceptions the Legislature may not go in the attempted exercise of any judicial or quasi judicial function. We are of the opinion, however, that this contention, if adopted by us in the full measure of its strictitude, would draw the line too narrowly about the powers of the Legislature in respect to its prime and exclusive function, viz., that of legislation. The power and duties reposed in the Legislature and in each and every member of both houses thereof is obviously that of enacting, and hence, necessarily, of preparing and proceeding to enact wise and well-formed and needful laws. An essential prerequisite to the proper exercise of these powers and duties on the part of each member of the lawmaking body during the comparatively brief and hurried period of its biennial sessions is the possession of a degree of general intelligence; this of course. But in regard to the many and, to be particular, the most important matters which in this age of new ventures and of large concerns occur and recur as the most insistent subjects of legislation, this is not enough; and hence, in many instances, in order to the preparation of wise and timely laws the necessity of investigation of some sort must exist as an indispensable incident and auxiliary to the proper exercise of legislative power. This has been recognized from the earliest times in the history of American legislation, both federal and state, and from even earlier epochs in the development of British jurisprudence. See notes to Marshall v. Gordon, 243 U. S. 521, 37 S. Ct. 448, 61 L. Ed. 881, L. R. A. 1917F, 279, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 371; and Burnham v. Morrissey, 14 Gray (Mass.) 226, 74 Am. Dec. 676; Wilckens v. Willet (App.) 4 Abb. Dec. (N. Y.) 596; Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat. 204, 5 L. Ed. 242; Federal Trade Commission v. American Tobacco Co., 264 U. S. 298, 44 S. Ct. 336, 68 L. Ed. 696, 32 A. L. R. 786; Harriman v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 211 U. S. 407, 29 S. Ct. 115, 53 L. Ed. 253; In re Chapman, 166 U. S. 661, 17 S. Ct. 677, 41 L. Ed. 1154; Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, 26 L. Ed. 377.

[2-4] We do not deem it necessary to deal in detail with the foregoing line of authorities, for the reason that this has been sufficiently done in certain later decisions to which we shall presently refer. Before doing so, however, we deem it proper to state that, under the foregoing authorities, the inherent and auxiliary power reposed in legislative bodies to conduct investigations in aid of prospective legislation has always been held to carry with it the power, in proper cases, to require and compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers by means of legal process and to institute and carry to the extent of punishment contempt proceedings in order to compel the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence as may be legally called for in the course of such proceedings, whether conducted by the legislative body or a branch of it, directly or through properly constituted committees thereof. We deem it timely, also, to state at this point in our inquiry that, by uniform custom, more or less rigidly adhered to, every official inquisition has from the earliest times made use of procedural methods which resemble those obtaining in judicial tribunals. This is because, in the nature of things, as exemplified by human experience, such methods have been found to furnish the surest means of arriving at the truth of the particular matter involved in the inquiry. It does not follow, however, that legislative bodies or administrative agencies or municipal organizations or executive officials by the mere employment of methods of procedure which resemble those employed or required in judicial tribunals must be held to be engaged in the exercise of a judicial function and to be thereby trenching upon the area exclusively assigned to the judicial department of the state government. There has been some confusion in judicial decisions touching this subject which it is beyond the scope of our present inquiry to clear away, but it may not be inapt at this point to refer to the comment of Cooley in his great classic on constitutional limitations, wherein, after reviewing many authorities, he draws the conclusion: "That that which distinguishes a judicial from a legislative act is that the one is a determination of what the existing law is in relation to some existing thing already done or happened, while the other is a predetermination of what the law shall be for the regulation of all future cases falling under its provisions." In the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes in the comparatively recent case of Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co., 211 U. S. 210, 29 S. Ct. 67, 53 L. Ed. 150, it is thus stated: "A judicial inquiry investigates, declares and enforces liabilities as they stand on present or past facts and under laws supposed already to exist. That is its purpose and end. Legislation on the other hand looks to the future and changes existing conditions by making a new rule to be applied thereafter to all or some part of those subject to its power." That the method of each may resemble that of the other in the course of their respective inquests having these two different ends in view is not the important or determining factor, since the same underlying consideration operates to guide the procedural steps of both. Legislatures in enacting laws, like courts in interpreting such laws when enacted, must have in regard the former law, if any, the wrong or defect requiring remedial action, and the nature and extent of the needed and appropriate remedy. In the application of this principle it follows necessarily that the power of these co-ordinate branches of government, in conducting whatever inquisitions the proper exercise of their respective functions require, must be as broad as the subject to which the inquiry properly entered upon by either has relation. Such we understand to be the rule enunciated by the later authorities, to which we shall now refer. In the case of McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U. S. 135, 47 S. Ct. 319, 71 L. Ed. 580, 50 A. L. R. 1, the Supreme Court of the United States was called upon to decide two main questions, each germane to the inquiry here under review. The first of these related to the broad powers of the Congress of the United States, or of either branch thereof, to institute and conduct investigations when it reasonably appeared that the purpose thereof was an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function. In deciding this primary question, the court, Mr. Justice Van Devanter writing the opinion, entered upon a most careful and exhaustive review and restatement of the leading cases in both state and federal jurisdictions touching the subject, including those above cited, and many others, and in which cases the right to the exercise of these powers by legislative bodies of both jurisdictions was granted or denied, depending upon the facts of the individual case, but in which the principle was quite uniformly asserted as to the existence of such powers in all proper cases as essential, incidental, and auxiliary to the exercise of the legislative function. In the course of this review of cases the learned justice gave due consideration to the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson, which both counsel in the instant inquiry have relied upon as upholding their opposing contention, and showed that, while it contained some language of doubtful import, and while it denied to a congressional committee the asserted right in the individual case, it did so upon the express ground that the particular inquiry and the resolution of the house of representatives which authorized it embraced no suggestion of contemplated legislation, and that the matter sought to be elicited was one in respect to which no valid legislation could be had. Otherwise the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson is not at variance with the general line of decision upon the possession of the foregoing authority as being auxiliary to the legislative grant of power. It will be seen from the authorities cited in the McGrain decision that it is quite immaterial whether the power of inquiry is to be exercised by a state or a federal legislative body, and that it is equally immaterial in the exercise of that power whether the legislative arm of the government is acting under or by virtue of granted or reserved authority; and that it is also quite immaterial what the particular constitutional limitations may be which separate legislative from judicial functions of government and which forbid the trespass of the one upon the domain of the other; since, if it is to be conceded that the possession and exercise of the power of preliminary inquiry is an essential incident and auxiliary to the legislative function, it follows irresistibly that the legislative arm of government is not to be restricted in the exercise of this power under limitations hereinafter to be defined by the fact that methods and processes, judicial or quasi judicial in character, are employed in the course of the inquiry. In the McGrain Case the learned justice closes this branch of the decision with the following significant statement:

"A legislative body cannot legislate wisely or effectively in the absence of information respecting the conditions which the legislation is intended to affect or change; and where the legislative body does not itself possess the requisite information—which not infrequently is true—recourse must be had to others who do possess it. Experience has taught that mere requests for such information often are unavailing, and also that information which is volunteered is not always accurate or complete; so some means of compulsion are essential to obtain what is needed. All this was true before and when the Constitution was framed and adopted. In that period the power of inquiry—with enforcing process—was regarded and employed as a necessary and appropriate attribute of the power to legislate—indeed, was treated as inhering in it. Thus there is ample warrant for thinking, as we do, that the constitutional provisions which commit the legislative function to the two houses are intended to include this attribute to the end that the function may be effectively exercised."

The second subject of consideration in the McGrain Case which is germane to the instant proceeding was the question erroneously decided by the inferior federal tribunal and transferred to the court of last resort for review. That was the question as to whether the purpose of the investigation was to determine the guilt of the Attorney General of the United States of the shortcomings and wrongdoings set forth in the resolution authorizing the inquiry, and which might submit him to prosecution, or was the purpose also foreshadowed in the resolution of "obtaining information necessary as a basis for such legislation or other action as the senate may decree necessary and proper." In discussing this phrasing of the resolution directly under criticism the court says: "This avowal of contemplated legislation is in accord with what we think is the right interpretation of the earlier resolution directing the investigation. The suggested possibility of 'other action' if deemed 'necessary or proper' is of course open to criticism in that there is no other action in the matter which would be within the power of the senate. But we do not assent to the view that this indefinite and untenable suggestion invalidates the entire proceeding. The right view in our opinion is that it takes nothing from the lawful object avowed in the same resolution and rightly inferable from the earlier one. It is not as if an inadmissible or unlawful object were affirmatively and definitely avowed." The applicability of the foregoing language to the instant matter will be seen when the precise terms and proper interpretation of the resolution of the state senate which is assailed in the present proceeding comes under review. In the above case, also, certain limitations attending the exercise of the foregoing powers by legislative bodies or their committees were set forth with sustaining authorities. It is, however, in the more recent case of Sinclair v. United States, just decided by the Supreme Court of the United States (49 S. Ct. 268, 73 L. Ed. ——), that both the foregoing powers and the definite limitations attending their exercise are most clearly and conclusively stated. This case in its main aspects has a most important bearing upon the matter before us by virtue both of its similarities and of its points of divergence. It arose out of the same series of situations which gave rise to the case of McGrain v. Daugherty, supra, but it presents as to its facts a case having certain significant resemblances to the instant proceeding. In the case just cited Sinclair had been summoned as a witness to give testimony respecting certain leases of oil and gas bearing lands which had been entered into between the Secretaries of the Navy and of the Interior Departments of the federal government and certain corporations of which, at the time thereof, Sinclair was in control, and which said leases were being assailed in both judicial and legislative proceedings as surcharged with fraud in their procurement. The immediate investigation in which he was being required to give testimony was being conducted by the committee of public lands and surveys of the United States senate, acting under the authority of certain resolutions adopted by that branch of Congress of the United States, directing it "to investigate this entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources, and to report its findings and recommendations to the senate." There were several such resolutions adopted by the senate before the committee got finally into action, and in one of the latter of these, designated as Senate Resolution 147, the committee was given the further direction to "ascertain what, if any, other or additional legislation may be advisable, and to report its findings and recommendations to the senate." Upon being summoned before the committee and asked certain questions, which the court finally decided were pertinent to the matter under inquiry Sinclair declined to give his testimony in response to such questions and submitted a statement in justification of his refusal to testify, wherein he asserted "that the committee could not thus investigate the matters covered by the authorization because the senate by the adoption of the joint resolution had exhausted its power and congress and the president had made the whole matter a judicial question which was determinable only by the courts." The "joint resolution" to which Sinclair referred was "Joint Resolution 54," wherein the Congress had theretofore directed certain legal proceedings to be instituted and which were then pending to set aside the leases in question. The senate committee persisted in its inquiry, with the result that Sinclair, upon his persistent refusal to testify, was indicted under the federal procedure (R. S. § 102, U. S. C. tit. 2, § 192 [2 USCA § 192]), and his case came finally before the United States Supreme Court for review in this recent case. The court first gave its consideration to the case of McGrain v. Daugherty, supra, fully affirming the possession by the Congress and each of the houses thereof of "not only such powers as are expressly granted to them by the Constitution, but such auxiliary powers as are necessary and appropriate to make the express powers effective." The court next proceeded to define the limitations upon the exercise of these auxiliary powers as outlined in the McGrain decision, stating that "that case shows that, while the power of inquiry is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function, it must be exerted with due regard for the rights of witnesses, and that a witness rightfully may refuse to answer where the bounds of the power are exceeded or where the questions asked are not pertinent to the matter under inquiry." The court proceeded to a review of certain cases wherein the last-named doctrine was elucidated and enforced and to some of which we shall later refer. In the course of its discussion the court proceeded to dispose of the contention that the committee had been bereft of power to conduct the immediate inquiry by the fact that judicial proceedings had been instituted and were then pending for the avoidance of the leases in question; the court holding that, notwithstanding the pendency of such litigation and the possible aid which might be afforded thereto by the prosecution of the senatorial inquiry, these facts would not suffice to show "that the committee intended to depart from the purpose to ascertain whether additional legislation might be advisable." The court further stated that: "The validity of the lease and the means by which it had been obtained under existing law were subjects that properly might be investigated in order to determine what if any legislation was necessary or desirable in order to recover the leased lands or to safeguard other parts of the public domain." Having thus disposed of the foregoing consideration having a direct bearing upon the first branch of the cause now before us, to wit, the validity of the senate resolution authorizing the committee to institute the investigation out of which the pending application for a writ of habeas corpus arose, the court in the Sinclair Case proceeded to pass upon the vital question of the pertinency of the question which the witness refused to answer to the matter under inquiry before the committee. In deciding this question the court in that case made certain observations to which we shall later refer.

[5] We are thus brought to a consideration of the precise scope of the senate resolution as evinced by its terms under the authority of which its committee undertook to conduct the investigation out of which the instant proceeding arose. The resolution, in the several recitals which precede it, refers to the conceded fact that the state of California directly, and also through its several subordinate subdivisions and agencies, is engaged in the making of certain extensive public improvements in the way of street and highway construction, the building of dams and reservoirs for water conservation and flood control, and of bridges and other structures, into all of which the increasing use of cement enters as one of the main elements of cost. The resolution proceeds to further recite that experience has shown that free competitive bidding upon both public and private work is the best means of obtaining the lowest cost of construction, and hence that the laws have provided for competitive bidding upon all public work, and that in order that such laws may be effective it is necessary that monopolies, trusts, and conspiracies in restraint of trade, and affecting the prices of commodities should be regulated and dissolved through actions to be instituted by the Attorney General; and whereas there is a reputed cement trust in this state, composed of manufacturers and dealers in cement, forming a combination to control and maintain high and uniform prices by stifling free competition, thereby increasing the cost of all improvements in which cement is used, it is therefore resolved that a special committee of five members of the senate be appointed by the president thereof to "ascertain the fact whether or not an illegal combination or conspiracy exists among the manufacturers and dealers in cement to control the market price of cement in the state of California by limiting production, suppressing free competition, or other means, and upon the conclusion of such investigation to report to the senate the results thereof, together with such recommendations as the committee shall deem proper." The resolution proceeds to define the powers and procedure of the committee in the course of making such investigation, and in so doing expressly refers to and makes the provisions of article 8 of chapter 2, title 1, part 3, of the Political Code of California, applicable to the procedure of the committee. The resolution concludes with the statement that: "Said committee be given leave to sit during the sessions of the senate and during the recess, at such place or places as the committee may determine; that it report as speedily as possible the results of its investigation to the senate, with such recommendations as it may deem proper, relative to abuses or wilful violation of the anti-trust law (Cartwright Act), and the particulars, if any, wherein said law should be strengthened and made more effective to prevent illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade." It is contended by the petitioner herein that the foregoing terms of this resolution render plain the intention of its framers that a purely judicial inquiry into the existence of past illegal practices on the part of manufacturers and dealers in cement was to comprise the sole and exclusive function of the committee thus to be constituted and of the investigation to be conducted under its authority and auspices. We are unable to so interpret the terms of said resolution nor to so narrow the scope and functions of the committee created to carry its purpose into effect. It is true that the scope of the investigation was, by the terms of said resolution, defined as having relation to the inquiry as to whether there was in existence within the state of California an unlawful combination of the manufacturers and dealers in cement, having for its reputed purpose the prevention of competitive bidding among its members and others upon both public and private work in which cement was largely employed, and counsel for this and the other like petitioners have strenuously insisted that this was its only purpose, and that this being so, its attempted action was a usurpation of judicial powers. The record, however, disclosed that the further purpose of the inquest was that of enabling the committee to make recommendations to the Legislature respecting future legislation for the prevention of these and other restraints of trade, and that from time to time during the sessions of the committee this latter purpose was expressly referred to by one or the other of the members of the committee.

[6] It is also true that by the terms of the resolution the inquiry was to be limited to the operations of a single great industry, but such was also the situation in the case of Sheppard v. Bryant, 191 Mass. 591, 78 N. E. 394, 6 Ann. Cas. 802, wherein the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held that a legislative investigation into the retail coal business in certain sections of that commonwealth during the occurrence of the great coal strike of 1902 was of proper legislative cognizance and that answers given by a witness in the course of such investigation were privileged so as to exempt such witness from a suit for slander. Such was also the case of Federal Trade Commission v. American Tobacco Co., 264 U. S. 298, 44 S. Ct. 336, 68 L. Ed. 696, 32 A. L. R. 786, wherein the operation of a single great industry or combination of allied industries was made the subject of legislative inquiry. Other instances among the many cases we have been asked to review might well be cited, but it will suffice to state that the general subject of this investigation was a matter of public concern; that is to say, it was an inquiry into a situation wherein the state and its subordinate agencies and activities, being largely engaged and interested in certain lines of public improvement to be carried on by means of money derived from numerous forms of taxation, was directly concerned in lessening, if possible, the burden of such taxation by diminishing the cost of such public work, and hence was clearly within its proper province in seeking to confine within legitimate channels the contact by means of competitive bidding through which the great and growing cement industry would come into the relation of a supplier of its product for use in the development and advancement of such public work. Every inquiry into alleged defects or evils which are supposed to owe their origin and existence to ineffectual laws must have their beginning somewhere and in some particular inquest, which is usually directed either in the courts or in the domain of legislation against some conspicuous offender, or set of offenders, and by means of which investigation, and the recommendations which follow it, some scheme of general legislation or law enforcement is evolved.

It may not be untimely to recall the fact that the resolution here under review directly refers to the Cartwright Law, and that industrious counsel for one or other of the assailants of this resolution have cited us to the case of Cline v. Frink Dairy Co., 274 U. S. 445, 47 S. Ct. 681, 71 L. Ed. 1146, wherein the Supreme Court of the United States, in a quite recent opinion, has held the Colorado anti-trust law, which is in terms a replica of the Cartwright Act, to be unconstitutional in respect to the very matter sought to be covered by the terms of the resolution herein assailed. This fact of itself might well furnish a very excellent reason for the insertion in said resolution of the closing clauses thereof, which may not be ignored, and wherein the committee created by it is directed to report to the senate, its creator, at the conclusion of its inquest, "such recommendations as it may deem proper relative to abuses and violations of the anti-trust law (Cartwright Act) and the particulars, if any, wherein said law should be strengthened and made more effective." It is needless to pursue this subject at greater length for the purpose of reaching the conclusion that in the adoption of said resolution and in the constitution of the committee thereunder, with the powers and procedure specified therein, the senate was exercising a legitimate legislative function, and that the assault which the petitioner herein, and others having like applications, make upon it, and upon the legality of the committee constituted under and by virtue of it, are of no avail.

Having thus determined that the legislative committee was legally constituted and, being so, was entitled to hold its several sessions and to request and later require the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and documents before it, and having recited in the earlier stages of this opinion that the committee undertook to exercise these powers, and having found that in the exercise thereof the committee did cause to appear, in the capacity of a witness, the petitioner herein, and also the several other persons who have presented identical applications for the issuances of writs of habeas corpus herein, and that, having done so, did require of this petitioner and also of said other persons that he and they should answer certain questions concerning the cost, prices, and profit of producing and disposing of cement, which several sets of questions he and they refused to answer, and having also required of this petitioner and of said other persons that he and they should produce before the committee certain books, documents, and records of those certain cement corporations, of which said petitioner and such other persons were, respectively, the officials, and which he and they each, in turn, declined to produce, and having seen that said committee thereupon made and presented to the state senate its report of the aforesaid proceedings, contained in several large volumes, embracing the reporter's transcript thereof, and that having received said report the senate proceeded to make its order and adjudication that said petitioner and said other persons were guilty of contempt, consisting in their and each of their refusal to answer those certain questions which were set forth in said report, and in further refusing to produce those certain books, records, and papers, the production of which was required through the issuance of and service of subpœna duces tecum, as is also set forth in the terms of said report, and having therein directed that the petitioner and said other persons be arrested by the sergeant at arms of the senate and be confined in the custody of the sheriff of the county of Sacramento until such time as they and each of them should purge themselves of said contempt, and the petitioner and said other persons having been so arrested and immediately threatened with such confinement, and having thereupon applied for and had issued upon each of their petitions a writ of habeas corpus, and this court having held a hearing upon the appearance of the petitioner and return to said writ, the primary question in the orderly course of procedure upon this branch of our inquiry is that of determining whether or not the aforesaid order and adjudication of contempt is sufficient upon its face to justify the arrest and detention of this petitioner, and, incidentally, of each of the other of said petitioners; since, if this court should determine that said order and adjudication of contempt is void upon its face, it would be immaterial to this inquiry whether or not the petitioner and the other persons were legally justified in their refusal to answer the questions asked and to produce the books, records, and papers in question and which constitute the gravamen of the charge that each of them was guilty of contempt.

[7-10] At the outset of this inquiry it is to be noted that after the arrest of this petitioner and the others, in pursuance of said adjudication of contempt and the order for their arrest and confinement therein contained, and also for the issuance of this and of the other writs of habeas corpus as ordered by this court, a certain stipulation was entered into between each of said petitioners and the Attorney General, representing the respondent, the text of which is hereinbefore stated. The purpose of this stipulation was to supply a fatal hiatus in the proceedings as thus far undertaken, and consisting in the admitted fact that none of these petitioners had, prior to the senate resolution adjudging them and each of them to be guilty of contempt, been accorded the opportunity to appear before that body and purge themselves of said contempt. We permitted that stipulation to be filed herein for that sole purpose, but we cannot give to it any broader effect, nor treat it as in any manner waiving any other defects which may inhere in these contempt proceedings in so far as the validity of the order and adjudication of contempt upon the face thereof is herein called in question. It is urged by the petitioner, and even more strenuously by certain of the other petitioners for similar writs, that the power to punish for contempt is a purely judicial power, which this legislative body, under the restraints of the Constitution, has no jurisdiction to employ. We think, however, that this question is covered by what has heretofore been said herein and by the authorities already referred to. We are, however, clearly of the opinion that the power of the state senate to adjudge this and the other petitioners named in its resolution to be guilty of contempt and to order his and their confinement is a power which can only be exercised in strict conformity with the rules of procedure which the laws of this state provide as a prerequisite to the validity of an adjudication of contempt. Section 1209 of the Code of Civil Procedure defines what acts or omissions are contempts of court, and this definition also applies to and defines what are contempts before any tribunal exercising the functions of a court. Section 1211 of said Code divides contempts into two classes, viz.: (1) Those committed in the presence of the court and which may be punished summarily and for the punishment of which a specific procedure is outlined, and (2) those not committed in the immediate view and presence of the court and for which another and different procedure is provided. The contempt in this proceeding sought to be adjudged and punished must be considered as coming within one or the other of these classes and as controlled by the foregoing provisions relative to each. While it would seem to be clear that prior to the making and presentation of the foregoing stipulation the alleged contempt in these several proceedings was what is known to the law as a constructive contempt—that is to say, a contempt not committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, and hence to be such a contempt as would come within the second clause of section 1211 of said Code—it appears to us to be equally clear that in view of the presence and terms of said stipulation the contempt for several contempts with respect to which the petitioner and said other persons here are charged with having committed, is to be treated as a contempt committed in the immediate view and presence of the state senate, and hence to be covered and controlled by the precise requirements of the first clause in the foregoing section of the Code, which, as we have seen, requires that as a prerequisite to the punishment of an alleged offender thereunder "an order must be made, reciting the facts as occurring in such immediate view and presence." The foregoing provision of the Code of Civil Procedure appears to have been taken bodily from the original Practice Act adopted during the very early years in the history of California jurisprudence, and to have been contained in identical language in section 481 of said Practice Act (St. 1851, p. 127), which required the court in cases of contempt committed in the immediate view and presence of the court to make an order "reciting the facts as occurring in such immediate view and presence, adjudging that the person proceeded against is thereby guilty of a contempt." The foregoing provision of the Practice Act came under review by this court in the very early case of Ex parte Rowe on Habeas Corpus, 7 Cal. 181, wherein it appeared that the grand jury was inquiring into a certain matter wherein the petitioner was sworn as a witness and certain questions propounded to him which he refused to answer, and that the facts were thereupon presented to the court by the grand jury and the petitioner required by the court to answer, and, upon his refusal then and there so to do, he was committed for contempt. The order of the court recited that the petitioner was committed for contempt in refusing to answer certain questions propounded to him by the grand jury. What these questions were did not appear upon the face of said order otherwise than as above set forth. Upon his application for a writ petitioner was discharged, and the court in ordering his discharge said: "In requiring that the act to be performed should be specified in the warrant of commitment, the statute must have had some object in view. What could that object be, except to afford the means of judging of its correctness by other courts? * * * In the present case it should have been stated that the grand jury were inquiring into a certain question, stating it; that the prisoner was sworn as a witness and certain questions propounded to him, stating them; that he refused to answer; that the facts were thereupon presented to the court by the grand jury, and the prisoner required by the court to answer, which being refused, he was committed for contempt."

[11-13] The foregoing decision in this early case has been expressly approved by this court in later cases, notably in Ex parte Clarke, 126 Cal. 235, 240, 243, 58 P. 546, 46 L. R. A. 835, 77 Am. St. Rep. 176; Overend v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 280, 285, 63 P. 372, wherein the precise language quoted from Ex parte Rowe is set forth; and by the District Court of Appeal in the matter of In re Shortridge, 5 Cal. App. 371, 375, 90 P. 478; and it and the foregoing cases are also quoted with approval in 5 Cal. Juris, 950, wherein it is stated that: "The rule is declared in the code and followed in the decisions that an order adjudging and punishing a contempt committed in the immediate view and presence of the court must contain a recital of the acts constituting the contempt. This requirement is jurisdictional and an order which assumes to punish summarily a direct contempt of court is void unless it shows on its face acts sufficient to constitute a legal contempt. The order must contain a statement of facts equivalent to those which the law says must be incorporated in an affidavit for constructive contempt and such facts must prove the contempt. Mere conclusions are not sufficient. In such cases the rule that presumptions and intendments are to be indulged in support of ordinary judgments does not apply." In the light of the foregoing provision of the Code of Civil Procedure and of the cases above referred to and which have consistently interpreted its meaning, we are constrained to hold that a witness before a court or any other inquisitorial body who is otherwise orderly and respectful cannot be adjudged guilty of contempt committed in the presence of such tribunal for his failure or refusal to answer any question or to produce any record, book, or paper, in the absence from the order so adjudging him to be guilty of contempt of an express recital of the facts affirmatively showing not only the precise questions which he has declined to answer, or the precisely specified books or papers which he has refused to produce, but also affirmatively setting forth the facts which show the materiality and pertinency of each of these forms of evidence to the issue before the court or other tribunal. Bearing in mind this fundamental principle of procedure in contempt cases of this character, when we refer to the order and adjudication of contempt which the senate purported to adopt and enforce in the instant case, we find it to be entirely lacking in that precision of statement which the law requires. It is true that the order in question contains the recital that: "In pursuance of said subpœna duly and regularly issued and served said persons appeared before said committee of investigation of this senate and refused and declined to answer certain questions material to the issues, and refused to produce proper books, papers, documents and records required of them, such being in their possession or under their control, and material to said issues, all as more particularly appears from the report of said committee presented to and filed with this senate on March 8th, 1929, and from the supplemental report of said committee filed with this senate on March 11th, 1929, said questions being also set forth in the 'Excerpts from the transcript of testimony' submitted to the senate March 8th, 1929, to which reference is hereby made." We are of the opinion, however, that the mere "reference" which is thus made to the report of the committee and to certain "questions being also set forth in the 'Excerpts from the transcript of testimony'" are and each of them is insufficient to so far embody the content of such report or the "Excerpts from the transcript of testimony" therein contained in the order of commitment so as to satisfy the precise requirement of the aforesaid section of the Code of Civil Procedure with respect to what the "recitals" in said order must contain. We are further of the opinion that, notwithstanding the original resolution was sufficient in form to justify the investigation which was conducted by said committee, the order of commitment herein should have shown upon its face that said investigation was so far legislative in character as to have empowered the committee to ask and to have answered the questions propounded by it to the witnesses and to have required the production of the books, records, and documents in question. The necessity for such a recital in the order and commitment for contempt is that of showing upon the face of said order the materiality and pertinency of the questions which were put to these several witnesses and which they declined to answer and of the requirement for the production of the books which they refused to produce. We are therefore impelled to the conclusion that the order and adjudication of contempt involved in this immediate proceeding, and also in the like proceedings on the part of said other petitioners, is void upon its face. The conclusion thus arrived at renders unnecessary a determination of the several other issues presented and elaborately argued by respective counsel and which have relation to the pertinency and materiality to the inquiry before said committee of those several questions which this petitioner and his fellow petitioners declined to answer, and of the books, records, and papers of the respective corporations of which they are officials, and which, in turn, they and each of them refused to produce. We deem this branch of the discussion premature in the state of the record before us and in the face of our foregoing conclusion that the order of contempt and commitment of the petitioner herein is void upon its face.

The aforesaid order is therefore vacated, and the petitioner herein discharged.

We concur: CURTIS, J.; SHENK, J.; LANGDON, J.

PRESTON, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment; also in the splendid outline given of the privileges and powers of a legislative body in search of material for legislative purposes; also in that portion of the opinion which deals with the technical insufficiency of the order of commitment. But I prefer to rest my concurrence mainly upon the ground that in this case the state senate was not pursuing a legislative purpose. Avowedly it was conducting an inquiry into the existence of an unlawful conspiracy in restraint of trade among the cement producers and dealers in the state for the purpose of basing thereon civil and criminal proceedings in the courts to be inaugurated by the Attorney General in the name of the people of the state. This is the plain and unmistakable import of the resolution itself. In fact, in the preamble of the resolution setting on foot the inquiry is found these words: "* * * It is necessary that monopolies, trusts, and conspiracies in restraint of trade, affecting the prices of commodities, if any exist, be regulated, and the attorney-general of the state requested to take steps to dissolve the same, and prosecute all guilty parties thereto, to the end that the people may have the benefit of lower prices of material by free competitive bidding. * * *"

However, should any doubt occur in the mind of any one on the matter, it is entirely dispelled by the resolution of commitment, which repeatedly declares the purpose of the investigation to have been "to investigate as to the existence or nonexistence of a reputed illegal combination or conspiracy," or, as again stated therein, the committee was "to discharge its said duty of investigating as to the existence or nonexistence of such reputed illegal combination or conspiracy"; or, again, the purpose may be found in these words: "Whereas, the truth as to the existence or nonexistence of such reputed illegal combination or conspiracy is supposed to rest and be within the knowledge of these said witnesses, or in the proper books, papers, documents, and records required of them, such being in their possession or under their control. * * *"

No argument is required to show that whether a combination exists or does not exist is a judicial question. To say that the existence or nonexistence of criminal conspiracy in the commerce in one article will aid legislation upon the general subject of monopolies in business is to tax credulity to the breaking point. Can it be said that legislation on this subject is necessary if this combination in the cement business exists and is unnecessary if it does not exist or vice versa? If in the investigation of a legislative subject such as the regulation of intrastate business, witnesses were produced who would give testimony on this subject, such testimony, of course, could not be refused upon the ground that it would also disclose a violation of the law.

But we have no such situation here. The inquiry before us is not clothed with even the pretense that its purpose is a legislative one. The senate is, therefore, in the present proceeding transgressing upon the exclusive province of the judiciary and hence is without jurisdiction under the resolution as framed to pursue the inquiry attempted.

We reach the same conclusion for the same reason if we consider alone the resolution of commitment. Treating the resolution as the pleadings, findings, and judgment in a constructive contempt proceeding or treating it as the order of commitment in a proceeding for contempt committed within the presence of the court, the commitment is illegal for all the reasons pointed out in the main opinion and on the ground that none of the questions propounded nor any of the documents sought are material because the inquiry is therein defined as a judicial and not as a legislative one. Hence, in any aspect of the matter, no contempt is shown.

In re MORGAN. (Cr. 1794.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 14, 1929.

Habeas corpus ⚷87—Some of essential facts, on basis of which writ of habeas corpus was issued, being misrepresented in petition, writ was discharged.

Where petitioner for writ of habeas corpus, who was confined in jail for contempt of court on failure to pay alimony, attorney's fees, and costs in divorce action, misrepresented to his counsel some of essential facts contained in petition which was verified by counsel on information and belief, and on basis of which writ was issued, writ was discharged and petitioner remanded to custody.

Application by Earl D. Morgan for a writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Los Angeles County. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to custody.

Medler & Wood, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

J. W. Barbee, of Long Beach, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The petition herein on behalf of the applicant for writ was verified by an affidavit of E. L. Medler, one of the applicant's attorneys. In the affidavit Mr. Medler stated that his verification was upon information and belief, and was based upon statements made to him by Mr. Morgan, the applicant in whose behalf the petition was filed. This court, somewhat inadvertently, disregarded the defects in the affidavit, and assumed that the statements contained in the petition were regularly verified.

It was stated in the petition that the applicant was committed to jail for contempt of court, in that he failed to pay certain alimony, attorney fees, and court costs which he had been required to pay pursuant to an order made after a hearing before the court on an order to show cause in a divorce action. It was stated in the petition that at the time of the making of said order of the superior court of Los Angeles county the applicant, Earl D. Morgan, defendant in said action, was not the lawful husband of the plaintiff, Effie L. Morgan; that in fact the said Effie L. Morgan at the time of her alleged marriage with Earl D. Morgan was the wife of another man, from whom she did not yet have a divorce; that, in response to the order to show cause, the defendant appeared in person and with his counsel, and offered to prove the facts last above stated, which offer was denied by the court; and that the alimony order was made without receiving any evidence concerning said alleged facts on which the denial of the marriage relation between said parties was based. It was alleged that, after the making of said order, the defendant moved the court to set aside said order for the payment of alimony, etc., basing the motion upon the ground that it appeared from the allegations of the pleadings then on file that no valid marriage had ever existed between said Earl D. Morgan and the said Effie L. Morgan; that the court was without jurisdiction to make said order without hearing the testimony and proof as to the validity of said marriage; and that the order for alimony payment was unconstitutional, in that it was a confiscation of property without due process of law; that said motion was denied without permitting defendant to offer evidence in support thereof.

The attorney who verified the petition herein was not the attorney for the defendant in the divorce action at the time of the first proceedings above mentioned. It now appears by uncontradicted evidence that, at the hearing on the order to show cause in the superior court, the defendant did not make any offer to produce any evidence concerning the facts, which in his petition herein he alleges that he offered and alleges that the court refused to receive; that the only questions presented to the court were those concerning the support and maintenance of the plaintiff and her minor children, and those concerning the request of the defendant that the temporary care, custody, and control of said children be assigned to him. The applicant's petition admits that he was personally in court at the time of the proceedings to which we have referred. The inference is unavoidable that he misrepresented to his attorney some of the essential facts contained in the petition for the writ, and which led us to order that the writ be issued.

The writ is discharged, and the said Earl D. Morgan is remanded to custody.

We concur: HOUSER, J.; YORK, J.

DAVIS v. DAY et al. (Civ. 6735.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 27, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 27, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 24, 1929.

1. Taxation 🔑415—Assessment of lots, listed below lot opposite which owner's name appeared, without repetition thereof opposite each lot, held not invalid.

Assessment of lots, listed on assessment book below lot opposite which owner's name appeared, without repetition thereof opposite each lot, held not invalid on ground that name of owner of such lots did not appear on assessment roll.

2. Evidence 🔑48—That name of individual, with reference to whom tax listings are made ordinarily appears but once, is matter of common knowledge.

It is a matter of common knowledge and ordinary practice that, wherever listings of property for taxation are made with reference to an individual, his name appears but once, and need not be repeated.

3. Taxation 🔑430—Assessment of lots, separately listed and valued, held not invalid because sums chargeable against each were not carried over into tax columns.

Assessment of lots held not invalid because sums chargeable against each were not carried over into tax columns, instead of gross figure showing entire amount to be paid, where each was separately listed and valued; amount of tax against each being mere matter of computation from information readily obtainable from assessment roll itself.

4. Taxation 🔑319(2)—Courts do not presume that entire tax system is unlawful, but recognize that requirements as to manner and form are founded on adequate and reasonable legal principles.

While certain established requirements are necessary to valid assessment of property for taxation, courts do not presume that entire system of taxation is unlawful or harmful, but recognize that taxation is essential and that requirements as to manner and form are founded on adequate and reasonable legal principles.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by Luman Davis against V. L. Day and others, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint against Charles A. Wilhelm and another, as trustees for plaintiff. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Marcus D. Wolff, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an adverse final judgment, in a suit to quiet title after a motion for a new trial had been denied. It will be unnecessary to describe the property involved other than to state that the said property comprises certain city lots in the city of Oakland. For the purposes hereof the lots may be described as lots 6, 10, 11, in block 2 as said lots appear upon that certain map entitled "Map of the R. F. Knox Tract, Brooklyn, Alameda County, California, etc.," filed October 9, 1880, in the office of the county recorder of Alameda county. The separate claim of the defendants as affecting the property need not be recited, inasmuch as plaintiff makes the same claim to each lot, and, if plaintiff prevails as to one, it will determine his right to all. The sole point involved in this appeal is as to the validity of certain tax proceedings and the effect of a deed following. Willis M. Arnett on and before the first Monday in March was the owner of all the property involved. The assessment book of the property of Alameda county for the year 1919 shows the assessment of the property involved as follows: The taxes due under this assessment, or claimed to be due, were not paid and upon such failure of payment of taxes the property was listed as delinquent upon the delinquent rolls of Alameda county. Such listing upon the delinquent roll is in the manner as follows, to wit: (See pages 742 and 743.)

[1, 2] It is the contention of the appellant that the property here in question, namely, lots 6, 10, 11, in block 2, were never legally assessed, and that, as an assessment "is an essential prerequisite to the validity of all subsequent proceedings," the lack thereof would render ineffective any attempted sale following an alleged failure to pay taxes claimed. The basis of the contention is that the assessment itself shows that the name of the owner of lots 6, 10, 11 does not appear upon the roll. In other words, it is appellant's contention, in this respect, that from the appended examplar it is self-evident that the only parcel of land that shows the name of the owner is lot 4, and the contention is supported by the claim of appellant that, as the name of the owner "Willis M. Arnett" appears but once, and then opposite and to the left of lot 4, that the ownership by the specified name is to be restricted to the lot. Before pursuing the arguments further we might state that the remaining pages of the assessment roll show that in each assessment the method followed was to insert the name of the owner but once and to include under the one name all property assessed or attempted to be assessed as the property of the owner. Appellant cites us many authorities but none which we deem in themselves controlling herein. It may be conceded that tax proceedings, from the very inception thereof down to enforcement of payment, are deemed in invitum, and the authorities cited by appellant go no further than to support the rule of law. Conceding the strictness of the rule and mindful of the caution necessary lest the principle be destroyed, nevertheless its preservation, and the protection of the rights of taxpayers, does not demand the construction contended for here. The assessment book must show the name of the owner of property assessed. In this case, and by the method here employed, it can easily be seen that all of the property assessed in the block to the right of the name Willis M. Arnett belongs to that individual. It is a matter of common knowldege and ordinary practice that, wherever listings are made with reference to an individual, the name appears but once and is not a matter of unnecessary repetition. It may be true that in some of the older cases the theory of taxation proceedings being in invitum was made specially strict, but when we analyze the facts of each case it must be conceded that no ruling goes as far as the one here sought. In People v. Sierra B. Q. M. Co., 39 Cal. 513, an early case, it is said: "We think the objection that the name of the corporation defendant is not found in the proper column, under the head of 'Tax-Payers' Names' because some portion of the name extends beyond the line of that column, is hypercritical. The name is found in the proper place, is easily read and the circumstances create no confusion or trouble. If such objections were fatal, very few assessments would be held valid." See, also, Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 568, 89 P. 352; Knobloch v. Associated Oil Co., 170 Cal. 144, 148 P. 938; Marysville Woolen Mills v. Smith, 178 Cal. 790, 175 P. 13.

[3, 4] It seems to us, with reference to the point, that the name of the owner does not appear on the roll with reference to the lots in question here, that the contention is frivolous and without the slightest merit. The method here adopted seems so obviously proper and systematic that we cannot but feel that the same method is in general use, and for us to hold invalid an assessment so made on that ground alone would tend to upset every assessment roll in the state. Concluding that the assessment itself was regular and valid, we pass to the next ground of appeal, stated as follows: No delinquent taxes ever accrued against any of the lots in controversy, because there was no tax ever extended against, or apportioned to, any one of the lots separately. The claim goes to the extension of the amounts due. In other words, it is appellant's contention that, in the extension, the sum chargeable against each lot should be carried over into the tax columns, rather than a gross figure showing the entire amount to be paid by the taxpayer. In support of the argument the following cases are cited: Terrill v. Groves, 18 Cal. 149; People v. Clunie, 70 Cal. 504, 11 P. 775; Cadwalder v. Nash, 73 Cal. 43, 14 P. 385; Stege v. Richmond, 194 Cal. 305, 228 P. 461.

In each of these cases noted it will be seen that the defect was in the joint assessment or joint valuation of the lots in question. The extension of these holdings would be that if, in the instant case, the lots had been assessed as a group and one total valuation placed on the whole, the assessment would have been invalid. That is not the case here. Each lot is separately assessed and a separate valuation place therein, and the amount of tax against each is merely a matter of computation. The question is flatly decided in Gottstein v. Holmes (Cal. App.) 264 P. 310, wherein is is said: "The sale to the state was for the delinquent taxes of 1917. The assessment roll for that year was introduced in evidence by defendant-appellant. This showed that the lots were assessed separately to the same owner, but the auditor extended the tax on the sum of their assessed valuations, the total tax being $1.59. This total he divided into two parts, one of 80 cents, the other of 79 cents, and entered them in the several columns as first and second installments of the tax, respectively. It is the contention of appellant that this invalidated the assessment, and therefore made void the deed to the state. This contention cannot be sustained. In the first place, the extension of the tax by the auditor is no part of the assessment of the property, and, assuming that it was improperly done, it is one of the proceedings, of the regularity of which section 3787 of the Political Code provides that the deed to the state shall be conclusive evidence."

The contention of appellant is that, irrespective of what the assessment and its extensions might show, it was lacking in effect because there was no mathematical diagram of the process by which the total was reached. Without showing or claiming injury or chance of being misled, he argues that with the tax rate a thing fixed, established and known, the validity of the assessment upon the roll showing just how much tax was collectible against each piece, separately valued and separately listed. This information is readily obtainable from the roll itself, and becomes, as indicated, a mere matter of calculation. In the instant case there is not the slightest semblance of claim that the properties or any portion thereof were sold for even a penny more or less than the amount actually due thereon by reason of the delinquency following the regular assessment. While we again concede that there are certain established requirements necessary to a valid assessment of property, it must be true that each of the requirements is founded upon some adequate and reasonable principle of law. The courts do not start with the presumption that the entire system of taxation is unlawful or harmful. On the other hand, it is universally recognized that taxation is essential to our welfare and maintenance, and requirements as to manner and form are always founded on some reason. See Davis v. Pacific Imp. Co., 137 Cal. pages 250, 251, 70 P. 15. Finally appellant attacks the constitutionality of the sections of the Political Code under which the sales of the property were held. The contentions of appellant in this regard have been fully considered in the case of Jacoby v. Wolff, 198 Cal. 667, 247 P. 195, and the detriment adverse to his claim here. Such other grounds for reversal urged by appellant, which are not repetition of those already considered, we deem without merit. Particularly is this so because no authority is cited, but an attack on the entire law is made from shifting premises and too general conclusions.

98 Cal. App. 723

Ex parte McVEITY. (Cr. 1791.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 11, 1929.

1. Automobiles ⚷359—Statute limiting authority to impose sentence after jury's recommendation and statute authorizing court granting probation to impose fine, must be construed together (Vehicle Act, § 112 as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436; Pen. Code, § 1203 as amended by St. 1927, p. 1493).

Amendment of Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553), § 112 (St. 1927, p. 1436), limiting authority to impose sentence after recommendation of sentence by jury, and amendment of Pen. Code, § 1203 (St. 1927, p. 1493), authorizing court, in granting probation, to impose fine as condition of probation, which went into effect simultaneously, must be construed together and harmonized as far as their language permits.

2. Fines ⚷11—Imposing fine as condition of probation is not "judgment imposing fine" within statute authorizing imprisonment until fine is satisfied (Pen. Code, § 1205).

Imposition of a fine as a condition of probation is not "judgment imposing fine" within meaning of Pen. Code, § 1205, providing that judgment that defendant pay fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until fine be satisfied.

3. Criminal law ⚷982—Nonpayment of fine imposed as condition of probation results in loss of right to probation.

Only permissible effect of nonpayment of fine imposed as condition of probation is that by reason of such nonpayment right to be admitted to probation is thereby lost, and thereupon probation may be revoked and court may proceed to impose sentence, or, if sentence has been pronounced, carry it into execution.

4. Automobiles ⚷359—Court may impose fine as condition to probation of one violating Vehicle Act, provided punishment resulting is not greater than that jury recommends (Pen. Code, § 1203, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1493; Vehicle Act, § 112, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436).

In order admitting defendant, convicted of violating Vehicle Act, to probation, court may, as condition of probation, impose fine in accordance with authority conferred by Pen. Code, § 1203, provided terms of order do not in themselves clearly amount to imposition of punishment greater than that recommended by jury as prohibited by section 112 of Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436).

5. Criminal law ⚷982—Court has wide discretion in admitting persons to probation (Pen. Code, § 1203 as amended by St. 1927, p. 1493).

A very wide discretion is intended by Pen. Code, § 1203, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1493, to be vested in court in exercising its power to admit to probation a person convicted of crime.

6. Criminal law ⚷982—Where jury recommended punishment for violating Vehicle Act at 90 days and court granted probation and ordered fine of $500 as condition and imprisonment of one day for each $2 of fine, defendant not paying fine was not entitled to peremptory discharge from custody (Vehicle Act, § 112 as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436).

Where petitioner was convicted of driving automobile on highway while under influence of liquor in violation of Vehicle Act, and jury recommended imprisonment in jail for 90 days as authorized by section 112 (St. 1923, p. 553, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436), and court granted probation, but ordered fine of $500 as condition and that petitioner be imprisoned in jail at rate of 1 day for each $2 of fine until fine was paid, petitioner was not entitled to peremptory discharge from custody as one admitted to probation.

Application by Holland McVeity for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of San Diego County to secure petitioner's release from custody. Petitioner remanded to custody.

O. C. Ludwig, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Stephen Connell, Dist. Atty., and E. N. Clark, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Upon information filed, petitioner was tried and convicted of the crime of driving an automobile upon a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor. The jury in its verdict recommended that the defendant be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for a term of 90 days. The defendant applied for probation. The minutes of the court for March 1, 1929, show that the application for probation having been heard, "the court orders the application for probation submitted, and by the court it is ordered that the defendant be granted probation, and that he pay a fine in the sum of five hundred dollars, and on failure to pay said fine that he be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of San Diego at the rate of one day for each two dollars of the said fine, and the defendant is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of San Diego county, to be by him held until said fine is paid, as will more fully appear in the probation order signed and filed herein hereafter." The probation order signed by the judge, of the same date, contains the same statement of the conditions of probation, together with some other particulars and regulations of the conduct of the defendant while under probation. In the signed order it is recited that "the imposing of sentence upon the defendant" was suspended. The fine remains unpaid.

Upon application of petitioner to the Supreme Court, a writ of habeas corpus was issued and made returnable before this court, and the petitioner was admitted to bail pending the disposition of this proceeding.

Section 112 of the California Vehicle Act, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, after prescribing the limits of punishment by fine or imprisonment for an offense of the description here involved, provides that upon every verdict of guilty under said section "the jury shall recommend the punishment and the court in imposing sentence shall have no authority to impose a sentence greater than that recommended by the jury."

Section 1203 of the Penal Code, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1493, provides that, where the matter of probation is being considered, if the court shall determine that there are circumstances in mitigation of the punishment prescribed by law, or that the ends of justice would be subserved, "the court shall have power in its discretion to place the defendant on probation as hereinafter provided." It is further provided: "The court, judge or justice thereof, in the order granting probation, may suspend the imposing, or the execution of the sentence and may direct that such suspension may continue for such period of time not exceeding the maximum possible term of such sentence, except as hereinafter set forth, and upon such terms and conditions as it shall determine. The court, judge or justice, in the order granting probation and as a condition thereof may imprison the defendant in the county jail for a period not exceeding the maximum time fixed by law in the instant case; may fine the defendant in such sum not to exceed the maximum fine provided by law in such case; or may in connection with granting probation, impose either imprisonment in the county jail, or fine, or both, or neither; may provide for reparation in proper cases; and may require bonds for the faithful observance and performance of any or all of the conditions of probation. * * *" Further on in the section it is provided that: "If the probationer should violate the terms and conditions of his probation and the court should deem it just or necessary to revoke such probation, then and in that event any period of time which such probationer may have served in jail or other detention place or any fine paid, under the terms and conditions of his probation shall be taken into consideration as a part of his punishment, and he shall have a credit therefor to be deducted from his term of confinement or from the amount of any fine imposed upon final judgment."

Where a defendant has been released upon probation, and the probation is being revoked and terminated, "the court may, if the sentence has been suspended, pronounce judgment after said suspension of the sentence for any time within the longest period for which the defendant might have been sentenced." It is further provided that the court shall have power at any time during the term of probation to revoke or modify its order of suspension of imposition or execution of sentence.

[1-3] The amendment of section 112 of the Vehicle Act, limiting the authority to impose sentence after recommendation of sentence by the jury, was approved May 25, 1927. The amendment of section 1203 of the Penal Code, authorizing the court in granting probation to impose a fine as a condition of probation, was approved May 26, 1927. The two statutes went into effect simultaneously. They should be construed together and harmonized as far as their language permits. It should be noted that the provisions of section 1203, while they authorize the imposition of a fine or imprisonment in the county jail as a condition of probation, do not state that there may be an order of imprisonment for nonpayment of the fine. Section 1205 of the Penal Code provides that a judgment that the defendant pay a fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied. But the imposition of a fine as a condition of probation is not, in our opinion, a judgment imposing a fine, within the meaning of section 1205. The only permissible effect of nonpayment of a fine imposed as a condition of probation is that, by reason of such nonpayment, the right to be admitted to probation is thereby lost. Thereupon the probation may be revoked and the court may proceed to impose the sentence provided by law, or, if sentence has been pronounced, carry it into execution.

Considering the provisions of section 1203 of the Penal Code alone, and comparing them with the probation order made by the court below, it does not appear that the court exceeded its authority. There is, however, an additional question: Did the court, under the guise of an order granting probation, really attempt to subject the defendant to a punishment greater than that recommended by the jury? Here we may look to the substance of the matter, regardless of form. It has been held that the language of section 112 of the California Vehicle Act (that "the court in imposing sentence shall have no authority to impose a sentence greater than that recommended by the jury") is meant to be used in the sense of character of punishment. People v. Ray (Cal. App.) 268 P. 382. So, in that case, where the jury recommended "imprisonment in the county jail," without stating any time limit, the court was authorized to sentence the defendant to any term of imprisonment within the maximum lawful term of imprisonment in the county jail for the stated offense.

[4-6] In the present proceeding it appears that in the case against petitioner in the superior court the jury's recommendation of imprisonment was for a term limited to 90 days. In such case the court "in imposing sentence" would not be authorized to send the defendant to jail for more than 90 days. Also, the court would be without authority "in imposing sentence" to impose a fine, since that would change the character of the recommended punishment. But in an order admitting the defendant to probation it may well be that in this, as in other cases, the court is authorized, as a condition of probation, to impose a fine in accordance with the authority conferred by section 1203 of the Penal Code; provided, however, that the terms of the order do not in themselves clearly amount to the imposition of a punishment greater than that recommended by the jury in the instant case. A very wide discretion is intended by the statute to be vested in the court in exercising its power to admit to probation a person convicted of crime. If we are to hold here, as petitioner seeks to have us do, that he is entitled to a peremptory discharge from custody as one admitted to probation, we must do so upon the theory not only that the probation order is severable, but that the court presumably would have admitted the defendant to probation without regard to the fine and imprisonment. We think that in this case we should not indulge in such presumption. Without denying to petitioner any substantial right, the case may be left open for further proceedings in the court below, where an appropriate order may be made without causing the defendant to suffer imprisonment in the county jail for more than 90 days.

It is ordered that petitioner be remanded to the custody of the sheriff, and that petitioner, as defendant in the action against him, be brought before the superior court of San Diego county for admission to probation under appropriate conditions to be prescribed by the court, not in conflict with this decision, or for judgment upon the conviction, as the said superior court shall determine.

PEOPLE v. GARCIA. (Cr. 1776.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 9, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 18, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 5, 1929.

1. Jury ⟹29(6)—Waiver of jury trial in felony case must be made in open court wherein district attorney and defendant's counsel join (Const. art. 1, § 7, as amended in 1927; Pen. Code, § 1042).

Under Const. art. 1, § 7, as amended in 1927, relating to waiver of trial by jury, and Pen. Code, § 1042, in criminal actions involving charges of felony, the sovereignty represented by one of its regularly designated members as district attorney and the defendant may waive a trial by jury by expressing in open court their intention to that effect, and in such waiver defendant's counsel must join.

2. Jury ⟹25(3)—Defendant's failure to object to felony trial proceeding without jury held insufficient "waiver" of jury trial (Const. art. 1, § 7, as amended in 1927).

Defendant's failure to object to felony trial proceeding without a jury held insufficient to constitute valid waiver of right to trial by jury under Const. art. 1, § 7, as amended in 1927.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Waiver.]

3. Criminal law ⟹918(1)—Grant of new trial in felony case because defendant had not properly waived right to jury trial held proper (Pen. Code, § 1181; Const. art. 1, § 7, as amended in 1927).

Under Pen. Code, § 1181, relating to grant of new trial, grant of new trial in felony case because defendant had not personally announced or consented to a trial without a jury, as required under Const. art. 1, § 7, as amended in 1927, and that his counsel was without authority alone to give consent, held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

Tony Garcia was found guilty of grand theft. His motion for new trial was granted, and the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker and William R. McKay, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of Los Angeles, for the People.

C. L. Belt and E. S. Green, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Henry G. Bodkin, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

CRAIG, J. The respondent was charged by information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county with the crimes of grand theft and a violation of the Motor Vehicle Act. On the date set for trial the respective counsel announced that a trial by jury was waived. Witnesses were sworn and testified, and the court found the defendant guilty of grand theft only. Three days thereafter a motion for a new trial was filed, which was granted, upon the ground that the defendant had not personally announced, or consented to, a trial without a jury, and that his counsel was without authority alone so to do. The people appealed from said ruling, urging as reasons for reversal that the Penal Code does not authorize the granting of a new trial upon the ground asserted, that the defendant waived the right to a jury by submitting to the jurisdiction of the court, and that in any event section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution requires that the judgment be restored because there was no miscarriage of justice in finding him guilty upon the evidence adduced.

[1, 2] Section 1042 of the Penal Code provides that: "Issues of fact must be tried by jury, unless a trial by jury be waived in criminal cases not amounting to felony." Prior to 1927 section 7, art. 1, of the Constitution provided that: "A trial by jury may be waived in all criminal cases not amounting to felony, by the consent of both parties, expressed in open court." The term "parties" is defined by section 684 of the Penal Code as meaning the people of this state and the person charged with the offense, and it has been held that it does not include counsel for the defendant. People v. Jung Qung Sing, 70 Cal. 469, 11 P. 755. Under the Constitution and statutes as then existing it was repeatedly held that neither the defendant nor his counsel could waive the right to a jury trial in a felony case. People v. Deegan, 88 Cal. 602, 26 P. 500; People v. Met. Surety Co., 164 Cal. 174, 128 P. 324, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1181; Ex parte Bracklis, 52 Cal. App. 274, 198 P. 659; People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 193 P. 92; Amos v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 677, 239 P. 317. In 1927 the section of the Constitution above mentioned was amended to embrace all criminal prosecutions, upon certain specified conditions, as distinguished from civil proceedings. It reads as follows:

> "The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate; but in civil actions three-fourths of the jury may render a verdict. A trial by jury may be waived in all criminal cases, by the consent of both parties, expressed in open court by the defendant and his counsel, and in civil actions by the consent of the parties, signified in such manner as may be prescribed by law. In civil actions and cases of misdemeanor, the jury may consist of twelve, or of any number less than twelve, upon which the parties may agree in open court." See St. 1927, p. 2367.

The inviolate constitutional right to a trial by 12 of his peers, whose verdict upon conviction must be unanimous, is secured to every person charged with a felony. The Legislature may prescribe the methods of procedure in this respect in civil cases, but in criminal actions involving charges of felony, the sovereignty represented by one of its regularly designated members as district attorney, and the defendant, may waive a trial by jury by expressing in open court their intention to that effect, and in this waiver the defendant's counsel must join. From previous rulings and the express language of the Constitution, it is at once obvious that this inviolate constitutional right may not be taken away in disregard of the fundamental legal privilege and power of election guaranteed to the party charged, by attempting to vest in his representative the dual capacity and authority of counsel and accused. Not only is the Constitution explicit as to the parties who may consent to waive a trial by jury, but it is equally definite as to the form in which the consent must be given, for the provision is that it must be "expressed in open court." Nothing could be more clear than this language. To say that a mere failure to object to the trial proceeding without a jury is sufficient is to ignore the plain mandate of the Constitution in its use of the phrase last above quoted.

[3] Although apparently not heretofore ruled upon in this state, the question presented has in other jurisdictions, and we think properly, been urged as a ground for new trial. Section 1181 of our Penal Code provides that a new trial may be granted upon either of several specified grounds, one of which is error in the decision of any question of law arising during the course of the trial. In numerous instances our Supreme Court has held that every step after an issue of fact is joined, up to and including the rendition of a verdict or judgment, must be regarded as a step or proceeding "arising during the course of the trial." People v. Turner, 39 Cal. 370; Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 80 P. 234; Alpers v. Hunt, 86 Cal. 78, 24 P. 846, 9 L. R. A. 483, 21 Am. St. Rep. 17; Stow v. Superior Court, 178 Cal. 140, 172 P. 598; People v. Galloway, 202 Cal. 81, 259 P. 332. In Hasey v. McMullen, 109 Minn. 332, 123 N. W. 1078, it was held that an order denying a jury when the case was called in its regular order upon the calendar, was an "error of law occurring at the trial," and a proper subject of a motion for new trial. In Alley v. State ex rel. Blenzinger, 76 Ind. 94, the same rule was applied. It is quite apparent that the respondent was deprived of a constitutional right which he did not waive in the manner required by the organic law of this state, and that the order entered pursuant to an attempted but abortive waiver was error which the trial court had power to rectify upon a motion for new trial.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

COLLECTION SERVICE CORPORATION v. CONLIN. (Civ. 5124.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 8, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⚷171(3)—Where plaintiff and court accepted allegation as putting question in issue, appellate court, on defendant's appeal, cannot determine that pleading was insufficient to put question in issue.

Where both court and counsel for plaintiff accepted defendant's allegation as putting in issue question whether there had been publication of certificate of plaintiff's fictitious name and a filing of affidavit of publication, appellate court, on defendant's appeal, could not determine pleading to be insufficient to put such question in issue.

2. Names ⚷10—Assignee of "Alles Printing Company" could not maintain action on account where assignor had not published certificate of fictitious name (Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468).

Assignee of "Alles Printing Company" could not maintain action on assigned book account in absence of a publication of certificate of fictitious name by assignor, as required by Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468, since designation used was fictitious so as to require certificate to be published.

3. Assignments ⚷137—Evidence held sufficient to justify finding of assignment of account.

Evidence held sufficient to justify finding of assignment of account by one conducting business under fictitious name.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action upon an open book account by the Collection Service Corporation against Clarence B. Conlin. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Superseding former opinion in 275 P. 513.

E. R. Simon and William M. Morse, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. P. Michael Narlian, of Los Angeles, Harold N. Nuzum, of Glendale, Joseph N. Beardslee, and A. Smallberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J. The plaintiff recovered a judgment in the court below in the sum of $497.70 against the defendant upon an open book account, the plaintiff being the assignee of the "Alles Printing Company," and the defendant appeals therefrom.

[1] The first contention of appellant is that there is no finding that any certificate of fictitious name was ever published as required by sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code, by the "Alles Printing Company," respondent's assignor, and no proof of compliance with those sections. The court did find as follows: "That at all times herein mentioned, Fred L. Alles was doing business under the registered fictitious name of Alles Printing Company." The answer not only denies the allegation of the complaint to which the finding is in form responsive, but also "alleges that the Alles Printing Company is a concern doing business under a ficititious name and that they have not complied with the statutes made and provided for in such cases." There is no finding upon this allegation, in so far as the statute relates to publication—conceding without deciding that the finding that the ficitious name was registered was equal to a finding that it was filed, as required by the statute—and no evidence in the record to justify a finding that the name was published. Our attention is naturally directed first to the indefinite and uncertain nature of the allegation of the answer. It is without doubt subject to criticism and should have been the object of an attack by the respondent in the lower court. However, it was not. In fact, at the very beginning of the trial, counsel for defendant resisted the introduction of any testimony until proof had been made of compliance with the sections of the Code already mentioned. Both court and counsel for respondent accepted the allegation as putting in issue the question whether there had been a publication of the certificate and a filing of the affidavit of publication. The theory upon which the cause was tried was that where the name of the party who owns the business is used in the name of the company, the name is not fictitious and compliance with the Code sections is unnecessary. Under such circumstances it would be manifestly improper for the appellate court to determine the pleading to be insufficient to put the fact in issue. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank v. Pac. Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 297, 47 P. 60; Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 110, 103 P. 332; Fighiera v. Radis, 180 Cal. 660, 182 P. 418.

[2] Counsel for respondent after failure to produce to the trial court a case sustaining his theory that, where the name of the party who owns the business is used in a company name, compliance with the Code sections is not essential to the maintenance of the action,

offered in evidence a "certified copy of the record," which record consisted solely of a certificate signed by Fred L. Alles that he was doing business under the fictitious name of "Alles Printing Company" without any affidavit of publication as required. We are therefore brought directly to the question whether the designation used is in the eyes of the law fictitious so as to require the certificate to be published. It would serve no useful purpose for us to discuss at length the meaning of the word fictitious, for the reason that our Supreme Court has definitely established the law applicable to the instant situation. In North v. Moore, 135 Cal. 621, 67 P. 1037, it said: " 'Abrams Bros.' cannot be said to be a designation 'showing the names of the persons interested as parties.' The firm name might apply equally to a partnership composed of two or more and might embrace all or only some of the brothers of the name of Abrams." In Schwarz & Gottlieb, Inc., v. Marcuse, 175 Cal. 401, 165 P. 1015, in which case it was held that it was necessary to publish the certificate and file the affidavit where the name P. H. Murphy & Son was used, the court took occasion in commenting upon the opinion in Patterson v. Byers, 17 Okl. 633, 89 P. 1114, 10 Ann. Cas. 810, to say with reference thereto as follows: " * * * The last case * * * announces the remarkable conclusion that 'Patterson Furniture Company' shows that there is a company composed of persons whose surname is Patterson; and that 'it further shows that there are no other members of the firm except those whose surname is Patterson.' Evidently the learned justice who wrote that opinion overlooked the fact that commonly the title 'Patterson Furniture Company' might indicate a corporation or copartnership in which the stockholders or members might or might not be Pattersons." And again, in Andrews v. Glick (Cal. Sup.) 272 P. 587, it was held that those using the name "Andrews-Cordano Plumbing Company" could not maintain an action until after compliance with the sections of the Code for the reason that the name does not inform third persons of the exact membership of the company. These quotations are peculiarly pertinent to the designation under consideration and conclude respondent's argument in this particular. The farthest our courts have gone is to say that those partnership names are not assumed or fictitious in which the surnames of all the partners are used and joined together by the conjunction and, such, for example, as "Pendleton & Williams." The action cannot, therefore, be maintained in the absence of a compliance with the requirements of the sections already mentioned.

[3] The next contention of appellant is that an assignment to the respondent by the "Alles Printing Company" was not proved, the trial court having found that it was. There was proof that Fred L. Alles owned the business and operated under that name. There was proof that he signed and executed the assignment. This was sufficient to justify the finding complained of.

Other specifications of insufficiency of the evidence are made. We have examined each of them and find that there was sufficient to uphold every finding of the court attacked in this manner.

Judgment reversed.

1. Accord and satisfaction 🔑25(4)—Evidence of agreement satisfying indebtedness and canceling note therefor held immaterial as showing accord and satisfaction not specially pleaded.

Testimony as to agreement, whereby indebtedness evidenced by note sued on was satisfied and note canceled, held immaterial as tending to prove accord and satisfaction, which was not specially pleaded.

Objection to evidence of unpleaded accord and satisfaction, which court stated he would hear and strike out if inadmissible, held not waived by failure to move to strike.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1039(13)—Admission of evidence of unpleaded accord and satisfaction held prejudicial error.

Admission of testimony as to agreement, whereby indebtedness evidenced by note sued on was satisfied and note canceled, though accord and satisfaction was not specially pleaded, held prejudicial error, especially in view of trial judge's statement that he was not greatly impressed with defendant's testimony, but that there was no one to contradict his two witnesses.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by S. H. Harris against M. N. Reingold. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Shapiro & Shapiro, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry Haves, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J. Plaintiff sued on a promissory note in the sum of $728.48. The defendant answered, admitting the execution of the note, alleging lack of consideration, and denying that there was any sum unpaid, due, or payable. At the trial the defendant offered to prove an agreement between the payee and the defendant whereby the indebtedness evidenced by the note was satisfied and the note canceled. An objection was interposed by the plaintiff on the ground that the testimony was incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and tending to vary the terms of a written instrument, attention being called to the fact that payment was not pleaded. The court overruled the objection with the statement: "I will hear the testimony and strike it out in the event it is not admissible." No motion to strike was made. The court found that the note had been paid and canceled and that no obligation from the defendant to the plaintiff existed. Judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

[1] Appellant contends that the testimony admitted was proof of an accord and satisfaction, which must be specially pleaded before the same may be introduced, and that the evidence was therefore irrelevant and immaterial. In the case of B. & W. Engineering Co. v. Beam, 23 Cal. App. 164, 137 P. 624, the court said: "At one time, in this state, there existed a confusion if not a conflict of authority upon the question as to whether or not the defense of accord and satisfaction was required to be specially pleaded. * * * It was held in the case of Fitch v. [Brockmon] 2 Cal. 575, that it was error to consider the defense of accord and satisfaction unless specially pleaded" and in "Coles v. Soulsby, 21 Cal. 47, * * * it was held that the defense of accord and satisfaction involved new matter which, if established, would avoid the action, and therefore should be specially pleaded. Later this was declared to be so because under our practice as codified a general denial puts in issue only the allegations of the complaint, and consequently would not suffice to apprise the adverse party of the new matter which he would be required to encounter and overcome at the trial. (Glazer v. Clift, 10 Cal. 303.) * * * But the rule declared and followed in the series of cases commencing with Piercy v. Sabin, 10 Cal. 22, 70 Am. Dec. 692, has not only never been disputed or departed from, but it has been cited with approval in the comparatively recent case of Wilson v. California R. R. Co., 94 Cal. 166, 29 P. 861, 17 L. R. A. 685. It may, therefore, be said with certainty that the settled rule of pleading in this state requires an agreement of accord and satisfaction to be specially pleaded before it can be availed of as a defense." (Italics ours.)

Since there can be no doubt that the testimony offered and adduced constituted an accord and satisfaction, we must say, under this authority, that the immateriality of the offered testimony and of the error resulting from its admission is established. This brings us to the question, Could the court, by committing error, lead counsel to waive his objection by failure to move to strike? In answering this question we shall treat the subject as if the court had said, "I will hear the testimony and counsel may later move to strike it out," although it will be noted that the court's language was very different, in form at least.

[2, 3] In the case of Clopton v. Clopton, 162 Cal. 27, 121 P. 720; 48 A. L. R. 493, it appeared that the trial judge received evidence subject to objection, reserving its ruling, and decided the case without reconsidering the matter. It was held that the admissibility of the evidence could be considered on appeal. It was said: "The court reserved its ruling, receiving the evidence subject to the objection. Apparently it has never formally ruled on this objection, except in so far as a ruling against the objection is to be inferred from the fact that the court has found upon the facts so testified to in favor of plaintiff. The matter must here be regarded as though defendants' objections had been formally overruled and exceptions noted to such rulings."

The court further says in the Clopton Case: "In passing, it is proper to say, as has been said before, that the practice of receiving evidence that is objected to, subject to the objection and without a ruling thereon, is not, except under very exceptional circumstances, to be commended. And where such a course is followed, certainly a ruling should be made prior to the conclusion of the trial and in time to enable the party to fully present his case in the light of such ruling."

In the case of Evangelical Synod v. Schoeneich, 143 Mo. 652, 45 S. W. 647, it appeared that the trial court admitted evidence over an objection, saying at the time that he would later consider the objection, but the matter was not brought to his attention again. The Supreme Court said: "The logical effect of the ruling of the court was to overrule the objection, and nothing more was required of defendant in order that he might have that ruling reviewed by this court than to save his exceptions thereto at the time, and call the attention of the court thereto in the motion for a new trial."

Likewise, in Root v. Kansas City So. R. Co., 195 Mo. 348, 92 S. W. 621, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 212, wherein it appeared that incompetent testimony, prejudicial to the defendant, was admitted over its objection, on the condition that the plaintiff would later connect the testimony with other testimony, which he never did, it was held that the plaintiff's motion for a new trial on account of the admission of such evidence should have been allowed, although he had made no motion to strike the evidence from the record after it appeared that it would not be made competent by connecting it with other testimony. The court said: "In this case, the motion for a new trial was overruled and in our opinion the trial court erred in that ruling. And this is so in spite of the insistence of respondent that appellant should have renewed its attack by a motion to strike out. Appellant was not in fault, why should it ask a second time for what was denied it at first, because of a promise of respondent broken thereafter? It was respondent who did the mischief, who tolled the court into error, and it was he who thence onward carried the burden of undoing the wrong and who must bear the blame."

In the New York case of Herzfeld v. Reinach, 44 App. Div. 326, 60 N. Y. S. 658, the court said: "The method adopted by the referee in reserving his decision upon objections and motions made by the respective parties during the progress of the trial, and then not disposing of such objections before the final submission of the case so that the party ruled against may have his exception to the ruling noted, if he so desires, cannot be sanctioned by this court. * * * We think it must be held, when objections are made during the progress of the trial to the reception of evidence or motions are made to strike out the same after it has been received, and the referee omits to rule upon such objections or motions at the time they were made or before the close of the trial, that then such objections and motions must be considered upon review the same as if they had been decided in favor of the successful party and an exception duly taken thereto, unless the successful party can show that the omission to make the rulings did not and could not by any possibility have injured the defeated party."

Our court has summarized the law very succinctly in the case of Short v. Frink, 151 Cal. 83, 90 P. 200, where it says: "It was not necessary for defendant, in order to save this point, to make a motion to strike out the testimony after it was read. It is only where it is not apparent from the question itself that the response thereto will, upon any theory of the case, be inadmissible, and the inadmissible evidence is for the first time disclosed by the answer that the rule declared in People v. Lawrence, 143 Cal. 148, 155, 76 P. 893, 68 L. R. A. 193, is applicable, and a motion to strike out is essential to preserve the right of the objector to complain. Where the question upon its face shows that the testimony called for is necessarily inadmissible, the rights of a party are fully preserved by his objection to the proposed evidence, and his exception to the ruling admitting the same. In fact, this is the only way in which he can preserve his objection where the question is of such a character, and the answer is strictly responsive to the question. See People v. Long, 43 Cal. 444; People v. Scalamiero, 143 Cal. 343, 345, 76 P. 1098." Nor can it be urged that appellant was not prejudiced. We must assume that he came into court prepared to try the case upon the issues which had been framed and unprepared to try any other or different issues. We have no way, it is true, of saying what might have been introduced in rebuttal of this new defense had appellant been prepared to meet it. But we do have the very significant statement of the trial judge, which throws into bold relief the prejudice suffered by the appellant by this erroneous admission of testimony. He said: "I will say very frankly that I am not greatly impressed with the testimony of the defendant, but there are two witnesses and nobody to contradict them." In the face of this statement it is impossible for us to say that the appellant did not suffer great damage.

Judgment reversed.

WEINTRAUB v. WEINGART et al.

(Civ. 5294.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 8, 1929.

1. Landlord and tenant ⚷104—Agreement by lessee to hold lease in trust for corporation, whereby lessee parted with dominion over lease, though holding majority of corporate stock, held assignment of lease violating covenant against assignment (Civ. Code, §§ 2258, 2267).

In action in unlawful detainer against lessee for wrongful assignment of lease containing covenant against assignment without lessor's consent, evidence of agreement between lessee and corporation organized by lessee, constituting lessee naked trustee to hold lease for use and benefit of corporation to pay all rentals and obligations under lease intended to take place of assignment, showed assignment of lease to corporation under trust agreement whereby lessee parted with all rights of dominion over lease, under Civ. Code, §§ 2258, 2267, though lessee held majority of corporate stock, but there was nothing to prevent his disposing of stock to outsider.

2. Landlord and tenant ⚷104—Lessee's application to issue stock for lessee's assets, including lease, and permit to issue stock in consideration of assignment of such assets, held recognition that lease was assigned.

Application by lessee of hotel to corporation commissioner for permit to issue to himself shares of corporation in consideration of sale and transfer to corporation of lessee's assets, including hotel lease, and subsequent application reciting issuance of stock in conformity with terms of permit to issue stock in consideration of assignment by him of all property and assets listed, held recognition by lessee that transaction amounted to assignment of lease in violation of provision against assignment without lessor's consent.

3. Landlord and tenant ⚷104—Whether instrument is assignment of lease is determined by its legal effect, not form (Civ. Code, § 3528).

Whether or not instrument is to be deemed an assignment of lease is to be determined by legal effect, and not form of instrument under Civ. Code, § 3528.

4. Landlord and tenant ⚷104—Instrument, if substituting third party for lessee without providing reversionary interest in lessee, is "assignment."

If legal effect of instrument is to substitute third party for lessee, conferring on third party right to benefits, and subjecting him to burden of lease for balance of term, without providing for any reversionary interest in original lessee, it will be held to amount to an "assignment."

5. Landlord and tenant ⚷112(2)—Landlord receiving checks from assignee of lessee while out of state, but falsely informed on return assignee had no interest in lease, held not estopped from terminating lease for wrongful assignment.

In action in unlawful detainer against lessee for wrongful assignment of lease containing covenant against assignment without lessor's consent, evidence that checks for lessor's interests in profits were drawn by assignee of lease, but that lessor was out of state at time and immediately on return inquired as to assignment, and evidence that lessee wrote lessor's attorney that assignee had no interest in lease, which statements were false, did not show lessor was estopped to terminate lease because of assignment.

Estoppel is based on knowledge of facts and acquiescence in situation developed thereby, on part of party against whom it is claimed; no estoppel being possible where facts are not known.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by S. L. Weintraub against Ben Weingart and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ingall W. Bull and Harold Larson, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Willebrandt & Horowitz, Frank P. Doherty, and Girard F. Baker, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURNELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action in unlawful detainer. The cause of action set up in the complaint was grounded upon the alleged assignment by the defendant and appellant Weingart of a lease containing a covenant against assignment. The answer denied that there had been any assignment, and by way of a second defense pleaded estoppel.

The grounds urged by appellants in seeking a reversal of the judgment are: First, that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the lease had been assigned; second, that it is insufficient to support the finding that respondent was not estopped to question or complain of the assignment if in fact there was an assignment. The facts, in so far as they are necessary to be summarized for an understanding of the situation of the parties and their actions with respect to the lease in question, are as follows: January 20, 1922, respondent, by written lease, leased the Ponet Hotel, Los Angeles, to appellant Weingart for a term of 10 years commencing April 1, 1922, and ending March 30, 1932. Among other things this lease provided that: "Said leased premises are to be conducted and operated by said lessee as a hotel and office rooms, and as his compensation for so managing and operating said leased premises as such hotel, said lessee is to receive and be paid one-third of the net profits derived therefrom. * * *" The other two-thirds were to be "retained" by the lessor as rental. On or before the 10th of each month an accounting was to be had. The operating expenses were not to include "any salary or allowance to the lessee for his services in operating said hotel." The lessee covenanted "to keep said premises and all appurtenances thereto in a clean and wholesome condition and to comply faithfully" with all city and state laws during said term. The clause relating to assignment was as follows: "The said lessee hereby covenants that he will not assign this lease, or any part thereof, without the previous written consent of said lessor, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns; and that any assignment of said lease shall be voidable at the option of the lessor who may upon such breach, immediately reenter and take possession of said premises and the whole thereof without giving any notice."

Weingart went into possession, and in April and May of 1922 respondent received checks representing his share of the net profits, signed by Lincoln Investment Company. Early in June respondent left for Europe. During the early part of 1922 appellant Weingart, who was then operating a large number of hotels in Los Angeles, organized the Lincoln Investment Company for the purpose of carrying on his business affairs through that corporation, and in June, 1922, applied to the corporation commissioner for a certificate authorizing it to sell its securities. This application recited that the corporation "proposes to purchase and acquire from Ben Weingart property and assets of the value of $590,761.72" subject to certain liabilities "as per statement submitted herewith, for 5500 shares of the capital stock of this corporation." Listed among the assets to be so acquired is the lease of the Ponet Hotel, valued at $15,000. Appended to the application as an exhibit appeared a copy of an agreement executed by the corporation and Weingart which contained this language:

"Whereas, the party of the second part is the lessee of the following described premises under and pursuant to leases on the premises now owned and held by the party of the second part (listing a great many, including the Ponet Hotel).

"And, whereas, said leases are not transferable without the written consent of the lessor named in said lease; and

"Whereas, in some instances it will be impossible to get the consent of said lessor to the transfer and assignment of some of said leases (it was therefore agreed) that the party of the second part (defendant Weingart) will hold each and all of said leases in trust for the use and benefit of the party of the first part (Lincoln Investment Company) until the expiration of the term specified in each lease." Also: "That the party of the first part will pay all rentals and obligations assumed by the party of the second part, in, by or through said leases, and each of them."

On June 7, 1922, the corporation commissioner issued a permit to the corporation, authorizing the sale of its securities and "to issue to Ben Weingart 5500 shares of its capital stock in consideration of the transfer and assignment by him to applicant, first to be made, of all the property and assets set forth and described in its application, subject to liabilities of $1,930."

Up to this time the corporation, as conceded by both parties, had no interest whatsoever in the lease in question. Thereafter a statement was sent to respondent each month, accompanied by the check of the corporation for the amount thereby shown to be due him as his two-thirds of the preceding month's profits. During respondent's absence abroad these checks were indorsed by his son and cashed.

In October, 1922, respondent returned to Los Angeles. Thereafter and until May, 1925, respondent each month received the monthly statements and check of the corporation and indorsed and cashed the latter. Each of these statements showed a distribution of profits, two-thirds to respondent and one-third to the Lincoln Investment Company.

On December 15, 1922, respondent wrote a letter to appellant Weingart which contained the following: "I notice also that your letter is signed 'Lincoln Investment Company, by L. H. Hall, Secretary,' and I would like to be informed as to whether you are doing business under the name of Lincoln Investment Company, or whether you have turned over this lease to a company known as Lincoln Investment Company."

No reply to this inquiry seems to have been made, and on January 22, 1923, respondent signed and had served upon Weingart and the corporation a "notice of termination of tenancy," reciting the lease clause forbidding assignment without respondent's written consent and alleging a violation thereof "by the assignment of said lease by the original lessee, Ben Weingart, to Lincoln Investment Company." On January 25, 1923, Weingart wrote to respondent, acknowledging receipt of this notice and saying: "You are in error when you claim that I have assigned the lease of the Ponet Hotel, referred to in your notice. The same has not been assigned."

In reply to that letter respondent's attorneys wrote to Weingart on January 27, 1923, as follows:

"Your letter dated January 25th, addressed to Mr. S. L. Weintraub was handed to me for attention.

"I note that you state he is in error with respect to the assignment of the lease of the Ponet Hotel.

"Mr. Weintraub does not desire to terminate your lease, if it is not true that you have assigned the same. However, his information is that you have executed an instrument whereby you agreed to hold this lease in trust for the use and benefit of the Lincoln Investment Company, and according to the information given us we have construed this to be an assignment. However, if you will send us an exact copy of the agreement, I will reexamine it for the purpose of determining whether or not there is really any controversy between us."

The reply to this letter was brief and pithy. It was as follows: "Gentlemen: Replying to your letter of the 27th inst. I beg to state that the Lincoln Investment Company has no interest whatsoever in or to the Ponet Hotel, or anything therein contained."

Upon receipt of this missive, plaintiff, believing it spoke the truth, dropped the matter. As a matter of fact, during all this time the income from the Ponet Hotel was received by the corporation and accounted for by it on its income tax return. This was stipulated at the trial. Furthermore, all bills for the hotel were paid by the corporation.

Respondent testified that he believed the statements in Weingart's letter of January 25, and those in the reply to the letter written by his attorneys on January 27, and also a statement made to him verbally by Weingart in the early part of January, 1923, to the effect that sending out checks signed by the Lincoln Investment Company "was just his way of doing business, so that he could adjust his taxes or pay his taxes to the federal government," and that this belief was his only reason for not going ahead with proceedings in unlawful detainer following the service of the notice above referred to.

The first definite information received by respondent which caused this belief to be shaken was, according to his testimony, when he had an auditor examine the books of the hotel in May, 1925. Thereafter he refused to accept the checks representing his share of the net profits, and on May 27 caused another notice of termination to be served. On June 1, 1925, respondent's attorney wrote to Weingart's attorney as follows: "I will state that our information now is that Mr. Weingart has actually made an assignment of the lease to the Lincoln Investment Company. I would be willing, however, to hold up the filing of the complaint if permission were given me to freely examine the books and records of the Lincoln Investment Company. If such an examination would disclose the fact that the lease was not assigned to the Lincoln Investment Company, of course I would not proceed further with the suit." On June 2, 1925, this action was commenced.

[1] We agree with the court below in its conclusion that there was an assignment of the lease by Weingart to the Lincoln Investment Company.

In the first place, the language above quoted from the agreement between Weingart and the corporation indicates that it was intended to take the place of an assignment in the usual form, because of the difficulty or impossibility of securing the consent of the lessor to such an assignment. In the second place, it constitutes Weingart a mere naked trustee to hold the lease in trust for the corporation, and for the latter's use and benefit, the corporation to "pay all rentals and obligations" assigned by Weingart in the lease.

After the execution of the trust agreement Weingart parted with all rights of dominion over the lease and the premises thereby demised. His position as trustee was akin to that of a mere agent or employee of the Lincoln Investment Company, the beneficiary under the trust. Sections 2258, 2267, Civ. Code. The corporation took the lessee's share of profits from the operation of the hotel and accounted therefor in its income tax return. It paid all expenses.

As such trustee Weingart might have been removed and the trust terminated at any time by the sole beneficiary, Lincoln Investment Company.

In the case of Eakle v. Ingram, 142 Cal. 15, 75 P. 566, 100 Am. St. Rep. 99, the plaintiff brought suit to dissolve the trust and discharge the trustee. Judgment went for the plaintiff, the court stating: "The judgment, we think, is right. The plaintiffs are the only persons beneficially interested in the property (Civ. Code, sec. 866; Morffew v. S. F. etc. R. R. Co., 107 Cal. 595 [40 P. 810]; 1 Perry on Trusts, sec. 320; Young v. Bradley, 101 U. S. 787 [22 L. Ed. 1044]), and in such cases the rule is as stated by Mr. Underhill: 'If there is only one beneficiary, or if there are several and they are all of one mind, and he or they are not under any disability, the specific performance of the trust may be arrested, and the trust modified or extinguished.' (Underhill on Trusts and Trustees, pp. 13, 370–375, and cases cited. See, also, 2 Perry on Trust, sec. 920; 1 Perry on Trusts, sec. 104; Civ. Code, secs. 2252, 2258; Lewin on Trusts, 684, 685; Hill on Trustees, 278; Tiffany & Bullard on Law of Trusts and Trustees, 815, 816.) The court below was therefore empowered to decree a dissolution of the trust, and a release of the trust property by the trustees; which is the effect of the judgment. * * * He [trustee] was a mere bare trustee, without interest, except that he might but for the decree have become entitled to compensation for services as trustee; but this furnishes no reason for the continuance of the trust."

True, Weingart held a majority of the stock of the corporation and while he so held it the corporation would not have been likely to have taken action to terminate the naked trust, but there was nothing to prevent Weingart from disposing of his stock to an outsider and nothing in law to at any time prevent the corporation—the separate legal entity known as Lincoln Investment Company—from seeking a termination of the trust and a merger of all rights in the lease in itself.

Appellants take the position that Weingart and the corporation were to all intents and purposes one and the same; hence, that a transfer to the corporation was in effect as though Weingart had merely taken the lease from one pocket and placed it in another. They argue that "for all practical purposes the corporation and Weingart personally are one," and that respondent "is exactly in the same postition as if defendant Weingart had never formed any corporation or transacted any business through the corporation and had never entered into the trust agreement." It is true that Weingart testified that he owned all of the corporation stock and that the certificates standing in the name of his wife, his foster-mother, and others had been indorsed by them and were in his possession, and that he considered himself the Lincoln Investment Company. On the other hand, there is the second application to the corporation commissioner signed by Weingart and verified, which states "that the following persons own all of the stock" (naming them). The corporation's statement of assets shows a value of $100 per share, and the stock standing in the names of others than Weingart had a value of approximately $232,666.

[2] If we are to adopt the view of counsel for appellants, as above set forth and as again stated in their closing brief, "that this was simply a one-man corporation with Weingart president, treasurer, general manager and in fact the whole corporation, and for all intents and purposes everything was as though Weingart personally owned all of the property of the corporation instead of the corporation owning it," we are faced with the fact that this "one-man corporation," in other words Weingart himself, according to his own theory as above stated, applied to the corporation commissioner for a permit to issue to Weingart 5500 shares of stock "in consideration of the sale and transfer to the corporation of the good will and assets of Ben Weingart as per statement attached," which statement listed the Ponet Hotel lease among the other assets, and pursuant to that application the corporation commissioner issued his permit "to issue to Ben Weingart 5500 shares of its capital stock in consideration of the transfer and assignment by him to applicant first to be made of all the property and assets set forth and described in its application, subject to liabilities of $1,930." (Italics ours.) A subsequent application to the commissioner recited the issuance of this stock "in conformity with" the terms of the first permit. Was not this a recognition by Weingart of the fact that the transaction amounted to an assignment? We think it was.

[3, 4] Whether or not an instrument is to be deemed an assignment of a lease is to be determined by the legal effect and not the form of the instrument. The law always respects form less than substance. Civ. Code, § 3528. If its legal effect is to substitute a third party for the lessee, conferring upon him the right to the benefits and subjecting him to the burden of the lease for the balance of the term thereof, without providing for any reversionary interest in the original lessee, it will be held to amount to an assignment.

Mr. Wood, in his work on Landlord and Tenant, § 258, thus states the rule: "An assignment, as contradistinguished from a sublease, signifies a parting with the whole term; and whenever the whole term is made over by the lessee, although in the deed by which that is done the rent and a power of re-entry for non-payment are reserved to himself, yet the instrument amounts to an assignment, and not a sublease."

"It is essential to a lease that some reversionary interest be left in the lessor, for if by an instrument purporting to be a demise he parts with his whole term, it will amount to an assignment of the term." Taylor, Landlord and Tenant, § 16.

In Craig v. Summers, 47 Minn. 189, 49 N. W. 742, 15 L. R. A. 236, it was held that whether or not an assignment of a lease had been made is a question of the legal effect and not of the form of the instrument. In that case the lessee had signed an instrument in the form of a sublease to a third party covering the whole of the premises demised under the original lease, and for the entire remainder of the term thereof. This was held to constitute an assignment.

In Walsh v. Martin, 69 Mich. 29, 37 N. W. 40, it was held that where the lessee turned over the lease and the premises to a third party, who thereupon went into possession and paid the rent to the lessor, "this constituted in law an assignment" although no instrument in form an assignment had been executed.

In the case of American Savings Bank v. Mafridge, 60 Wash. 180, 110 P. 1015, the court says: "'An assignment of a term for years occurs when the lessee transfers his entire interest therein without retaining any reversionary interest. If an instrument so transfers the lessee's interest, it constitutes an assignment regardless of its character and form.' (24 Cyc. 972). No particular form of assignment is necessary. Thus, as heretofore stated, a general lease, quitclaim, or other conveyance of the lease-hold premises may render the grantee an assignee."

Likewise, in the case of Taylor v. Marshall, 255 Ill. 545, 547, 99 N. E. 638, 639, the court says: "Where all of the lessee's estate is transferred the instrument will operate as an assignment notwithstanding that words of demise instead of assignment are used, and notwithstanding the reservation of rent and a right of reentry on the non-payment of rent or the non-performance of the other covenants contained in it. (Wood on Landlord and Tenant, sec. 330.)"

In Glendening v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 163 App. Div. 489, 148 N. Y. S. 552, the lessee had sold a half interest in the business he had been conducting on the leased premises and subsequently executed powers of attorney to the purchaser to carry on the whole business and to hold, sell, assign, or surrender any interest that he, the original lessee, might have in the lease. It was held that such an agreement amounted to an assignment of the lease. In that case great care was taken in the agreement between the parties to state that it was not an assignment. The court states: "To my mind, this recital is greater evidence of a cunning attempt on the part of the draftsman to conceal his real object than of an honest purpose to protect a bona fide interest."

Again, there is a presumption of assignment which follows occupancy of the leased premises by another than the lessee, especially when the occupant pays the rent and cost of maintenance. Ecker v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 8 Mo. App. 223; Williams v. Woodard, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 487; Acker v. Witherell, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 112. Speaking of this presumption, Mr. Jones (Landlord and Tenant, § 442) says: "That an assignment of a lease causes a forfeiture does not prevent the usual inference arising from an occupation. There is no reason why a presumption of an assignment would not arise, even in a proceeding to enforce the forfeiture. The fact that an assignment will forfeit the lease is a strong motive for concealing the fact of assignment, and the character of the possession of the assignee. Thus the existence of such a condition of forfeiture in the lease is, if anything, an additional reason why a third person in possession should be presumed to be an assignee of the lease and compelled to explain the character of his possession." To the same point is Dickinson v. Fitterling, 69 Minn. 162, 71 N. W. 1030.

For the reasons and on the authorities above set forth we are constrained to hold that the evidence supported the finding of the existence of an assignment.

[5] Upon the question of estoppel little need be here added to the statement of the facts with which this opinion commenced. The evidence shows without conflict, it is true, that from very first the checks for the lessor's two-thirds of the hotel profits, drawn by the Lincoln Investment Company, were received and cashed, but it is also uncontradicted that in April and May, 1922, the corporation had no interest whatsoever in the lease or premises. From early June to October of that year respondent was out of the state, and when, upon his return, he noticed that the statements read "Lincoln Investment Company, one-third," he immediately inquired of Weingart as to the meaning of this and was assured by the latter that there had been no assignment. Following this Weingart wrote the respondent's attorney, stating that the Lincoln Investment Company "has no interest in or to the Ponet Hotel or anything therein contained." As late as May 29, 1925, Weingart's attorney stated in a letter to respondent's attorney "that the Lincoln Investment Company has no interest of any kind or character in the Weintraub lease and the lease is still held by Mr. Weingart."

[6] Appellants seem to have successfully lulled respondent's suspicions of the true state of affairs up to the time of commencing this action. This they did by making evasive and even false statements. They are in no position to urge an estoppel on respondent's part. An estoppel is based on a knowledge of the facts and acquiescence with the situation developed thereby on the part of the party against whom it is claimed. "There can be no estoppel where the facts are not known, as no one can be presumed to have waived that the existence of which he has not known." Wheaton v. North British, etc., Ins. Co., 76 Cal. 429, 18 P. 765, 9 Am. St. Rep. 216; Puterbaugh v. Wadham, 162 Cal. 618, 123 P. 804; Norton v. Overholtzer, 63 Cal. App. 388, 218 P. 637. "There can be no estoppel in pais where the party against whom the attempt is made to invoke such estoppel does not know the full truth of the facts to which his conduct, declarations, or representations constituting the basis of the alleged estoppel relate." Bisconer v. Billing, 71 Cal. App. 779, 236 P. 329; Eaton v. Wilkins, 163 Cal. 742, 127 P. 71; Bashore v. Parker, 146 Cal. 525, 80 P. 707; Davis v. Winona Wagon Co., 120 Cal. 244, 52 P. 487; Murphy v. Clayton, 113 Cal. 153, 45 P. 267; Ions v. Harbison, 112 Cal. 260, 44 P. 572. There is evidence going to show that respondent was never informed of the "trust agreement," or of the fact that the Ponet Hotel lease was listed among the assets which Weingart was to sell and transfer to the corporation, or that the corporation had been permitted to issue part of its stock to Weingart "in consideration of the transfer and assignment" (italics ours) to it by Weingart of the lease in question as one of his assets, or of the fact that the corporation included one-third of the receipts from the hotel in its income tax report. His request for a copy of whatever agreement existed between Weingart and the corporation was not complied with; instead he received an unequivocal statement that the corporation had no interest whatever in the Ponet Hotel.

The trial court very properly found that no estoppel existed.

Judgment affirmed.

JENKINS v. SUPERIOR COURT, COUNTY OF SANTA CLARA, et al. (Civ. 6828.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 13, 1929.

1. Costs ⚷132(5)—Petition by administratrix for leave to proceed in action for deceased's death in forma pauperis held properly denied, where cause of action was only asset, but petitioner did not show her brother could not advance costs and employed attorneys on contingent basis.

Petition by administratrix for leave to proceed in forma pauperis in action for deceased's wrongful death held properly denied, where cause of action was only asset of estate and petitioner received only $100 per month salary, but did not show that the other next of kin, her brother, was not in position to advance costs and petitioner had employed attorneys in action on contingent basis.

2. Costs ⚷130—Granting leave to sue in forma pauperis is largely discretionary.

Ordinarily, granting or denial of an application for leave to sue in forma pauperis is matter of discretion with court.

3. Costs ⚷132(5)—Leave to sue in forma pauperis should be granted only in clear case.

Leave should not be granted to sue in forma pauperis, unless a clear case is made for granting leave.

4. Mandamus 🔑143(2)—Application to compel court to grant leave to sue in forma pauperis, presented over year after denial of leave, was not seasonably made.

Application for writ of mandate to compel court to grant leave to sue in forma pauperis, presented a year and a half after denial of application for such leave, was not seasonably made and was not due diligence which law requires.

Application by Bess Virginia Jenkins, administratrix of the estate of Stanley Howard Jenkins, deceased, for a writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court of Santa Clara County, and the Judge thereof, to require respondent to permit petitioner to proceed in forma pauperis in a certain action pending therein. Writ denied.

Dowd & Reagh, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

D. T. Jenkins, of San Jose, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This is an original proceeding by mandamus to compel respondent judge to grant leave to petitioner to proceed in forma pauperis in a certain action pending in the superior court in and for the county of Santa Clara.

[1-3] It appears from the petition that petitioner is the administratrix of the estate of one Stanley Howard Jenkins, deceased, and that the only asset of said estate is a cause of action for his death. After the filing of a complaint for such alleged wrongful death, petitioner herein made application in the court below for leave to thereafter proceed in such action in forma pauperis, setting forth in her petition that the deceased, Stanley Howard Jenkins, left no estate, and that petitioner had no funds except such as she received from her employment, from which she derived the sum of $100 a month. It further appeared from the petition that the next of kin of the deceased is the petitioner and her brother, Charles Francis Jenkins. No showing was made that the brother was not in a position to advance the costs. It also appeared that petitioner had employed attorneys to represent her in the action upon a contingent basis. Upon the showing made the application was denied on the 28th day of October, 1927, and the present petition was filed in this court on March 4, 1929, about a year and a half thereafter.

We are of the opinion that respondent herein was justified in denying the petition. Applications for leave to sue in forma pauperis are not to be encouraged. Ordinarily, the granting or denial of such an application is largely a matter of discretion with the court, and while the granting of the privilege in a deserving case is perfectly just and proper, still it should not be extended by construction beyond its true scope and purpose. Leave should not be granted unless a clear case is made for its exercise. 15 Cyc. 236.

[4] Then, again, the present application is not seasonably made. As above set forth, the present petition is presented a year and a half after the denial of the application. This is not the due diligence that the law requires. 15 Cyc. 234.

The writ is denied.

and testament of Grace Edna Button, deceased. The appeal is taken upon a bill of exceptions, and, though the two minor sons of the deceased are named as party respondents, no one appeared for them in the proceeding before the probate court, and the appellant has filed the only brief on this appeal.

The petitioner herein was the husband of the deceased until April 4, 1928, when they were separated by a final decree of divorce. On August 25, 1928, the deceased committed suicide, and at the time of her death owned a house and lot situated on Twenty-Sixth avenue in the city and county of San Francisco. She is survived by two sons, 14 and 8 years of age, respectively, who are named in the petition as her sole heirs at law. In the room where she was found dead a letter addressed to her former husband, petitioner herein, and dated August 25, 1928, was found. This letter consisted of two pages written on both sides of the paper. It was an expression of love and affection for her former husband and her two sons, expressions of gratitude to a number of individuals who had performed acts of kindness to her, and expressions of regret that she found it necessary to end her life and that she was unable to renew the former associations of her husband and the care of her two children. In the course of this lengthy letter the following paragraph appears, upon which the appellant relies as constituting a will: "I'm wearing you out dear and when I am gone you can just breath one long sigh of contentment. I'd like to be cremated. You can have the house on 26th Ave. and all the things of value so you won't be out any money on burying me."

For the purpose of determining whether the document offered was testamentary in character the probate court permitted the petitioner to introduce evidence covering the facts which have heretofore been stated. On the conclusion of the hearing the trial court found that the document was not a last will and testament and entered its order that its admission to probate be denied.

[1] The order is affirmed for the reason that the very nature of the document itself and the circumstances under which it was written negative the thought that it was intended to be a last will and testament. The expressions of love and affection to the two sons appearing throughout the letter are of such a character that it cannot be assumed that the decedent would have intentionally deprived them of all their interest in the estate without making any provision for them of any character. The paragraph relied on by appellant is not of such definite and certain language as would require a holding that the decedent intended to leave all her property to her former husband to the exclusion of her two sons, who, in the absence of a will, were the sole heirs at law of her estate. A more reasonable interpretation of the document is that it was a letter of farewell to the father and the two sons, with the incidental request that the father provide for the cremation of the deceased from the proceeds of the property which she left.

[2] When it does not satisfactorily appear that the very paper tendered for probate was intended by the decedent to be a will it must be rejected. Estate of Anthony, 21 Cal. App. 157, 131 P. 96; Estate of Kelleher, 202 Cal. 124, 129, 259 P. 437, 54 A. L. R. 913; In re Richardson, 94 Cal. 63, 29 P. 484, 15 L. R. A. 635.

[3] The probate court apparently drew the conclusion, from all the circumstances before it, that the letter was not written with testamentary intent and that it was unreasonable to suppose that the decedent would cut off her two sons from participation in her estate in the same document in which she repeatedly expressed for them the greatest love and affection. The authorities are numerous which hold that the legal rights of the heirs at law should not be defeated by a strained or unreasonable construction of a paper as a will when the existence of a testamentary intention is not clear.

For the reasons first given, the order is affirmed.

In re BOOLE'S ESTATE. (Civ. 6805.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 11, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 10, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 8, 1929.

1. Taxation ⟹900(5)—Order fixing inheritance tax held appealable, together with intermediate rulings involving merits or affecting substantial rights (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 956, 963, subd. 3).

Where court confirmed report of inheritance tax appraiser reporting that transfer by deceased of property to wife and children was made in contemplation of death, order fixing inheritance tax on estate was a judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 956, from which appeal was permissible under section 963, subd. 3, to review order and verdict or decision and any intermediate ruling substantially affecting rights.

2. Appeal and error ⟹281(1)—Failure to properly move for new trial held immaterial, where appeal from final order fixing inheritance tax was valid (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 956, 963, subd. 3).

Where appeal from final order fixing inheritance tax was valid and permitted review of order and intermediate rulings involving merits or necessarily affecting judgment or substantial rights of party under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 956, 963, subd. 3, it was immaterial that motion for new trial was not properly made, since appellate power of appellate court was not thereby restricted.

3. Taxation 🔑893—Evidence held sufficient to support finding of transfer in contemplation of death within Inheritance Tax Law (Inheritance Tax Act, § 2, subd. 4).

In proceedings to impose inheritance tax, evidence of decedent's consultation with attorneys concerning disposition of property at time when decedent suffered stroke of paralysis, and concerning exemptions from state and federal inheritance taxes, and evidence that decedent executed transfers in trust and subsequently revoked prior will and made new will omitting trusts and died four years later from disease which had endured for five years, though tending to show absence of fear or expectation of immediate death, was sufficient to show transfer in contemplation of death, as defined in Inheritance Tax Act, § 2, subd. 4 (St. 1921, p. 1501).

4. Depositions 🔑44—Question to widow, "It is necessary * * * to determine whether * * * transfers were * * * in contemplation of death," though not in interrogatory form, held sufficient (Inheritance Tax Act).

Question asked surviving widow of deceased in deposition taken to obtain information whether transfers were taxable under Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1921, p. 1501), as made in contemplation of death, "It is necessary for us to determine whether transfers were made to you in contemplation of death," though not in interrogatory form, but treated as a question, was sufficient in form.

5. Depositions 🔑94—Answer to question whether transfer was in contemplation of death, "I think it was only as any man would feel," held sufficient (Inheritance Tax Act).

In deposition taken to obtain information whether transfers were taxable under Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1921, p. 1501), answer of witness to question whether transfers were made in contemplation of death, "I think it was only as any man would feel. He wanted to insure our safety," knowing stroke of paralysis was always dangerous, held sufficient in form, though beginning with words "I think," which words witness used in other parts of deposition to express degree of recollection.

6. Evidence 🔑471(9)—Testimony by widow as to husband's intention when making transfers held conclusion and inadmissible against other transferees against whom tax was levied (Inheritance Tax Act).

In deposition to obtain information whether transfers were taxable under Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1921, p. 1501), answer of widow to question whether transfer was made in contemplation of death that deceased wanted to insure safety of herself and children, and, knowing that stroke was always dangerous to any one, he wanted everything settled before anything happened to him, stated conclusion of witness with respect to what husband had in mind when making transfers, and was inadmissible against other transferees against whom tax was levied.

7. Appeal and error 🔑609—Supplemental transcript of conversation between court and jury after verdict, showing jury were uninfluenced by evidence erroneously admitted, could be filed but not considered in determining whether admission of evidence was reversible error (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Supplement to reporter's transcript showing conversation between court and members of jury immediately after recording of verdict and before discharge, to effect that jury were not influenced by evidence erroneously admitted, held entitled to be filed in appeal under alternative method under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, but substance of supplement cannot be taken into consideration in determining whether admission of evidence constituted reversible error.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1054(2)—Erroneous admission of evidence held not prejudicial, where different verdict would not have resulted and verdict was merely advisory.

Where evidence was erroneously admitted as conclusion of witness, but record did not show that different verdict would have been rendered, nor different judgment entered without error in admitting evidence, and verdict was advisory only, and court, though expressing doubt as to admissibility of evidence, accepted verdict and made its finding of fact in agreement with it, error in admitting evidence was no more serious than if trial was had without jury, and was not prejudicial.

9. Taxation 🔑893—Requested instruction to find transfers were not made in contemplation of death, if made in contemplation of traveling, held properly refused as unsupported by evidence.

In proceedings to impose inheritance tax on property transferred by deceased in contemplation of death, requested instruction directing jury to find that transfers were not made in contemplation of death, if they found transfers were made with certain enumerated objects in view, including desire of deceased to travel and guard against business reverses, was properly refused, where there was no showing that trusts were made in contemplation of travel.

10. Taxation 🔑893—Court need not enumerate all conditions under which transfers would not be taxable, where it stated transfers for any other reason than in contemplation of death would not be taxable (Inheritance Tax Act).

Where court, in proceedings to tax property, transferred in contemplation of death under Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1921, p. 1501), stated in effect that transfers made for any other reason than in contemplation of death would not be taxable, court was not required to enumerate all conditions under which transfers would not be taxable, especially where court did instruct on conditions under which transfers were not taxable to extent authorized by evidence.

11. Taxation 🔑893—Instruction that transfer is taxable, if made to avoid probate proceedings or tax, substantially following statute, held proper (Inheritance Tax Act).

In proceedings to impose inheritance tax on property transferred in contemplation of death, instruction that transfers would be taxable if decedent's motive was to avoid probate proceedings and deprive state of opportunity to collect tax, which instructions substantially followed language of Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1921, p. 1501) referring to transfers made in lieu of or to avoid passage of property transferred by testate or by intestate laws, was proper, where evidence was sufficient to support finding that transfers were so made, and motive must be inferred from acts of decedent and surrounding circumstances.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Proceedings by Ray L. Riley, as Controller of the State of California, to assess inheritance tax on the estate of Fred W. Boole, deceased, opposed by Fred W. Boole, Jr., as executor and on behalf of Dee Beck Boole and others as beneficiaries. From a judgment and order confirming a report of inheritance tax appraiser and denying motion for new trial, the executor and beneficiaries appeal. Affirmed.

A. P. Black, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. W. Brouillet and Leo C. Lennon, Asst. Inheritance Tax Attorneys, both of San Francisco (W. H. H. Gentry, Inheritance Tax Attorney, of San Francisco, of Counsel), for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. The beneficiaries of certain trusts created by the decedent during his lifetime appeal from the judgment and order confirming the report of the inheritance tax appraiser and fixing the inheritance tax in said estate, and also appeal from the order denying appellants' motion for a new trial.

The appraiser after investigation returned his report to the probate court stating that the decedent in his lifetime, on January 10, 1920, had transferred and assigned by three deeds a large amount of property in trust for members of his family without valuable and adequate consideration and in contemplation of death. The report set forth the value of the property so transferred and the amount of inheritance tax due on account of each of such transfers. Fred W. Boole, Jr., as executor of the last will of said decedent, on behalf of himself individually and also on behalf of his mother, Dee Beck Boole, and his sister, Ruth Barbara Boole, filed written objections to said report, stating in the objections that his mother and sister were abroad and were for that reason unable personally to present their objections to the report.

A trial upon the report and objections was had before a jury, resulting in a special verdict. The jury answered "yes" to the question submitted to them, to wit: Were the trusts made in contemplation of death?

[1, 2] Respondent claims that the appeal should be dismissed because appellants' motion for a new trial was prematurely made. The verdict was given February 8, 1928, and on the same day appellants filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial, and a written motion that the court set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. On April 4, 1928, the court by minute order denied the motion for a new trial, and on April 5, 1928, signed and filed its written findings and order confirming the report of the inheritance tax appraiser and fixing the inheritance tax in accordance with the recommendation of said report. The said notice of appeal was filed on April 10, 1928. An argument is made by respondent that the verdict was advisory only, that other issues remained for decision by the court which were not determined until the court made the order of April 5, 1928, and for these reasons the motion for a new trial was prematurely made. Appellants reply that in this particular case no other issue remained for decision because the sole objection to the report was the statement that said transfers were made in contemplation of death. Whatever should be done about the appeal from the order denying a new trial, the appeal from the order fixing the tax was in time and was permissible under Code of Civil Procedure, § 963, subd. 3. The latter order was a judgment and under Code of Civil Procedure, § 956, the appellate court upon an appeal from a judgment may review the verdict or decision and any intermediate ruling, proceeding, order, or decision which involves the merits or necessarily affects the judgment, or which substantially affects the rights of a party. Respondent has not indicated how the appellate power of this court to review all the points on appeal would in any way be restricted if the appeal from the order denying a new trial was not properly taken, nor if the motion for a new trial was not properly made so long as the appeal from the final order fixing the tax is valid.

Appellants urge that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the transfer was made in contemplation of death. The entire evidence upon the issue is not set out in the briefs, although the record is perfected under the alternative method of appeal. Appellants show certain evidence of declarations of the deceased which is said to manifest a state of mind at the time of the transfers which looked forward to future years of life, freed from business worries, guarded at once against the possible mistakes into which old age might lead him, and also against the assumed extravagance of his own family. Authorities are also cited to the effect that old age or failing health are not determinative of the question. The respondent indicates other testimony not denied in appellants' reply brief which is sufficient to support the decision. The words "contemplation of death" are defined in section 2, subd. 4, of the Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1921, p. 1501) as "that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person on the execution of his will, and in nowise shall said words be limited and restricted to that expectancy of death which actuates the mind of a person making a gift causa mortis; and it is hereby declared to be the intent and purpose of this act to tax any and all transfers which are made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of property transferred by testate or intestate laws."

These facts include the following: In November, 1904, the decedent Fred W. Boole executed a will disposing of his property and setting up testamentary trusts for these appellants. He was then and subsequently interested in the subject of trusts and gave them study. On April 7, 1919, he consulted his attorney concerning testamentary disposition of stock and on April 29, concerning a proposed disposition of his estate. In July, 1919, he suffered a stroke of paralysis and he did not return to his office until October of that year. He commenced again to consult his attorney: November 21, 1919, concerning a proposed trust in favor of his wife and children; December 3, 1919, for advice about collateral inheritance taxes and other points in connection with the proposed trusts; December 18, 1919, further concerning exemptions from state and federal inheritance taxes. He continued to consult his attorney from time to time, and on January 20, 1920, he executed the transfers in trust which were taxed by the order appealed from. Then 18 days later he revoked his will of 1904 and made a new one, omitting therefrom the trusts contained in the old one, but which had now been established by the document of January 20, 1920. He died at the age of 63 years on August 10, 1924, of arteriosclerosis and myocarditis which the death certificate stated were of a duration of 5 years.

[3] While the evidence quoted by appellants tends to show absence of fear or expectation of immediate death, it does not negative the existence of that contemplation of death which is defined in the statute and explained in Chambers v. Larronde, 196 Cal. 100, 235 P. 1024, 41 A. L. R. 980. The points explained in that case rule the present one in many particulars. The verdict is sustained by substantial evidence.

At the trial appellant Dee Beck Boole, surviving widow of the deceased, was absent from the state. Her deposition had been taken by the inheritance tax attorney at the state controller's office. The deposition, of course, was taken to obtain information showing whether the said transfers were taxable under the Inheritance Tax Act. At the trial parts of her deposition were read into evidence before the jury. The following part was read over the objection of appellants:

"Q. (After describing the transfers.) It is necessary for us to determine whether those transfers were made to you in contemplation of death. A. I think it was only as any man would feel. He wanted to insure our safety and knowing that a stroke is always dangerous to anyone, he wanted to have everything settled before anything happened to him."

[4-6] The question, though not in the interrogatory form, was treated as a question and sufficient in form. The answer begins with the words, "I think." The witness used this expression in other parts of her deposition to express a degree of recollection. It was also sufficient in form. 10 Cal. Jur. 953. The substance of the answer, however, was a conclusion of the witness with respect to what her husband had in mind when he made the transfers. If she were the sole transferee, her statement would be admissible as a declaration or admission, but here there are two other transferees against each of whom a tax is levied. Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467, 484, 485, 117 P. 539, and cases cited. Against the other appellants this statement of the witness was a conclusion and should not have been received in evidence. This point evidently gave the trial court some concern.

[7, 8] Respondent has presented and asked leave to file a supplement to the reporter's transcript which shows a conversation between the court and members of the jury immediately after recording their verdict and before their discharge. The statements of the jury in response to the court's questions are to the effect that they were not in fact influenced by this part of the testimony. The appellants' objection to the filing of this supplement must be overruled. An appeal under the alternative method entitles each party to a full phonographic report of the proceeding at the trial, omitting only such matters as may be excluded by stipulation. Code Civ. Proc. § 953a. We have, therefore, ordered the supplement filed. Nevertheless, the substance of the supplement is not such that we can take it into consideration in determining whether the statement of Mrs. Boole thus admitted in evidence constitutes reversible error. Jurors' affidavits are not competent to show that their misconduct in reading improper newspaper articles about the cause did not influence their verdict. Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos, etc., Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 379, 397, 104 P. 986; People v. Stokes, 103 Cal. 193, 196, 197, 37 P. 207, 42 Am. St. Rep. 102. Logically the same rule should apply to evidence erroneously submitted to them by the court. While the ruling of the cases last cited is based in part upon the old rule that from error injury was presumed, it was not entirely based upon that rule. Whether the error in admitting the statement resulted in a miscarriage of justice under the present rules governing appellate courts we determine without regard to the matter in the supplement. Our examination of the record does not show us that a different verdict would have been rendered nor a different judgment entered without this error in admitting evidence. The verdict was advisory and stipulated by counsel to be advisory. The court, while expressing doubt as to the admissibility of the statement, nevertheless accepted the verdict and made its finding of fact in agreement with it. For this reason the error should be considered no more serious than if the trial was had without a jury. It has been held that errors in the proceedings before the jury rendering an advisory verdict are not so readily held to be prejudicial, as where the verdict is binding upon the court. In re Moore, 72 Cal. 335, 13 P. 880.

[9] Requested instructions numbers IV and V were refused. They directed the jury to answer "no" to the interrogatory submitted to them in case they found that the transfers were made with certain enumerated objects in view, but not in contemplation of death. The enumerated objects included the intention of the deceased to travel and guard against business reverses while on his travels, but there was no showing in the evidence that the trusts were made in contemplation of traveling. Refused instruction number VI could properly have been given. It was apparently taken from the language of Estate of Snyder, 71 Cal. App. 324, at page 329, 235 P. 54, 56. However, the failure to give it has not resulted in injury in view of other instructions given. The court charged the jury that the state must prove the transfers to have been made in contemplation of death, defined that expression in the terms requested by appellants, and then instructed: "If, of course, the state has failed to establish the fact that, at the time these trusts were executed, Mr. Boole had in contemplation his death, then the verdict must be for the beneficiary."

[10] The court was not required to enumerate all the conditions under which the transfers would not be taxable, where it stated in effect that transfers made for any other reason than in contemplation of death would not be taxable. To the extent authorized by the evidence, the court did instruct upon conditions under which transfers are not taxable. It stated: "If Mr. Boole's sole purpose in creating these trusts was to protect himself against himself, as it were, in the sense of making it impossible for him to later, in the latter days of his life, make any bad business ventures, and if, further, it was his purpose to teach practical economy, as it were, to the members of his family, those thoughts were strong in his mind, why of course it is a valid transfer and free of tax."

[11] The court instructed that the transfers would be taxable if the decedent was actuated at once by two kinds of motives, to wit: First, the motives last mentioned; and, second, the motive to avoid probate proceedings and deprive the state of its opportunity to collect the tax. In so doing the court referred to these two kinds of motives as "both of them strong and in a sense impelling motives, one, as already stated, his own protection against future adversity, assisting his family, and the like, and the other the desire to defeat this Inheritance Tax Act, or to protect himself and his family against the expense of probate proceedings and the like." The appellants' objection to this instruction is based upon the claim that there was no evidence tending to prove the motives secondly described. The language used in the instruction substantially follows the meaning of the language of the act, i. e., transfers "made in lieu of or to avoid the passing of property transferred by testate or intestate laws." As already pointed out, the evidence was sufficient to support the finding that the transfers were so made. The state's burden of proof is to show the motive or motives of the decedent which actuated the transfers. From the very nature of this burden, a case capable of direct proof of the issue will seldom arise. The motive will usually have to be inferred from other facts such as the acts of the decedent, the surrounding circumstances, and the nature of the transfer. For these reasons the question is one which is peculiarly within the province of the trial court.

The judgment and order fixing the tax are affirmed.

OTHMER v. CITY COUNCIL OF CITY OF LONG BEACH et al. (L. A. 11397.)

Supreme Court of California. May 16, 1929.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑124(5)—Charter provision for recall of officers held not void for failure to provide method for ascertaining whether petitions were signed by requisite number of qualified electors (Long Beach City Charter, § 308; Code Civ. Proc. § 1963).

Long Beach City Charter, § 308 (St. 1921, p. 2145), authorizing recall petition, held not void because of failure to provide method of procedure to be followed by clerk in determining whether originating petition or petition as later signed contained signatures of requisite number of qualified electors, regardless of fact that it does not state how fact shall be ascertained as to each signer, in that it will be presumed in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1963 that clerk in ascertaining fact will regularly perform his official duties.

2. Pleading 🔑121(4)—Denials on information or belief of matters of public record are insufficient to raise issue, and must be deemed admissions.

Denials on information or belief of matters of public record and the form thereof are insufficient to raise an issue, and must be deemed to be admissions of allegations to which denials assume to be responsive.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑159(1)—That city clerk furnished separate documents containing copy of original recall petition for signatures of electors did not destroy effectiveness (Long Beach City Charter, § 308).

Fact that city clerk, after filing recall petition in accordance with Long Beach City Charter, § 308 (St. 1921, p. 2145), provided separate documents with copy of notice containing a copy of originating recall petition with blank sheets of papers containing places for signatures to which signatures were appended and subsequently attached to original petition kept in vault in office of city clerk, did not destroy the effectiveness of petition.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑159(1)—Clerk's certificate as to signatures of qualified electors to recall petition, regular on its face, was not open to attack in collateral proceeding (Long Beach City Charter, § 308).

Certificate of city clerk as to signatures to petition for recall of municipal officers in accordance with Long Beach City Charter, § 308 (St. 1921, p. 2145), being sufficiently responsive to requirements of charter and regular on its face without showing of bad faith, fraud, or mistake, was final and conclusive and not open to attack in collateral proceeding.

5. Municipal corporations ⚷159(1)—City clerk in order to certify signatures to recall petition need not personally see every name signed thereto (Long Beach City Charter, § 308).

City clerk in order to furnish certificate as to signatures on recall petition in accordance with Long Beach City Charter, § 308 (St. 1921, p. 2145), need not personally see every name signed to petition; it being sufficient if names are signed under his direction in such manner that he or one of his deputies may certify to the fact that petitions remained in office.

6. Municipal corporations ⚷159(1)—Certificate of city clerk to recall petition in absence of bad faith, fraud, mistake, or forgery is conclusive.

In the absence of allegations of bad faith, fraud, mistake, or forgery, certificate of city clerk made within scope of his charter duties relative to signatures of qualified electors to recall petition is conclusive on city council and on the court.

7. Municipal corporations ⚷159(1)—City clerk in performing charter duty requiring him to verify signatures to recall petition could avail himself of assistance of competent persons.

City clerk in performance of charter duty requiring him to verify signatures of qualified electors to petition for recall of officers had right to avail himself of assistance of competent persons specially employed for the purpose of checking signatures on petition, and results of their work was sufficient to enable clerk to rely thereon in making certificate.

8. Municipal corporations ⚷124(5)—City charter provision relating to recall must be given liberal interpretation (Long Beach City Charter, § 308).

Long Beach City Charter, § 308 (St. 1921, p. 2145), providing for recall of municipal officers, must be given a liberal interpretation with the view of promoting the purposes for which it was enacted.

In Bank.

Original mandamus by Henry Othmer against the City Council of the City of Long Beach and others. Writ granted.

Denio, Hart, Taubman & Simpson, of Long Beach, for petitioner.

Linnell & Linnell, of Long Beach, for respondents Hicks, Jones, Lo Rentz, Alexander, Taylor, and Evans (Members of City Council, City of Long Beach).

SHENK, J. Mandamus to compel the city council of the city of Long Beach to call a special recall election.

Section 308 of the city charter (Stats. 1921, p. 2145), so far as pertinent to this controversy, provides: "The holder of any elective office, or the city manager, in the city of Long Beach, may be recalled by the qualified electors of the city of Long Beach at any time after he has held office for six months. Not less than ten nor more than twenty-five qualified electors of the city of Long Beach may originate a petition of recall in the following manner: The said qualified electors shall file with the city clerk a petition containing a general statement of the ground or grounds for which the recall of the official is sought. This petition shall be signed by each of the petitioners originating the recall, each signer adding to his signature his place of residence, giving street and number, and the date of signing. The city clerk shall file the petition, and shall cause the said petition with the signatures attached thereto to be published for three successive days in the official newspaper of the city, with notice therein that said petition is in the city clerk's office open for signatures. The city clerk shall, during office hours for thirty days from the last day of publication aforesaid, keep the petition open for signatures by the qualified electors of the city, each signer to add to his signature his place of residence, giving street and number, and date of signature. No petition other than the originating petition shall be signed or presented for signature at any place other than the city clerk's office, and must be verified by the city clerk or one of his deputies. At the expiration of said thirty days, the city clerk shall declare the petition closed for the purpose of examination, and within five days thereafter shall ascertain whether said petition is signed by qualified electors of the city of Long Beach equal to not less than ten per cent of the entire votes cast at the last general municipal election; and the city clerk shall attach to the petition his certificate showing the result of such examination, stating the number of qualified voters found upon said petition, and the number of persons not qualified to vote, and in checking said petition the city clerk shall designate the names of persons found thereon not qualified to vote, with the letters 'D. V.' in red ink opposite such name or names. * * * If the petition shall be found to be sufficient, the city clerk shall submit the petition of recall, together with his certificate, to the city council without delay, whereupon the city council shall forthwith cause a special municipal election to be held not less than thirty nor more than forty days after the date of the order calling such election, to determine whether the voters shall recall such officer. If the same ground or grounds are alleged, one petition shall be sufficient to propose the recall of one or more officials. * * *"

The petition herein alleges the official status of the respondents as the nine members of the city council of said city; also that on January 28, 1929, 20 qualified electors of said city, including the petitioner, filed with the city clerk of said city a petition for the recall of the respondents, N. H. Alexander, E.

L. Taylor, W. L. Evans, and R. M. Hicks, members of said council, which petition was signed by said 20 qualified electors, each adding to his signature his place of residence, giving his street number and the date of signing, and that said petition contained a general statement of the grounds for which the recall of said four named respondents was sought. A copy of the recall petition is attached to the petition, and the same discloses that the same grounds of recall are specified as to each of said four respondents. It is further alleged that the city clerk filed the recall petition and caused the same to be published, as required by the charter provision, in the official newspaper of said city; that during office hours for 30 days after the last day of publication the city clerk kept said petition open for signature by the qualified electors of said city; that no other petition was signed or presented for signature at any place than the office of the city clerk; that within office hours during said 30-day period 3,776 persons signed said petition at the office of the city clerk, each of said signers adding to his signature his place of residence, giving street and number, and date of signing; that at the expiration of said 30-day period the city clerk declared the petition closed for the purpose of examination, and within 5 days thereafter ascertained whether said petition was signed by qualified electors of said city equal to not less than 10 per cent. of the entire vote cast at the last preceding municipal election; that the city clerk checked said petition and designated the names of persons found thereon not qualified to vote with the letters "D. V." in red ink, opposite such names; that 3,559 of said persons were and are and were found by said city clerk to be qualified electors of said city of Long Beach; that the city clerk attached to said petition his certificate showing the result of such examination, stating the number of qualified electors whose signatures were attached to said petition to be 3,559, and the number not qualified to vote to be 217; and that the total vote cast at the last general election was 27,739; that said petition was found to be sufficient, and that the city clerk did, on the 8th day of March, 1929, submit said petition, together with his said certificate, to the respondent city council; that thereupon and at the time of submission of said petition and certificate to the city council the same were ordered filed, whereupon Councilman Barton moved that an election be called to be held on April 16, 1929, to determine whether the voters should recall the four councilmen named in the recall petition; that said motion was seconded, and, upon the same being put to a vote, Councilmen Hauge, Barton, and Stakemiller voted in favor thereof, and Councilmen Alexander, Taylor, Hicks, Jones, and Lo Rentz voted against the same, Councilman Evans being absent.

[1] As a return to the alternative writ the respondents filed a demurrer and an answer at the same time. The grounds of the demurrer have been considered and found to be without merit and, except as to one, need not be discussed. As to this one ground it is contended that said section 308 of the charter is uncertain, defective, and void, in that no provision is made therein for the method of procedure to be followed by the clerk in ascertaining whether the originating petition of not more than 25 qualified electors or the petition as later signed contains the signatures of the requisite number of qualified electors. As to the originating petition the same is not entitled to be filed unless it has appended thereto the signatures of the required number of qualified electors. Each elector is required to affix his place of residence, giving street and the date of signing. This information is sufficient to enable the clerk to ascertain by the usual method in such cases, viz.: By an inspection of the records of registration, whether the petition is entitled to be filed. It is the duty of the clerk to ascertain the fact, and it must be presumed that his official duty will be regularly performed. Section 1963, Code Civ. Proc. As to the closed petition the charter imposes upon the clerk the duty to "ascertain whether the petition is signed by qualified electors of the city" in the requisite number. It is true that the charter does not require how the clerk shall ascertain the fact as to each signer, but we think this omission is not fatal to the validity of the charter provision, for it must also be assumed that the clerk would employ the means available to ascertain the fact and would resort most naturally to the records of registration for that purpose. See Wolfskill v. City Council of Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 610, 174 P. 45. The demurrer is therefore overruled.

[2] The answer purports to raise certain issues of fact which, if material, and are not satisfactorily answered by the record before us, would require a reference. In response to the allegations of the petition that the originating recall petition was filed in the office of the city clerk, and that qualified electors of said city signed said petition, the respondents, for want of information or belief on the subject, deny that such petition was so filed, and for the same reason deny that the 20 persons whose names were signed thereto were qualified electors of said city. Those denials are denials of matters of public record, and the form thereof is insufficient to raise an issue and must be deemed to be an admission of the allegations to which the denials assume to be responsive. Santa Barbara Lumber Co. v. Ross, 183 Cal. 657, 192 P. 436; 21 Cal. Jur., p. 150, and cases cited. The same condition of the answer obtains with reference to the allegation of the petition herein that 3,559 of the persons who signed the closed petition were qualified electors of said city. It is nowhere alleged in the answer that the persons who signed the originating petition or that the 3,559 persons who signed the closed petition were not qualified electors of the city. That they were qualified electors must, therefore, stand as an admitted fact in the case.

Other allegations of the petition are denied, but such denials for the most part relate to matters affirmatively set forth in a separate defense, and must be considered in connection therewith. The allegations of the separate defense may, for the purposes of this proceeding, be deemed to be true. In substance it is therein averred that after the publication of the notice in the official paper notifying electors of the city of the filing of the petition for recall in the office of the city clerk, and during the 30-day period after the last publication of said notice, the originating petition was kept in the vault at the office of the city clerk and that no further signatures were attached to that paper; that after the publication of said notice the city clerk prepared six separate documents, consisting of a copy of said notice (which contained a copy of the originating recall petition), pasted on a blank sheet of paper and other blank sheets of papers attached and bound thereto, the blank sheets containing places for signatures; that the documents so prepared by the city clerk were placed on desks and counters in the clerk's office, and that all of the signatures of electors alleged by the petition to have been obtained were appended to the copy of the notice to voters and the sheets appended thereto; that the city clerk himself did not personally supervise the signing of each document so as to enable him to verify all of the signatures thereto, and that neither the city clerk nor any particular deputy of the city clerk was present during the signing of all of said signatures; that due to the procedure followed it was impossible for the clerk himself or for any one of his deputies to identify and verify all of said signatures; that after the expiration of the 30-day period the clerk caused the several duplicate copies or sections of the alleged petition, with the signatures appended thereto, to be attached to the original petition filed in his office on January 28, 1929, in such manner as to make it appear that they were so attached at the time all of the signatures were appended; that thereafter the city clerk went to the city of Los Angeles, the county seat of the county in which the city of Long Beach is situated, accompanied by a deputy clerk and other persons who were neither deputies nor assistants of the city clerk, nor in the regular employ of the city clerk, and that the clerk, his deputy, and such other persons examined the great register and affidavits of registration and compared the signatures therein with the signatures attached to the copies of the recall petition; that the persons, other than the deputy city clerk, who were so employed by the city clerk to make such comparisons "were wholly unauthorized to determine any of the facts or the genuineness of signatures, and that it was upon such illegal, void determinations and hearsay that the said city clerk made his purported and alleged finding and certificate which he filed with the council" certifying to the genuineness of 3,559 of said signatures, and that the city clerk was therefore without sufficient knowledge to enable him to make such certificate. Wherefore, it is alleged, the recall petition was not legally authenticated, and no obligation rests upon the respondents to call said recall election.

[3] Admitting all of the foregoing allegations of the affirmative defense to be true, we are of the opinion that there was a substantial compliance with the law in all of the steps leading up to the presentation of the recall petition to the city council. It is conceded that each document signed by the electors had attached thereto and preceding the signatures a copy of the originating recall petition. There was nothing in the duplicate copies of the petition to mislead the electors, and there can be no doubt that each signer fully understood that he was signing a petition for the recall of the four councilmen. It is not disputed that all of the signatures attached to the duplicate petitions were appended in the office of the city clerk. Such being the fact, it would seem to be unreasonable to require that all of the electors must sign one document if by any rational construction of the charter provision the several documents as signed may, when assembled and attached, rightly be deemed to be a single petition. By necessary implication the charter contemplates that more than one document or petition may be signed. It provides that "no petition other than the originating petition shall be signed, or presented for signature, at any place other than the city clerk's office." This provision plainly means that the originating petition may be signed outside of the office of the city clerk, and that other petitions to the same effect not only may, but must, be signed in the office of the city clerk. The language of the charter is entirely inconsistent with the contention that all of the signatures must be appended to one sheet of paper or to one series of papers constituting but one document. It has been held in other states, under like statutory requirements, that it is sufficient if the names of the petitioners appear on different petitions of the same form and content. Smith v. Patton, 103 Ky. 444, 45 S. W. 459; Douglass v. County Commissioners, 23 Fla. 419, 2 So. 776. In People v. Town of Berkeley, 102 Cal. 298, 36 P. 591, 23 L. R. A. 838, it appeared that eight several petitions, identical in form, for the reorganization under general law of a town theretofore established under a special charter in accordance with the provisions of the General Municipal Corporation Act

(Stats. 1883, p. 93), had been presented to the board of trustees. After all of these petitions had been signed the signatures on seven of them had been cut off by some person having no authority so to do and had been attached to the eighth so as to make it appear that they formed a part of the eighth petition. The statute required that "a petition" for the reorganization election be signed and presented to the board of trustees. The procedure followed was held to be fatal to the reorganization proceeding, but in the course of the opinion the court stated: "Probably if the several petitions as signed had been presented they might and should be regarded and treated as 'a petition' within the meaning of the statute; and in a similar case it was so held by the Supreme Court of Florida. McKinney v. County Comrs., 26 Fla. 267 [4 So. 855]." While the above general statement of the court was obiter, we think it correctly states the rule that may safely be followed and that should govern in all similar cases. No sound reason has been advanced why duplicate copies of the petition may not be signed and used as effectually as one. If duplicates be forbidden, the right of recall, especially in populous centers, would be greatly restricted for no substantial reason. The fact that the duplicate petitions involved in this proceeding contained also the language of the notice to voters would not destroy their effectiveness. This language was in no wise confusing or misleading and may be treated as surplusage.

[4] It is contended by the respondents that the clerk's verification was defective. The verification referred to is that required by the above-quoted clause in section 308 reading as follows: "No petition other than the originating petition shall be signed or presented for signature at any place other than the city clerk's office, and must be verified by the city clerk or one of his deputies." It must be conceded that the language thus employed is ambiguous and leaves it uncertain as to what is to be verified. The subject of the verb "must be verified" is missing. Quite reasonably it may be said that the subject of the verb is not the originating "petition." The context plainly implies that the subject intended and which must be supplied by necessary implication is "such fact," that is, the fact that the petitions other than the originating petition were signed or were presented for signature at no other place than the office of the city clerk. This was the construction placed upon the charter requirement by the city clerk, for, under date of March 8, 1929, he certified under oath that "said petition was opened for signatures by the qualified electors of the city of Long Beach on the 2d day of February, 1929, and was kept open at the office of the city clerk of the city of Long Beach during office hours from the said second day of February, 1929, to and including the 2d day of March, 1929; that during said time and at said place the signatures thereto were signed * * * respectively in the presence of said city clerk, or in the presence of one of his duly appointed, qualified and acting deputies." The facts stated under oath in this certificate are sufficiently responsive to the requirements of the charter. The certificate is regular on its face; no bad faith, fraud, or mistake on the part of the city clerk are alleged, and he appears to have performed his duties regularly under the law. His certificate is therefore final and conclusive, and is not open to attack in this collateral proceeding. See Conn v. City Council, 17 Cal. App. 705, 121 P. 714, 719; Koehler v. Board of Trustees, 83 Cal. App. 648, 257 P. 187.

[5] It is suggested by respondents that the proof would show, if evidence were taken, that the number of signatures which the clerk actually saw appended to the petition in his office would be negligible. It is accordingly argued that the clerk could not properly make the verification in question. In this connection counsel have missed the purpose of the verification. It is not for the purpose of establishing that the signatures appended are the genuine signatures of the persons whose names are appended to the petition. The genuineness of the signatures is a matter for ascertainment after the names have been signed and the petition has been closed and in accordance with subsequent provisions of said section 308. The purpose of this verified certificate is to show that the names were signed only in the office of the city clerk. For the purpose of proof of this fact it should not be necessary that the clerk personally see every name signed to the petition. It is sufficient if the names are signed under his direction in such manner that he or one of his deputies may certify to the fact that the petitions remained in his office during the time they were being signed.

[6, 7] The respondents next attack the sufficiency of the action of the city clerk in certifying to the sufficiency in number and the genuineness of the signatures attached to the petition. The basis of the contention is that neither the city clerk nor his regular deputies compared all of the signatures on the petition with the records of registration. It is conceded that the city clerk took the petitions to the office of the registrar of voters of said county for the purpose of ascertaining the genuineness of said signatures, and that accompanying him were one of his deputies and several other persons specially employed by the city clerk for the purpose of checking the signatures with the affidavits of registration, and that the persons so specially employed assisted in the task of checking. From these facts it is argued that the certificate of the city clerk to the effect that he ascertained that the petition was sufficiently signed by qualified voters of the city was based, at least in part, on hearsay, and therefore unauthorized. We find no merit in the contention. Here again, no fraud, bad faith, or mistake in connection with the checking of the signatures is alleged and forgery on the part of the persons signing the petition is not claimed or intimated. Furthermore, it is not contended by the respondents that genuine signatures of qualified electors of the city in the number certified by the city clerk were not attached to the petition. The answer merely denies that the city clerk, within the 5-day period, ascertained that the petition was signed by the requisite or any number of qualified electors. The execution of this certificate by the city clerk is admitted. It is regular on its face. The charter imposes upon the city clerk the duty of ascertaining the sufficiency of the petition and of certifying the fact to the city council. In the absence of allegations of bad faith, fraud, mistake, or forgery, his certificate, made within the scope of his charter duties, is conclusive on the city council and on the court. See Good v. Common Council, 5 Cal. App. 265, 90 P. 44; Laam v. McLaren, 28 Cal. App. 638, 153 P. 985; Fraser v. Cummings, 48 Cal. App. 504, 192 P. 100; Magoon v. Heath, 79 Cal. App. 632, 250 P. 583; State v. Houston, 94 Neb. 445, 143 N. W. 796, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 227; 21 Cal. Jur. pp. 1000, 1001. In the performance of his charter duty we perceive no valid objection to the action of the city clerk in availing himself of the assistance of competent persons specially employed for the purpose of checking the signatures on the petition. The clerk is allowed five days only to do this work. His regular force might be entirely inadequate to the performance of the task and the limitation of time might render it impracticable, if not impossible, to add regular deputies to his office force for this particular purpose. If the clerk be denied the right to employ competent persons to check the signatures, the recall proceeding might easily be thwarted for lack of proper assistance. No question is raised by the respondents as to the competency of the persons so specially employed, and it appears that their work was done under the supervision of the clerk or one of his regular deputies. The results of their work were sufficient to enable the clerk to rely thereon in making his certificate.

[8] When the Long Beach charter provision relating to the recall is given, as it must be, a liberal interpretation with the view of promoting the purposes for which it was enacted (Worth v. Downey, 74 Cal. App. 436, 241 P. 96; 21 Cal. Jur. p. 1002), we find a substantial compliance therewith in the proceedings leading up to the presentation of the recall petition to the city council. It is also apparent that no material issues of fact are presented by the record which would require a reference. The duty of the city council to call the special election as required by law is therefore manifest. See Ratto v. Board of Trustees, 75 Cal. App. 724, 727, 243 P. 466.

Let the peremptory writ issue as prayed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by Edward E. Atkins and others against George W. Hughes, L. F. Hughes, H. J. Hammond, G. C. Chase, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants L. F. Hughes, H. J. Hammond, and G. C. Chase appeal. Modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Halverson & Halverson and W. T. Kendrick, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Action by certain of the stockholders of the Rock Creek Water Corporation against said corporation and five individual defendants. Four of said individual defendants—L. F. Hughes, H. J. Hammond, Stewart Gibson, and G. C. Chase—were directors of said corporation, and, with the plaintiff W. A. Phillips, formed the board of directors of said company. The fifth individual defendant was George W. Hughes, who died subsequent to the commencement of this action, and the same has been dismissed as to his personal representative.

The facts admitted by the pleadings or proven at the trial show that the Rock Creek Water Company is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California; that said corporation is a mutual water company, and was organized by the owners of certain water rights for the purpose of facilitating the control of said water and the distribution of the same for domestic and irrigation purposes among its owners in proportion to the amount owned by them respectively. Some time prior to the annual meeting of said corporation in the year 1924 George W. Hughes, through the purchase of the Hammond and Boyce properties and the stock in said corporation representing water used on said properties, became the owner of a large amount of the capital stock in said corporation, and, after said purchase, the said George W. Hughes and his son, the said L. F. Hughes, owned a majority of the capital stock of said corporation. At the annual meeting of said corporation held in said year the following named persons were elected directors of said company for the ensuing year: The said L. F. Hughes, the son of said George W. Hughes; Stewart Gibson, the private secretary of George W. Hughes; H. J. Hammond, from whom he purchased the Hammond and Boyce ranches, and who acted as foreman or ranch superintendent of said George W. Hughes up to May 15, 1925; G. C. Chase, who became such foreman after May 15, 1925, and W. A. Phillips, one of the plaintiffs in this action, who represented the minority stockholders of said company upon said board of directors. The directors organized by electing L. F. Hughes president, W. A. Phillips vice president, and G. C. Chase secretary and treasurer of said company. The by-laws of said corporation provide that "Delivery (of water) to each (stockholder) shall be made at some point on the main ditch." The delivery of said water to the stockholders was made by a zanjero, and it was usually run into small equalizing or distributing reservoirs, from which the water was drawn in a more or less constant flow; these reservoirs not being intended for storage purposes, but rather for distributing purposes. These reservoirs were not owned by the corporation, but by the stockholders, or groups of stockholders, individually, nor were the pipe lines or ditches connecting the main ditch with said reservoirs owned by the company, but by the individual stockholders. There were at least four of these reservoirs, referred to in the evidence as Kendrick reservoirs Nos. 1 and 2, the Hammond reservoir, and the Boyce reservoir. The latter two reservoirs had been used by the owners of the Hammond ranch and the Boyce ranch, individually, for some years prior to the time these properties were acquired by George W. Hughes. They were situated below the lowest terminus of the company's ditch and from 10 to 15 feet lower than the lands of any of the stockholders except said lands of George W. Hughes purchased from Hammond and Boyce. About March 25, 1925, and after George W. Hughes had acquired the Hammond and Boyce ranches and while he was the owner thereof, the company began enlarging and recementing said reservoirs at the expense of the corporation. On the 7th of April following, at a meeting of the board of directors of said company on that day, deeds to sites of each of said reservoirs, executed by said George W. Hughes in favor of said corporation, were presented to said board of directors. By resolution, these were accepted by said board of directors, and it was ordered that two reservoirs be constructed upon the land thereby conveyed to be used for the storage of water for irrigation purposes, the cost of such construction to be paid by checks drawn on the funds of said corporation. A further resolution was passed by said board of directors at said meeting levying an assessment of ten cents a share on each share of the capital stock of said corporation, "for the purpose of paying expenses, conducting business and paying debts of this corporation." These resolutions were adopted by the affirmative vote of directors Hammond, Gibson, and Chase; director Phillips voting in the negative. At the time of the adoption of the said resolutions, there was in the treasury the sum of $1,915.62, which was ample for conducting the ordinary business and paying the debts of said corporation. The purpose of levying said assessment was to furnish money "to construct, improve, enlarge and cement reservoirs upon the property known as the 'Hammond Ranch' and the 'Boyce Ranch.'" Thereupon, plaintiffs commenced this action to restrain the collection of said assessment; to declare void the proceedings of the board of directors accepting the deed to said reservoir sites and ordering the construction of the reservoirs thereon; for an accounting of the money expended by the directors for the construction, enlargement, and cementing of said reservoirs, and for the removal of the defendant directors. An answer to said complaint was filed on May 29, 1925. On June 12th following the board of directors of said company met and rescinded the resolutions adopted by them on April 7, 1925, accepting said deeds, ordering the construction of said reservoirs, and levying the assessment of ten cents per share to pay the cost thereof. Immediately thereafter and at the same meeting the said board of directors adopted similar resolutions to those previously adopted by them on April 7, 1925, whereby they sought to accept said deeds from George W. Hughes, authorize the construction of said reservoirs upon the property therein described at the cost and expense of the corporation, and levy an assessment of ten cents per share, and for the same purpose as that designated in the former resolution levying the assessment of April 7, 1925. The action taken by said board of directors at the meeting of said board on June 12, 1925, rescinding the prior resolutions adopted by them on April 7, 1925, and adopting new resolutions in their stead, so the court subsequently found, was to "avoid and defeat the restraining order heretofore issued" in this action whereby said defendants were enjoined and restrained from carrying into effect the resolutions of April 7, 1925. After the adoption of said resolutions by the board of directors at their meeting of June 12, 1925, and on July 13, 1925, the plaintiffs filed an amended and supplemental complaint, in which they set forth in full the proceedings taken at the meeting of said board of directors on June 12, 1925, including the action of said board in rescinding its former resolutions and in adopting the subsequent resolutions already referred to. The relief prayed for in said amended and supplemental complaint was that the new assessment be declared void and the defendants restrained from collecting the same, for an accounting of the money expended by them upon the Hammond and Boyce reservoirs, the repayment thereof to the corporation, for the removal from office of said directors, and for general relief. To this pleading the defendants filed their answer. To a large extent the allegations of the complaint and those of the amended and supplemental complaint were admitted by the defendants' answers. Those that were not so admitted were, in the main, found to be true by the court. Upon these findings the court rendered judgment in plaintiffs' favor in accordance with the prayer of their amended and supplemental complaint. From this judgment the defendants L. F. Hughes, H. J. Hammond, and G. C. Chase have appealed.

The first point raised by appellants in their attack upon the judgment is that there is no evidence to support the finding of the trial court that George W. Hughes and L. F. Hughes conspired to elect directors of said corporation who were under their domination with the intent and purpose that said directors would adopt and pass said resolutions, the effect of which was to bring about the construction of said reservoirs for the use and benefit of the Hughes, but at the cost and expense of the corporation. It appears to us that whether or not such a conspiracy was formed is not a matter of material importance in this action. If the acts of the directors in passing said resolutions were legal, then it is a matter of no consequence that the Hughes conspired to cause the same to be adopted by the board of directors of said company. On the other hand, if said directors acted illegally in the enactment of said resolutions, then they are invalid for any purpose, and this would be their effect whether the Hughes conspired to secure their adoption or not. In our opinion, therefore, the question of first importance in considering the validity of said judgment is to determine whether the board of directors of said company in the adoption of said resolutions acted within the scope of their lawful authority.

[1, 2] Appellants contend that there was nothing illegal in the acts of the directors in accepting deeds to the reservoir sites from George W. Hughes and in ordering the construction of reservoirs thereon at the expense of the corporation, and that, if such acts were legal, the assessment levied for the purpose of paying the cost of constructing said reservoirs was free from any taint or fraud or illegality. In support of this last-mentioned contention the appellants assert in their brief that "The board of directors, in taking such action, were exercising the authority with which they were clothed to conduct the business of the company to the best of their judgment in conformity with the charter and by-laws of the company, as well as its needs. If it accepted deeds to real property from G. W.

Hughes, the corporation was not injured. On the other hand, having accepted deeds to land from said G. W. Hughes, and it being within the discretion of the board of directors under its charter, to conduct and develop the affairs of the corporation, and it being their best judgment that the reservoirs in question be constructed upon the lands so conveyed to the corporation, these acts could not be complained of nor would they be considered by the ordinary prudent business man as being unlawful." There can be no question that under the purposes for which said corporation was formed, as set forth in its articles of incorporation, it has the right to acquire water, water rights, dams, ditches, and canals for the development, storage, and carriage of water "in connection with the principal object and purpose of this corporation, which is generally specified to be the conduct of a mutual water company."

While the construction of reservoirs is not expressly mentioned in the purposes for which said corporation was formed, yet, from the broad general terms used in defining said purposes, we have no doubt, if the construction of a reservoir, or a number of reservoirs for that matter, would result in increasing the water supply of the company, or be of any substantial advantage to the company in its business of furnishing water to its stockholders, that the right to exercise such power was given to said corporation by its articles of incorporation. But this right must be exercised for the benefit of the stockholders generally, and not for the benefit of some favored few of said number. As we have stated above, the by-laws of the corporation provide that water shall be delivered to each stockholder at some point in the main ditch. The evidence shows that this has been the universal practice of the company since its organization. The water was then conducted in most instances through pipe lines or ditches to private reservoirs, built and paid for by individual stockholders who were served by the water stored therein. Upon each of the Hammond and Boyce ranches at the time the same were purchased by G. W. Hughes there was located a reservoir used by the owner thereof for the purpose of facilitating the distribution of water upon his land. The board of directors by the proceedings complained of attempted, at the expense of the company, to either rebuild these two reservoirs or to construct new ones upon the sites occupied by the original ones. These reservoirs were for the exclusive and individual use of G. W. and L. F. Hughes. The other stockholders of the company were not benefited in any manner by this expenditure of the company's funds. Their lands were located above these reservoir sites, and could not be irrigated with water drawn therefrom even had said stockholders desired so to do, or had the Hughes permitted such use. Then, also, the other stockholders had been compelled to build and pay for their own reservoirs, and there is no evidence that said board of directors intended to reimburse them for money so expended, or to maintain or keep in repair the reservoirs of the minority stockholders already constructed. The construction by said board of directors of the reservoirs on Hughes' property at the expense of the corporation was the use of the funds of said corporation to improve and benefit the private property of Hughes. It was an illegal and an unlawful use of the corporate funds, and it resulted in a detriment to every other stockholder of the corporation. While the board of directors are clothed with broad powers, and are given wide discretion in the management of the affairs of the corporation, and the expenditures of its funds, it was an abuse of that discretion for said board to use the corporate funds to improve the property or to advance the individual interests of any one or group of stockholders to the detriment of the balance of the stockholders. This proposition of law seems so simple and just that no citation of authority is necessary to support it. As we view the facts of this case, there is no question but that the board of directors acted illegally in constructing said reservoirs with the funds of said company. It follows, therefore, also that the assessment levied by the directors for the purpose of meeting the cost of constructing said reservoirs was invalid, and the action of the board of directors in levying the same was illegal and cannot be upheld.

[3] The further point is made by appellants that the judgment is erroneous in holding that the directors of the corporation were guilty of fraud in building the reservoirs, and that there was no testimony to support the findings of the court that the corporation exceeded its power in building said reservoirs. We think that there is ample evidence to support the conclusion and finding of the trial court that the directors, other than director Phillips, were guilty of fraud in constructing said reservoirs for the exclusive use of the Hughes and paying for such construction out of the funds of said corporation. The fraud is so apparent and manifest that it is unnecessary to go into any lengthy details or give any extended reasons for so holding. We might state at this time that the capital stock of said corporation was divided into 48,000 shares of the par value of $1 per share, of which the members of the Hughes family were the owners of slightly over one-half. Being the owners of a majority of the capital stock, they were able to control the election of the board of directors. The board of directors after their election attempted to foist upon the stockholders the entire cost of improvements constructed for the exclusive use of George W. Hughes and family. The court found that the directors had paid in the construction of said reservoirs almost $6,000 from the treasury of said corporation and had otherwise misappropriated the funds of said company in an amount, including that paid in the construction of said reservoir, aggregating the sum of $9,767.10. To hold that this could be innocently done, under the claim that the directors were honestly endeavoring to carry on the business and affairs of the company, would be to challenge the credulity of human nature. A mere recital of the bare facts will, we believe, convince any person of ordinary intelligence of the bad faith of the majority of the directors, and that they designedly attempted to despoil the minority stockholders for the benefit of George W. Hughes and L. F. Hughes.

[4] The judgment of the court in this action further provided "that the said directors, L. F. Hughes and G. C. Chase and each of them, be removed from their offices of director of said corporation." Appellants contend that the court had no power to direct the removal of said defendants from office. They rely upon the cases of Neall v. Hill et al., 16 Cal. 146, 76 Am. Dec. 508, and Sidway v. Missouri Land & Livestock Co. (C. C.) 101 F. 481. The last-named case has no application to the matter before us. In the case of Neall v. Hill, the court rendered judgment removing Hill and Smith, who were president and secretary of the corporation, from their respective offices on the ground that they had been guilty of fraud and mismanagement in the conduct of the business of the corporation. On appeal, the judgment was reversed. The opinion appears to be based upon the principle that the president and secretary of a corporation are mere private and ministerial officers of the corporation, and, as such, they are subject to removal by the corporation alone, and the courts of equity are without jurisdiction over them. A distinction seems to have been made in that case between officers and agents of the corporation, such as Hill and Smith were, and those officers who are intrusted by law with the management of the affairs of the corporation, such as directors or trustees. We base this conclusion upon the following language found in the opinion (page 149 of 16 Cal.): "The power of amotion is incident to every corporation, and the removal of the mere private or ministerial officers of a corporation is a right which belongs to the corporation alone. The assistance of the courts can only be invoked against such officers as are intrusted by law with the management of the affairs of the corporation." Relying on this case of Neall v. Hill, Thompson on Corporations states the rule as follows: "The rule is that the right of removal of mere private or ministerial officers of a corporation belongs to the corporation alone; and that the assistance of the courts can only be invoked against such officers as are intrusted by law with the management of the corporate affairs." 2 Thompson on Corporations (3d Ed.) § 1201.

The case of Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 32, 28 P. 788, was instituted by a stockholder of a corporation against directors of the corporation for the purpose of protecting his interest in the corporate property against the alleged unauthorized acts of the defendants. In discussing the relief to which a plaintiff under such a state of facts might be entitled, the court said: "It is often necessary, in order that the plaintiff may obtain full justice, that the relief granted him be as varied and diversified as the means that have been employed by the defendant to produce the grievance complained of. If a trustee is shown to have been unfaithful, the court may not only compel restitution, but may also restrain him by injunction from similar acts, or, if deemed necessary, may remove him from his trust." In the case of California, etc., Ass'n v. Superior Court, 8 Cal. App. 711, 97 P. 769, the court held that a court of equity had power to remove the directors of a corporation who had proven unfaithful to the interest of the corporation. In that action the court said: "That a court of equity may remove directors of a corporation if deemed necessary when they have proven unfaithful is determined in Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 32 [28 P. 788]." We think these decisions settle the question in this state, and that they plainly hold that a court of equity has the power to remove a director who has been proven unfaithful to his trust. In view of their holding, the judgment in the present action, in so far as it directs the removal of the two directors named, must be upheld.

[5, 6] The final objection made by appellants to the judgment herein is that the trial court, in rendering judgment in favor of the corporation and against said defendants for moneys wrongfully and illegally paid out by the defendants, included in said amount the following items: $750 for the Boyd reservoir site and $450 to the attorneys representing the defendants in this action for services rendered in defending this action. We are of the opinion that the first of these items was properly included in the judgment. The testimony regarding the Boyd reservoir site is not as full as we might wish. The price paid therefor was $750, and there was evidence that it was worth not to exceed $100. It is not clear as to just what use was to be made of the land purchased. The company had no use for it as a reservoir site. It was above the ditch of the company, was arid in character, and was underlaid with bedrock 3 or 4 feet from the surface. It evidently could not be put to agricultural purposes. In this connection we might refer to a statement which the respondent Phillips testified to as having been made by the defendant L. F.

Hughes, in which the latter was reported to have said, "I am going to build about ten reservoirs before I get through. Going to put on an assessment every month. I hope the other stockholders won't suffer too much. I am going to break Kendrick." The trial court may well have concluded that the Boyd reservoir site was purchased with the view of constructing thereon a reservoir for the same purpose as the reservoirs constructed on the Hammond and Boyce sites were intended to be used. If so, this expenditure would be in the same class as those incurred in the construction of the Hammond and Boyce reservoirs, and the judgment that the money expended therefor be repaid to the corporation was a proper one. The item of $450 was not mentioned or referred to in the complaint. It could not have been, for the reason that it was not paid out until after the commencement of this action. Neither was it mentioned or referred to in the amended and supplemental complaint. It could not, therefore, be recovered in this action. The judgment, therefore, should be modified by deducting this sum from the amount of the judgment.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment in this action be modified by deducting from the amount of $9,767.10, the amount found due said corporation from the individual defendants herein, the sum of $450, and, as thus modified, that said judgment be, and it is hereby, affirmed. Respondents will recover their costs on appeal.

WARDEN v. LAMB. (Civ. 3761.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 13, 1929.

1. Judgment ⟹126(1)—On defendant's failure to appear for trial, in action to quiet title, plaintiff's only remedy is to proceed and establish title.

Where defendant, in action to quiet title, fails to appear for trial, plaintiff's sole remedy is to move court to proceed with trial and introduce whatever testimony necessary to establish his title.

2. Judgment ⟹103—Law providing for default judgment on defendant's failure to answer does not apply where answer is on file, regardless of whether defendant appears (Code Civ. Proc. § 585).

Code Civ. Proc. § 585, providing in what cases judgment may be had upon failure of defendant to answer does not authorize entry of default judgment in cases where answer is on file, whether defendant does or does not appear at time action is called for hearing.

3. Attorney and client ⟹62—Allowing association of attorneys with defendant who originally appeared in propria persona, with full knowledge of plaintiff, was not error (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 284, 285).

Where defendant originally appeared in propria persona and later secured attorney to appear for her and caused his name to be entered of record in cause and cause proceeded to trial, all parties having knowledge of attorney's appearance, and where there was no showing of prejudice, it was not error to allow the association of counsel, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 284, 285, permitting party in action to change attorney at any time and requiring notice of such change.

4. Appeal and error ⟹1170(1)—Judgment will not be set aside for irregularity or informality in employing attorneys not resulting in miscarriage of justice (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Where defendant originally appeared in propria persona, but later associated attorneys whose names were entered of record with plaintiff's knowledge, and where there was no showing of prejudice, error, if any, resulting from irregularity of procedure in entry of attorneys of record or informality in writing employing attorneys was not sufficient to reverse judgment, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that no judgment shall be set aside in any case for any error as to any matter of procedure unless resulting in miscarriage of justice.

5. Attorney and client ⟹62—Client may employ attorney to appear for him as may suit his convenience or desires.

Client has right to employ attorney to appear for him as may suit his own convenience or desires.

6. Municipal corporations ⟹575—Provision in law requiring statement in notice of sale of amount due on improvement bond is mandatory, and noncompliance renders sale void (Bonding Act of 1913, § 35).

Where specific lot assessed for improvement taxes under Bonding Act of 1913 was sold on failure to pay interest and installments due on improvement bond issued, but notice of sale did not state amount due, sale was void, since provisions of Bonding Act 1913, § 35 (St. 1913, p. 975), providing that publication of notice of sale must contain statement of amount due, is mandatory and noncompliance renders sale void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Grace P. Warden against Lydia L. Lamb. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Everett Brown, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George Halverson and H. C. Hopkins, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff began this action to quiet title to a certain lot situate in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, The defendant, Lydia L. Lamb, appeared and answered plaintiff's complaint, denied the plaintiff's title, and alleged title in herself. On the trial of the issues so joined, judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals. Upon this appeal the chief cause urged by the appellant as ground for reversal herein is "that the court erred in admitting, over plaintiff's objection, the association of an attorney with the defendant, who appeared in propria persona." Other objections are raised, but only in a minor way, as to whether the defendant had shown title in herself. The appellant sets forth her objections under eight different headings, or rather numbers, but they all relate to the two specifications which we have mentioned.

The record shows that the respondent, in filing her answer to the plaintiff's complaint, appeared in propria persona, and subsequently filed with the court the following: "H. C. Hopkins is hereby associated as attorney of record in the above entitled cause. Dated, Los Angeles, September 24, 1926. Signed: Lydia L. Lamb. The above association is hereby accepted. Signed: H. C. Hopkins." Upon this writing being filed, it appears that a motion was made in court, at a time when counsel for the plaintiff was present, for the association of the said H. C. Hopkins as an attorney for the defendant, and upon such motion, the court, preceding the trial of this action, made the following order, as appears from the minutes of the court in the clerk's transcript, to wit: "Grace P. Warden, et al., plaintiff, vs. Lydia L. Lamb, defendant. Cause called. J. Everett Brown appearing for plaintiffs and H. C. Hopkins for defendants. Substitution of attorneys allowed and trial continued to October 14, 1926, over plaintiffs' objection that no showing for continuance is made." Later on an attorney by the name of George Halverson was associated as an attorney in the same cause. On the 19th day of October, 1926, the cause having been transferred to department No. 24, was called for trial, and the following appears in the clerk's transcript: "Cause transferred from department 24, called for trial, J. Everett Brown appearing for plaintiffs. On motion of H. C. Hopkins, it is ordered that H. C. Hopkins and George Halverson be substituted as attorneys for defendants. Attorney for plaintiffs objects to substitution of attorneys and asks the court to enter the default of defendant Lamb, which motion is by the court denied. Cause is dismissed as to all fictitious defendants." Thereupon, the trial of this action took place, the plaintiff introducing in evidence a tax deed to the plaintiff from the treasurer of the city of Los Angeles. The tax deed was the result of an alleged failure to pay the interest and certain installments due on an improvement bond issued as a lien against the lot involved under the Bonding Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 954) as amended by subsequent acts of the Legislature. Upon oral argument of this cause, counsel for appellant pressed upon our consideration only the objection urged that the court erred in permitting the association of counsel and refusing to grant appellant's motion for the entry of a default against the defendant.

[1, 2] As to the refusal of the court to grant appellant's motion for the entry of a default, it need only be stated that the appellant has not called to our attention any case or provision of the Codes which would authorize a trial court to enter default against the party defendant whose answer is on file, and this whether the defendant does or does not appear at the trial. In case the defendant fails to appear, the plaintiff's sole remedy is to move the court to proceed with the trial and introduce whatever testimony there may be to sustain the plaintiff's cause of action. This being an action to quiet title, the only course open to the plaintiff, had the defendant failed to appear at the time of the trial, would have been to introduce evidence tending to establish the plaintiff's title. Section 585 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not authorize the entry of any default in cases where an answer is on file, whether the defendant does or does not appear at the time the action is called for hearing.

[3-5] The appellant, in behalf of her objection to the order of the court in permitting the association of counsel and in permitting counsel to appear and introduce testimony in behalf of the defendant, cites a number of cases where attorneys have not been entered of record, where attempts have been made by such attorneys to serve papers, prepare bills of exceptions, and to take appeals. It seems unnecessary to review these cases, for the simple reason that no such questions are here presented. Section 284 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads, in part, as follows: "The attorney in an action or special proceeding may be changed at any time before or after judgment or final determination, as follows: 1. Upon consent of both client and attorney, filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes." If it be assumed that the defendant, appearing in her own person, was thereby clothed with the right to manage her own cause, she certainly had the right, under subdivision 1 of the section which we have quoted, to consent or to employ an attorney to appear for her. Whether the paper presented to the court, signed by the defendant, authorizing the appearance of H. C. Hopkins as an attorney, or of George Halverson as one of her attorneys, did or did not amount to a substitution in the strict sense of the word, is wholly immaterial in this case. The transcript shows that they appeared for the defendant at the trial of the action, were entered of record as attorneys for the defendant, and that absolutely no proceeding has been taken in this cause by the attorneys for the defendant which in any manner whatsoever has jeopardized or impaired the rights of the appellant, unless it be that they presented to the court admissible evidence justifying the court in entering judgment for the defendant rather than for the plaintiff. In all the cases cited by the appellant relative to the change and substitution of attorneys or the appearing of attorneys, the circumstances show some initiative taken by such attorneys which could only properly be taken by an attorney of record; that is, where notices of appeal are given or statements to be used on appeal are to be prepared, the person giving the notice as attorney must show that he has a legal right so to do. No case has been called to our attention nor have we been able to find any case where a judgment has been reversed on account of any informality in the authorization for the appearance of an attorney by his client where the attorney has been entered of record in the cause and the cause proceeded to trial with the presence of all parties in court having knowledge of the appearance of the different attorneys and where there is absolutely no showing that any prejudice has resulted to the party complaining of such informality. Nor can we conceive of any valid reason why, if it be assumed that the defendant in the first instance appeared as her own attorney, she did not have the right to employ as many attorneys to appear with her to conduct her cause, and have them entered of record as attorneys in the cause, as she thought wise or considered best for her own interests. In other words, it is wholly immaterial to the appellant in this cause whether the attorneys for the defendant, when ordered entered of record by the trial court, were substituted or associated; so long as they were entered upon the record by order of the court, they were persons upon whom notices might be served if necessary. So far as sections 284 and 285 of the Code of Civil Procedure are involved in this action, they are pertinent only in that they required the defendant to give the appellant due notice of attorneys which she was authorized or her attorneys were authorized to recognize. When that was done, as appears by the record of the court was done in this case, the appellant was left no cause for complaint. In so far as any irregularity of procedure may have occurred in the entry of the attorneys of record by the order of the court, or as to any informality in the writing signed by the defendant, employing her attorneys, we think that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution is applicable. Even the principal case cited by appellant, to wit, Prescott v. Salthouse, 53 Cal. 221, shows that, while the Code does not provide for associating attorneys in words, yet, if there had been an association in the case then being considered, and the notice of intention to move for a new trial had been given under the names of all of the attorneys, including the associating attorney, it would have been sufficient. We do not need to cite authorities to the effect that a client has a right to employ an attorney to appear for him as may suit his own convenience or desires. However, such is the holding in the case of Gage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 170, 68 P. 581. That the trial court had no authority to grant the appellant's motion for the entry of a default while the defendant's answer was on file, whether the appearance by the attorneys for her was regular or irregular, formal or informal, is shown by the case of Cuddahy v. Gragg, 46 Cal. App. 578, 189 P. 721. The court there said: "That a court has no authority to enter the default of a defendant if, when it was entered, he has a pleading on file, even though it was filed out of time, is a proposition supported by an almost unbroken line of decisions. The pleading, though filed out of time, is not a nullity; and until it has been disposed of by motion, or in some appropriate manner, no judgment by default can be entered"—citing a number of cases. In the case at bar there is no pretense that the answer of the defendant was not filed within the time allowed by law.

[6] The court found that the defendant at the time of the beginning of the action, was the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of the property involved. The court further found that the plaintiff had acquired no title to the premises. It was also further found by the court that the defendant had tendered to the plaintiff payment of the amount due on the bond, and that such tender was refused. So far as defendant's title is concerned, the record shows that the defendant acquired title thereto in the year 1900, and that for many years preceding the trial, and during the time of the proceeding leading up to the execution of the deed under which the plaintiff claims title, the defendant had been in possession of the property involved in this action. While there is no finding of the fact of such occupancy of the premises and possession by the plaintiff, the testimony in the record is such that such a finding would be warranted which testimony appears to be uncontradicted. While the appellant, upon oral argument, made no answer to the respondent's contention that the deed under which the appellant claimed was void, nor is there any contention made in appellant's briefs that the deed under which the appellant claims is valid, further than the statement that the introduction of the deed established a prima facie case, we will point out one or two of the errors which constitute sufficient reason for the entry of judgment in favor of the defendant in this action. Section 35 (St. 1913, p. 975) of the act of 1913, as amended, provides for a sale of the property to obtain payment of any amount that may be due upon any bond, where there has been a delinquency in the payment of interest or installments, and requires that in the publication of the notice of sale there must be a statement of the amount due. The application made to the treasurer for the sale of the property involved in this action does not state the amount due. The notice of publication does not correctly state the amount due in an amount greater than has been held substantial error in other cases. Under somewhat similar circumstances in the case of Chapman v. Jocelyn, 182 Cal. 294, 187 P. 962, it was held that the requirement of section 5 of the Bond Act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 37) as amended by St. 1899, p. 43, that notice of sale, under bonds for street assessments, shall state the amount due, is mandatory; that, if there is a failure to correctly state the amount due, the sale is rendered void. To the same effect is Simmons v. McCarthy, 118 Cal. 622, 50 P. 761. Other objections are made to the validity of the sale under which the appellant claims, such as there had been no notice as the law requires of the time when the appellant would apply for a deed; likewise that no notice had been given to the persons occupying the premises, as required by the act, in pursuance of which the bond was issued. To these different contentions on the part of the respondent, as we have stated, the appellant makes no reply, and, as they appear to be all well taken, the judgment of the trial court in favor of the defendant followed as a matter of course.

Finding no substantial error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HAKAM. (Cr. 1071.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 24, 1929.

1. Assault and battery 🔑92—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for assault with deadly weapon.

Evidence in prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, based on defendant's conduct in firing shots at prosecuting witness on defendant's return following preliminary altercation, held sufficient to sustain conviction.

2. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, admission of evidence that defendant had no license to carry revolver, though erroneous as involving separate offense, held not prejudicial (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1970; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In prosecution for assault with deadly weapon, admission of testimony that defendant never procured license to carry concealed revolver, though erroneous, as tending to prove another offense under the Deadly Weapon Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1970), held not prejudicial under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where separate offense was not referred to in evidence, instructions, or counsel's argument, except in objection made by defendant.

3. Criminal law 🔑730(14)—In prosecution of native of Afghanistan for assault with deadly weapon, argument relative to hot-blooded characteristics of defendant's nationality, followed by court's cautionary instruction, held not prejudicial.

In prosecution of native of Afghanistan for assault with deadly weapon, argument of district attorney that "it was that hot seething blood, which was incubated in some other country which has not cooled by association with the calmer peoples of the Western World, that was in his mind," held not prejudicial error as constituting misconduct, where made in response to plea of defendant's counsel for justice towards his client, and followed by court's instruction to disregard counsel's statement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; H. S. Gans, Judge.

Ali Hakam was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. McGowan, of Willows, and S. Luke Howe, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The defendant was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon. It is contended that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, and that the defendant was prejudiced by the admission of incompetent evidence which tended to prove another offense against him.

[1] We are of the opinion that the evidence amply supports the verdict. The defendant Ali Hakam is a native of Afghanistan. Together with a fellow countryman, he was engaged in harvesting a crop of rice on the Spaulding ranch in Glenn county, Cal. For this purpose they had employed the prosecuting witness, Ben L. Blackburn, and his two cousins. September 14, 1928, they were engaged in cutting and binding the grain. About four o'clock in the afternoon, while Blackburn was driving a Fordson tractor, the defendant visited the vicinity in his automobile, and taking a shovel on his shoulder crossed the field and intercepted the tractor, where he accosted the prosecuting witness, severely criticising the character of his work and inquiring in sarcasm if that was the best work he could do. A controversy followed, during which time Blackburn remained seated on the tractor while the defendant stood near by with his shovel in hand. Both individuals became angry. The prosecuting witness finally said: "If you don't like the way we're cutting the rice, go to the house and come back down here and pay us off."

He also asked the defendant why he did not get Mr. Boyd, who was the general manager of the Spaulding ranch, to come down and talk to him. To the latter remark the defendant replied that Boyd was not the boss and he did not have to get him. After a somewhat heated dispute over the character of the work the defendant wrathfully told Blackburn to go on and finish his work and that he would get no pay until he had completed it. The defendant testified that Blackburn said: "You go to h——l. * * * Go and tell Mr. Boyd (to) come and talk to us—not your black face." In anger the defendant then raised his shovel and struck at Blackburn, missing him and striking the tractor. The prosecuting witness immediately sprang from his seat to the side of the tractor opposite from which the defendant stood, and, seizing an iron pinchbar about 2 feet in length, he followed the defendant, who slowly retreated for a distance of 10 or 15 feet. No further blow was struck, however, in this feature of the encounter. After a few moments of such threatening demonstrations, the defendant said: "That's all right, you stay here, I go to the house—I come back." He then crossed the field in the direction of "Camp 7," where he lived. Blackburn resumed his place on the tractor and continued cutting the rice. After an absence of half or three-quarters of an hour, with barely time to complete the journey, he again drove down the Norman road to a point opposite that part of the rice field where Blackburn and his cousins were engaged in working, and this time, without the protection of his shovel, again crossed over and intercepted the prosecuting witness, who was still seated on his tractor. As the defendant approached his hand was concealed beneath the bib of his overalls. The prosecuting witness said: "I told him I knew he had a gun; if he would lay it on the Fordson we would settle our affair with our fists. * * * He said, 'You want to settle with me, do you?' And he pulled out the gun and started shooting. Q. Where did he pull the gun from? A. Under the bib of his overalls." The defendant then stood only 5 or 10 feet from the tractor. The prosecuting witness was unarmed. He sprang from the tractor and rushed upon the defendant, who fired at him but missed his mark. Mr. Blackburn testified in this regard: "He pulled the gun like that (indicating) and shot, see. And he missed. Then I grabbed the gun—he had it stuck in my stomach like that (indicating), see; and I threw it up. The next shot hit me in the shoulder; and threw it (me) down, and shot me in the stomach, and I do not know when I got this one in the arm here (indicating). * * *

"Q. He missed you, but the next shot you say struck you in the shoulder? A. Yes.

"Q. What was the effect of that shot? A. It knocked me down. * * *

"Q. * * * When do you say that you received the wound in your stomach? A. When I was lying on the ground."

At the time this affray occurred both cousins of Blackburn witnessed the encounter from a distance of about 100 to 150 yards and corroborate the material parts of his testimony. The defendant used a 32-caliber revolver which was concealed beneath the bib of his overalls, and he fired four or five shots, three of which took effect in the body of the prosecuting witness, one penetrating the shoulder, another entering the abdomen below the ribs, and a third passing through the fleshy portion of his arm. In spite of the serious wounds which were inflicted upon him the prosecuting witness managed to get upon his feet and run towards his cousins for aid. The defendant then returned to his automobile and reloaded his revolver with cartridges, a supply of which he kept in the machine. Blackburn was taken to a hospital seriously injured, but finally recovered.

The defendant claims that he returned to "Camp 7" after the first conflict to get Mr. Boyd, but failing to find him that he again returned to the rice field to inspect the character of the cutting of the grain. In spite of the fact that he saw the son of Mr. Boyd at the house, he failed to inquire as to the whereabouts of his father. He does not pretend that he went after money with which to pay the employees with the object of discharging them. Indeed, he told Mr. Blackburn he would not pay him until his contract was completed. He returned to the field as quickly as one could reasonably make the trip to and from the house, which was a distance of more than a mile. The jury had a right to assume that if he had gone to get Mr. Boyd he would have at least inquired for him from his son, and that, if he were returning with the object of again inspecting the cutting of the rice, he could have done so in any other portion of the field than the particular place where Blackburn was working with his tractor. It seems unreasonable to believe that he would immediately return to the presence of the individual with whom he had just had so serious a conflict, for the mere purpose of inspecting the cutting of the rice. In spite of the fact that the defendant testified that he had the revolver with him upon the occasion of the first controversy, the jury may have reasonably believed, from the surrounding circumstances, that he went to his home for the purpose of arming himself, and that he deliberately returned, intercepting Blackburn, and renewed the affray. It is true that the defendant contradicts the material parts of the foregoing story, claiming that he acted solely in self-defense. Three witnesses, however, corroborate Blackburn's version of the affray, which appears to be supported by the weight of evidence.

[2] It is true that the prosecution called three witnesses by each of whom they proved, over the objection of the defense, that the defendant never procured a license to carry a concealed revolver. No valid excuse was offered for the introduction of this testimony, except a statement by the district attorney that "we submit we are in our legal rights in making the proof." The defendant objected to this testimony on the ground that it was incompetent, and that it tended to prove another offense against the defendant. This objection should have been sustained. The evidence was incompetent and had no application to the offense with which the defendant was charged. The California Deadly Weapon Act (I Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923, p. 663, No. 1970) makes it a misdemeanor for any person, native citizen or foreign born, to carry a concealed revolver upon the person without having procured a license so to do. The same act also makes it a misdemeanor for an unnaturalized alien to have in his possession a revolver or other firearm capable of being concealed on his person, regardless of whether he has procured a permit or not. People v. Quarez, 196 Cal. 404, 238 P. 363. In proof of the particular crime with which the defendant was charged, it became essential to show that he carried a revolver upon his person. It is true that the concealing of a revolver upon the person, whether naturalized citizen or foreign born, without having procured a license so to do, is a misdemeanor distinct from the crime with which the defendant was charged. The gist of this statutory offense is to have a revolver on one's person without a license for its possession. This offense is merely malum prohibitum and not malum in se. The only objectionable element of this offense which was not necessary to prove the crime with which the defendant was charged was the lack of a license. Nowhere in the evidence adduced, the instructions given, or the argument of counsel was the separate offense referred to, except in the objection to the introduction of the evidence which was made by the defendant. Under the circumstances we are of the opinion that the admission of this testimony, considered in the light of article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution of California, was not prejudicial error.

[3] The appellant charges the district attorney with prejudicial misconduct in the use of the following language in the course of his argument to the jury: "You will not give to him (the defendant) the right to settle his civil differences by a force of arms, any more than you would arrogate to yourselves the right to settle your civil matters by giving and making a murderous assault upon a man with whom you had some business differences. It was that hot seething blood, which was incubated in some other country, which has not cooled by association with the calmer peoples of the Western World, that was in his mind at the time that he went out and he had this talk with this boy." This argument, however, had no reference to the charge of the commission of another offense, but was made in response to the argument on the part of defendant's counsel in his plea for justice toward his client to whom he referred as a foreign-born native of Afghanistan. The language of the district attorney may have been extravagant and unwarranted, although it had a reasonable reference to the temperament which one might presume that a man possessed who acted as the defendant did under the circumstances of this case. Moreover, at the request of the defendant, the court promptly charged the jury to disregard this language, saying: "The jury of course understands a man of any other race would be entitled to the same trial an American would be, and so far as the remarks made on the matter, you will disregard the remarks of counsel."

We are of the opinion that the foregoing remarks of the district attorney were not prejudicial, and that they did not constitute misconduct on his part.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

CHRISTIE v. CHRISTIE. (Civ. 6716.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 20, 1929.

Divorce ⚷156—Final judgment of divorce, entered more than year after interlocutory judgment, held not premature, notwithstanding intervening amended judgment.

Final judgment of divorce, entered more than a year after entry of original interlocutory judgment of divorce, merely adjudging plaintiff entitled to divorce, was not premature, at least so far as establishing the status of the parties, and so not subject to vacation on that account; the remedy for any erroneous awarding of custody of child being by amendment, though, shortly after entry of the interlocutory judgment, plaintiff, without notice, caused to be signed and entered an amended judgment and order, not purporting to set aside the original judgment, but reciting inadvertent omission therefrom of court order, as to custody and support of minor child, made at same time judgment was made, and again adjudging plaintiff entitled to divorce and embodying the provisions of the order, as whether the amendment was to correct a clerical error, and so effective, or to correct a judicial error, so that the order directing it was a nullity, the original interlocutory judgment stands as the judgment of the court and the basis for the final decree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Ruth A. Christie against Richard H. Christie for divorce. From an order vacating final decree for plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 276 P. 1045.

Lyle W. Rucker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lucian J. Clarke and Clarke & Wilson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LUCAS, Justice pro tem. Appeal is taken from an order vacating a final decree of divorce. By an interlocutory judgment of divorce made March 5, 1926, and entered March 8, 1926, it was adjudged that plaintiff was entitled to a divorce from the defaulting defendant. The judgment did not include or refer to the court's order, also made on March 5th, awarding plaintiff certain household goods and the custody of the minor child of the parties and providing for the support of plaintiff and said child and the payment of attorney's fees. Thereafter, on March 9, 1926, and without notice, plaintiff caused an amended judgment and order to be signed, reciting therein "that an interlocutory judgment was entered herein on the 8th day of March, 1926, but through inadvertence did not set forth the court's order as made on the 5th day of March, 1926," and again adjudging plaintiff to be entitled to a divorce and embodying the provisions of the March 5th order as to custody and support of the minor child, etc. This latter judgment and order did not by its terms purport to set aside or vacate the first interlocutory judgment. It was duly docketed and entered March 10, 1926.

On March 9, 1927, on motion of plaintiff, the court made and caused to be entered on the same day, its final judgment of divorce dissolving the bonds of matrimony between the parties (referring therein to the interlocutory judgment entered on March 8, 1926), and ordering and decreeing that "wherein said interlocutory decree makes any provision for alimony or the custody and support of children, said provision be and the same is hereby made binding on the parties affected thereby the same as if herein set forth in full, and that wherein said interlocutory decree relates to the property of the parties hereto, said property be and the same is hereby assigned in accordance with the terms thereof to the parties therein declared to be entitled thereto." As already pointed out, the interlocutory judgment thus referred to contained no provision as to alimony, property or custody of the child.

On March 30, 1927, the court, on motion of defendant, made its order adjudging the final judgment of divorce to have been prematurely entered and caused it, for that reason, to be vacated and set aside. The order of vacation recited that on January 17, 1927, the court made an order, pursuant to a written agreement of the parties, modifying the provisions concerning the custody of the minor child, and that the final decree did not embody the terms of such order. The order of January 17, 1927, is not set out in the transcript.

The appeal in this case is unique in this: Both appellant and respondent contend that the amended judgment and order of March 9, 1926 (entered March 10, 1926), is invalid, since no notice was given defendant and it was not procured pursuant to section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, or any other statute providing for the modification or amendment of judgments.

If this contention is correct the original interlocutory judgment of divorce, made March 5, 1926, and entered March 8, 1926, was at all times effective as the basis for a final judgment of divorce. Therefore, more than one year having expired after the entry of the interlocutory judgment, the court had jurisdiction on March 9, 1927, to make its final judgment of divorce, and the order of vacation appealed from is erroneous.

The cause of the unusual situation here presented is not apparent from the record, but from the brief of respondent, defendant below, it is made to appear that the day following the entry of the final judgment the parents of appellant, plaintiff below, procured an order adopting the minor son of appellant and respondent without notice to or consent of respondent, taking advantage, it is to be presumed, of the provisions of section 224 of the Civil Code. It also appears from said brief that appeal has been taken from an order denying a motion to set aside the order of adoption. With that we are not here concerned.

Our sole consideration concerns the validity of the order of vacation made herein. If the amended judgment and order was ineffective for any purpose, as both parties contend, the final judgment, as has already been pointed out, was not premature—at least in so far as it established the status of the parties. If the latter erroneously awarded the custody of the minor child, or was otherwise uncertain or incorrect, relief should have been sought by way of amendment or modification.

If the amended judgment and order was effective for any purpose it merely added to the original judgment that which the court had already decided, that is to say, it was an amendment to make the record speak the truth. Such amendments courts have inherent power to make at any time. DeCoe v. Johnson, 54 Cal. App. at page 604, 202 P. 362. "The power to amend is not wholly confined to the correction of an erroneous record; it extends also to cases where some provision of or omission from an order or judgment as made or rendered was due to the inadvertence or mistake of the court and may therefore properly be treated as a clerical misprision rather than a judicial error." 14 Cal. Jur. p. 995; Kowalsky v. Nicholson, 23 Cal. App. 160, 137 P. 607.

If, as so held in the case of McConville v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. App. at page 207, 248

P. 553, the amendment be regarded as having been made to correct a mere clerical error, the first judgment stands as the judgment of the court. On the other hand, if the correction was of a judicial error, the order of the court directing the amendment was a nullity. In either event the first interlocutory judgment stands as the judgment of the court and as the basis of the final decree.

It is to be remembered that the amended judgment did not purport to set aside the original judgment—in fact, it confirmed it. At the time the original judgment was made the court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, and its judgment was valid as far as it went. Even were it valid in part and void in part, the valid part would stand and the time for the entry of the final decree would begin to run from the date of entry of the valid portion. Claudius v. Melvin, 146 Cal. 257, 79 P. 897.

It is to be concluded, therefore, that the final judgment of divorce was not prematurely entered, and that the trial court erred in setting it aside.

The order appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by the Service Oil Company against L. E. Creeden. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert E. Austin and John N. Helmick, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. D. McLaughlin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, P. J. Defendant was a member of the board of directors of plaintiff. This action was commenced for the purpose of recovering a secret profit which it was alleged he had made on his agreement to procure from plaintiff a lease running to third parties who paid him, as a consideration for his services, the sum evidencing the profit. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

[1] The secretary of respondent testified at the trial that appellant produced a certain written instrument at a meeting of the directors of the corporation and that he said something at the time. The witness was then asked to state what appellant had said, and objection was made that time, place, and parties present had not been fixed, and the objection was overruled. If we concede that the foundation indicated by the objection was necessary—the particular point, however, is argued in the briefs—it is evident from the record that the objection was not good. Appellant had preceded the secretary as a witness. The date of the directors' meeting had been stated while he was on the stand, and he had testified that he was present on the occasion, although he could not remember the date. The document later referred to by the secretary, signed by directors of the corporation and produced from the minute book, had been exhibited to appellant and he had been asked if he did not bring it to the meeting. He had also been asked whether he did not, at that time and place and "in the presence of the directors signing that instrument," make the statement later, in substantial effect, attributed to him by the secretary in answer to the query to which objection was made. The meeting in question was the only one mentioned during the examination of appellant, which was short. He was immediately followed on the stand by the secretary. This witness testified that the document was "presented to us at this meeting" by appellant. Shortly after this statement the question to which objection was made was asked. The ruling of the court was proper.

[2] Appellant complains that the trial court erred in sustaining the objection to a question addressed to a witness by his counsel. However, the moment the objection was sustained the counsel remarked that the question was asked for a purpose he disliked to disclose. The judge then observed: "I will let you proceed on that statement." The question was at once again put to the witness and he answered it. There was here no error of which appellant may avail himself, even if we concede that the ruling was incorrect at the moment it was made.

Appellant makes one other point, but it is so obviously devoid of merit that it requires no particular discussion.

Judgment affirmed. Appellant is fined $50 for the prosecution of a frivolous appeal.

HARTMAN v. MOLLER. (Civ. 6661.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 20, 1929.

Guardian and ward 🔑10—Parent is entitled to guardianship of child in preference to any other in absence of finding of unfitness or incompetency.

A parent is entitled to the guardianship of his child in preference to any other person in the absence of a finding of unfitness or incompetency.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Separate petitions by Simon Hartman and by Margaret Moller for letters of guardianship of the person of Violet Hartman, a minor. From an order appointing petitioner Moller as guardian, petitioner Hartman appeals. Reversed.

Walter E. Dorn and L. W. Lovey, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Gottesfeld, Mann & Carmody and Harry Gottesfeld, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an appeal from an order appointing a guardian of the person of Violet Hartman, a minor child nine years of age.

When about six months old her father, the appellant, and her mother were divorced. Her mother was awarded the decree upon the ground of extreme cruelty and she was awarded to the custody of her mother, her father being ordered by the decree to pay a monthly sum for her support. During the years that followed she was left by her mother mostly in the care of her aunt, Margaret Moller, the respondent. Her mother died in May, 1925, and since that time Violet has remained with respondent.

Respondent filed a petition for letters of guardianship in August of the same year. Appellant also filed a similar petition a few days later and the two petitions were heard together. The court made an order appointing respondent guardian without expressly denying appellant's petition for letters. Findings of fact were made in some detail to the effect that it was for the best interests of the minor that respondent be appointed her guardian. There is no finding, however, that appellant is incompetent nor an unfit and improper person to have the guardianship of his daughter. The facts found upon which the court determined the best interests of the minor fall far short of meaning that the father is not competent to discharge the duties of the guardianship. The law is well settled that a parent is entitled to the guardianship of his child in preference to any other person in the absence of a finding of unfitness or incompetency. In re Campbell's Estate, 130 Cal. 380, 62 P. 613; In re Salter, 142 Cal. 412, 76 P. 51; Matter of Forrester, 162 Cal. 493, 123 P. 283; In re Mathews' Estate, 169 Cal. 26, 145 P. 503; Estate of Akers, 184 Cal. 514, 194 P. 706; In re Green, 192 Cal. 714, 221 P. 903.

The order is therefore reversed.

SCOTT v. LOS ANGELES WHOLESALERS BOARD OF TRADE. (Civ. 3773.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 21, 1929.

Landlord and tenant 🔑80½—Plaintiff suing, as assignee from partnership of sublease, for money received from sale of partnership's order on sublessees, must prove assignment.

One claiming assignment of partnership's interest in sublease, in suit against partnership's creditor for appropriation of money received from sale of partnership's order on sublessees for payment of rentals, had burden to prove assignment of partnership's interest, and, on failure to make such proof, could not recover.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William S. Baird, Judge.

Action by D. M. Scott against the Los Angeles Wholesalers Board of Trade. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel Spencer Jackson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. T. Craig, of Los Angeles (Merrill L. Granger, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff and J. A. Platt entered into a partnership under the name of Bankers' Stationery Company; that the partnership obtained a lease of certain premises for a period of five years at a rental stated in the complaint; that subsequently they sublet the premises to M. S. Evans and Helen Campbell at a higher rental; that thereafter the partnership was dissolved by mutual consent; "that upon said dissolution, said partnership for a valuable consideration duly assigned to plaintiff herein all of said partnership's right, title and interest in and to said sublease"; that prior to the dissolution of the partnership the defendant held for collection accounts against the partnership amounting to not more than $900; that the partnership, "in order to avoid lawsuits," gave the defendant an order on said sublessees to pay the rentals as they fell due to the defendant "and pay off the said $900"; that without the knowledge or consent of "plaintiff, and against the wish of plaintiff," the defendant "sold said order to said M. S. Evans and Helen Campbell for the sum of $1,600 and appropriated the same" to its own use. Other appropriate allegations are made. The purpose of the action is to recover the difference between the partnership indebtedness of $900 and the amount which the partnership otherwise would have received from its sublessees.

The answer denies most of the allegations of the complaint. It denies the alleged assignment from the partnership to the plaintiff. No effort was made by the plaintiff to prove the alleged assignment. It appears that this failure of proof was not a mere oversight, because the plaintiff's attention was called thereto by the defendant's motion for a nonsuit on the ground, among others, "that the evidence wholly fails to show any right in this plaintiff to maintain the action." The plaintiff made no request for permission to supply the missing proof. Since the burden was on the plaintiff to prove the assignment, the court properly found against him on that issue.

It is clear from the record that the plaintiff was not suing in behalf of the partners or the partnership, but only in his individual behalf, and that, without proof of the assignment to him, he had no stnading to maintain the action. As the judgment must be affirmed on the ground stated, it is unnecessary to consider other alleged grounds for reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Contracts ⇨322(3)—Evidence held to sustain findings that defendant owed plaintiffs nothing because of their failure to perform services and furnish materials contracted for.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain trial court's findings that defendant owed plaintiffs nothing because of their failure, refusal, and neglect to perform services and furnish materials, for which defendant agreed to pay amount sued for.

2. Contracts ⇨305(1)—Contract time for installing draperies and furnishings held not waived by extension of time after long delay.

Agreed time limit for plaintiffs' installation of draperies and furnishings in defendant's home held not waived by defendant's extension of time after weeks of delay beyond time stipulated, notwithstanding defendant's constant insistence on compliance with contract, especially where plaintiffs finally failed to fulfill it with respect to both materials and workmanship, furnishings installed were returned to and accepted by them, and no offer of performance was subsequently made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by C. L. Netzel and another, doing business under the firm name of the Standard Furniture Company, against Gurli Mellenthin. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Stephen Monteleone, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ray E. Nimmo and Edward B. Howell, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. [1] In the instant matter it appears that by virtue of a memorandum contract entered into between the parties hereto it was agreed that, for a consideration of the sum of $3,250, plaintiffs would supply the necessary labor and materials for installing in the home of defendant certain draperies and furnishings. Prior to, at, as well as immediately after, the time when the memorandum of contract was signed by the parties, it was understood between them that the entire work was to be completed not later than three weeks from the date of the contract, and that for seemingly important reasons, time was made the essence of such agreement. As a matter of fact, the draperies and furnishings were never completely installed by plaintiffs in the home of defendant. In that connection the evidence showed that, frequently from time to time before the three weeks' period from the date of the contract had expired, defendant requested of plaintiffs that the draperies and furnishings be installed within the time limit which had been agreed upon, but that, instead of complying with the condition of the contract in that regard, plaintiffs delayed the matter for a period of about two months before the actual work of installation of the principal portion of the draperies and furnishings was commenced by them, at which time, notwithstanding a prior notice to them by defendant to the effect that the contract was canceled, ostensibly they proceeded to install in the home of defendant "only a small portion" of the draperies and furnishings which they had agreed to install therein. However, it was found by the court: "That none of the said draperies or furnishings were in conformity with the terms of said contract, in that said draperies and furnishings were not handmade, and some of them were made of materials different from those provided in said contract, and some of them were not lined or interlined as provided in said contract; that a reasonable time for the plaintiffs to complete the terms of said written contract between the parties would have been one month; but that said contract was not completed within two months from the date of said contract." It appears that theretofore plaintiffs had installed some flimsy, damaged, and makeshift materials in one or two of the rooms covered by the contract, to all of which defendant had immediately and strenuously objected to plaintiffs, with the result that plaintiffs had repeatedly promised defendant that substitutions would be made so as to conform to the spirit and the letter of the contract between them. Such promises, however, were not kept or performed.

As further shown by the evidence, although a limit of three weeks was originally agreed upon by the parties for the completion of the contract, almost continuously from the time the contract was executed until approximately two weeks before plaintiffs finally attempted to install the draperies and furnishings, defendant urged plaintiffs to install the draperies and furnishings in her home in accordance with the memorandum of agreement that had been entered into between the parties—at which latter time the attorney for defendant, acting in her behalf, notified the plaintiffs in writing that, although the order for the manufacture and hanging of the draperies was given with the understanding that it was to be executed within three weeks, more than seven weeks had elapsed and the order was "no nearer completion than at any time." In said communication attention of plaintiffs was directed to "certain draperies placed upon windows of one bedroom * * * being the only one completed, * * * damaged throughout by what apparently was done in removing threads and the silk material has been torn in many places. Therefore the draperies are not acceptable." Also: "That unless this order is executed by the evening of April 25, you need proceed no further and nothing will be paid by Mrs. Mellenthin." Notwithstanding the limit fixed by such communication, defendant again orally extended the time for performing the contract, but only upon the expressed condition that plaintiffs would give defendant a written agreement that the draperies would be ready by May 5th, which proposition was neither accepted nor performed by plaintiffs in any way. However, on May 5th a second letter was addressed to plaintiffs by the attorney for defendant, in which, after directing attention to the particular provisions of the contract between the parties and the breach thereof by plaintiffs, the following statements occur:

"* * * In view of this, Mrs. Mellenthin cannot proceed and will place an order with another house for the completion of this work, unless you desire to see me immediately or reduce to writing what you will do, and keep your agreement.

"The agreement has been completely breached by your failures in all of its details, but Mrs. Mellenthin is willing to let you have one more opportunity. I will take this up with you personally if you so desire. If not, we will treat the transaction at an end. I shall expect to hear from you not later than 4 o'clock Wednesday, May 6th."

The ultimatum thus delivered to plaintiffs was utterly ignored by them. Not until May 9th, which was three days beyond the utmost limit of any implied extension contained in the last communication addressed by defendant to plaintiffs, was any attempt made by plaintiffs to conform in any way with the requirements of their agreement. At that time, without specific objection of defendant, but in the absence of either any request or authorization by her so to do, plaintiffs proceeded with the installation of a portion of the draperies and furnishings in the home of defendant in attempted compliance with the terms of the contract. Both in workmanship and materials furnished, the job was most unsatisfactory; so much so that, after permitting the work to proceed for one day, during which time defendant continually complained thereof, not only to the employees of plaintiffs, but as well to one of the plaintiffs personally, defendant finally declined and refused to permit anything further to be done in the matter of performing the contract, and thereupon returned to plaintiffs all the draperies and effects which theretofore had been placed by plaintiffs in the home of defendant. It will thus be noted that the evidence was ample to sustain the findings of fact by the trial court that "defendant does not owe said amount ($3,250), or any amount to plaintiffs, for the reason that plaintiffs failed, refused and neglected to perform services and furnish materials for which defendant had agreed to pay said amount."

[2] Appellants urge the point that in the circumstances as shown by the evidence the time limit fixed in the agreement between the parties was waived; but such contention is completely answered by the fact that at no place in the evidence does it appear but that, far from acquiescing in the delinquencies and failures of plaintiffs, defendant was constantly and vehemently insisting upon a compliance by them with the terms of the contract. The fact that after weeks of delay beyond the time stipulated for the completion of the contract defendant graciously extended to plaintiffs an opportunity to at last "make good" should not militate against the apparent rights of defendant in the premises, especially in view of the fact that finally plaintiffs failed both with respect to the materials and the workmanship which went into the draperies and furnishings which were installed by them in the home of defendant and which, after being rejected by the latter, were returned to and accepted by plaintiffs. Nor does the evidence show that thereafter any offer of performance of the contract in accordance with its terms, or otherwise, was ever made by plaintiffs to defendant.

Notwithstanding the legal aspects connected with the original time limit of three weeks within which it was agreed that the contract would be completed, and notwithstanding the disappointment and inconvenience suffered by defendant on account of the failure of plaintiffs in that regard, no inclination is discernible on the part of defendant to insist upon the "pound of flesh" to which by the strict letter of the contract she was entitled. To the contrary, every reasonable opportunity to fulfill the requirements of the agreement was extended to plaintiffs. That the contract was rescinded and canceled is due not to any fault in defendant, but solely because of the delinquencies and shortcomings of plaintiffs.

The judgment is affirmed.

WORKS, P. J. In this action for the recovery of money loaned, judgment went for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

It is contended that the superior court was without jurisdiction of the cause upon the theory that the evidence disclosed that the amount loaned was but $250, and that this sum was less than $300, the latter amount representing the limit of the jurisdiction of the superior court. The complaint alleged, however that one of the plaintiffs had loaned to defendant the sum of $325. That allegation fixed the jurisdiction in the superior court. Dashiell v. Slingerland, 60 Cal. 653.

Appellant pleaded the bar of the statute of limitations. The court found against him on the question. He now insists upon the point, but it is plain that the finding is amply supported by the evidence.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for damages for negligence which is alleged to have caused the destruction of pasturage and cordwood by means of a grass fire.

The defendant owned a right of way along which it was engaged with a gang of workmen in reconstructing a line of electric power poles. Fifteen or twenty men under the direct supervision of Mr. Mahan, a subforeman, were employed setting poles in the vicinity of Colgate. The right of way was covered with a stand of dry grass and weeds. A strong wind was blowing. Some of the workmen were occasionally smoking. A grass fire was started from the stump of a live cigarette or from a burning match carelessly thrown away by a workman. In spite of strenuous efforts to control the fire, it spread rapidly to the adjoining fields owned by the plaintiff, destroying the pasturage on some 1,400 acres of land, together with a large quantity of cordwood and fence posts. Upon the trial the court adopted findings holding that the appellant negligently permitted dry grass and weeds to accumulate and remain upon the right of way, that it was aware of the habits of its employees to engage in smoking during their employment, and that it failed to prohibit its employees from smoking under such circumstances. Based upon these findings, judgment was rendered in behalf of the plaintiff. No question is raised as to the amount of damages.

The appellant contends that the findings are not supported by the evidence, for the reason that it appears without conflict that the conduct of the workmen in smoking or carelessly throwing away burning cigarette stumps or matches was not within the scope of their employment, and that the result of such negligence was therefore not binding upon it, and that there is no evidence of the appellant's knowledge that its employees were accustomed to smoke under such circumstances. The entire record with relation to the actual smoking or use of matches upon this occasion or the habit of the workmen to engage in smoking during their employment consists of the following. Mr. Henshaw, an employee, testified:

"Q. Did you notice whether they were smoking? A. One was smoking once. I called his attention to it. * * * He was smoking a cigarette and throwed it down—If you want to know just the words I said, I says, 'Watch, you might start a fire.' * * * He says 'There is nothing there to burn, it is so damned dry and hot the ground will burn.' And he put his foot on it and went back to work. * * * It didn't burn from that cigarette, for he put his foot on it. * * * It didn't start very far away, about six or eight feet from where he throwed it. * * *

"Q. Was the other man smoking who was working in that post-hole? A. He was smoking a pipe. I don't think he was smoking right then but one was smoking a cigarette and the other smoking a pipe, and I was smoking. * * * When they hollered 'Fire' I was stooped over lighting my pipe. * * *

"Q. Were the men generally smoking around there? A. I didn't see anybody barred from smoking.

"Q. You smoked, did you? A. I smoked and the two digging the hole were smoking.

"Q. And you saw them smoking around the camp? A. Yes."

Mr. Lind, an employee, also testified:

"When I went to get a drink of water I saw Mr. Henshaw standing alongside of his slughole and I knew he had his pipe. I seen him start the match and throw the match down and he took another one. * * * The head flew off of it and that is all there was to it. He went down into the hole and in about a second after that the fire came up. * * * It started about three or four feet from his hole. * * *

"Q. You were smoking, weren't you? A. Why, no, I wasn't smoking at the time.

"Q. You did smoke? A. Yes.

"Q. You smoke cigarettes? A. I do smoke cigarettes, but over there I didn't have any cigarettes.

"Q. What did your partner smoke? A. My partner smoked— He smoked Prince Albert, rolled a cigarette out of Prince Albert tobacco."

The record contains no evidence that the foreman was in the vicinity at the time the fire commenced to burn. There is no evidence as to the habit of the workmen to smoke during their employment upon this or previous occasions.

The sole question involved upon this appeal is whether the agent of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company omitted to do anything which a reasonably prudent person should have done under the circumstances to prevent the fire which destroyed plaintiff's property. Section 2338 of the Civil Code provides in part: "A principal is responsible to third persons for the negligence of his agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, including wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business, and for his wilful omission to fulfill the obligations of the principal."

Section 2339 of the Civil Code provides: "A principal is responsible for no other wrongs committed by his agent than those mentioned in the last section, unless he has authorized or ratified them, even though they are committed while the agent is engaged in his service."

[1] Knowing the inflammable and dangerous condition of the dry grass, it would be the duty of the agent in charge of the restoration of the pole line to prohibit careless use of cigarettes or matches by the employees. If the master had knowledge of the negligent use of cigarettes or matches by its employees under such dangerous circumstances, it might be liable for damages for retaining in its employ one who persisted in such careless habits. The failure to do so might constitute an authorization or ratification of the negligent act of the employee which resulted in the fire. The record, however, is devoid of evidence indicating that the agent of the appellant had any such knowledge, or that the employees were addicted to the habit of smoking under such dangerous circumstances. A mere presumption that workmen are accustomed to smoke while engaged in their employment will not warrant a finding of negligence on the part of the employer.

[2] Neither the habit of smoking on the part of the employees, nor the careless tossing of a cigarette stump or burning match into dry grass or inflammable material near by, are acts within the scope of the employment of men engaged in digging holes or setting electric power poles. Feeney v. Standard Oil Co., 58 Cal. App. 587, 209 P. 85; Williams v. Jones, 3 Hurl. & C. 256, 159 Eng. Rep. 528, affirmed 159 Eng. Rep. 668. With reference to the application of the sections of the Civil Code above cited to a similar affair, it is said in Feeney v. Standard Oil Co., supra: "Under the rule thus declared it seems clear that the defendant is not responsible for McDonald's negligent act in dropping the lighted match into the gasoline. The lighting of the cigaret was no part of the transaction of the defendant's business. It was an independent act for McDonald's personal enjoyment. It occurred during the time of his transaction of the defendant's business, but was no part thereof and was not in the course of his employment. The fact that defendant had instructed McDonald not to smoke while delivering gasoline does not enter into the problem."

[3] As a general rule, an employer is not liable for damages resulting from fires started by an employee merely to serve his own pleasure or purpose, which acts have no connection with the duties of his employment, and which have not been directly or indirectly authorized or ratified. 39 C. J. 1300, § 1498; 18 R. C. L. 806, § 262; Adams v. Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Co. (C. C. A.) 295 F. 586; Morier v. St. Paul, M. & M. Ry. Co., 31 Minn. 351, 17 N. W. 952, 47 Am. Rep. 793; Excelsior Prod. Mfg. Co. v. Kansas City So. R. Co., 263 Mo. 142, 172 S. W. 359, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 1047; Ireton v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 96 Kan. 480, 152 P. 625, L. R. A. 1917F, 1120.

[4-6] Unless the acts or omissions of the appellant in the present case amounted to an authorization or ratification of the employees' habit of smoking while they were engaged in work under such circumstances as existed at the time of the fire, it will not be liable for the damage resulting from the negligence of its laborers occurring in the performance of acts or conduct outside of the scope of their employment. If the appellant was guilty of negligence which imposed liability upon it for the damage resulting from the fire, it is because it either failed to remove the dry grass from the right of way before permitting its employees to work thereon, or because with knowledge of their custom to smoke while engaged in working, it failed to prohibit them from doing so under the dangerous circumstances which existed at the time of the fire. It is unreasonable to hold that the law would require the employer to remove dry grass from a right of way which was more than three miles in length, before permitting workmen to proceed to replace power poles thereon. The evidence is undisputed that the foreman, MaLean, who had charge of these workmen, was "about a mile down the line" at the time the fire began. There is no evidence that the foreman, or any authorized agent of appellant having charge of the employees, knew that it was their habit to smoke while engaged in working, or that they were actually smoking on the occasion of this fire. It may not be said that the court, as a matter of law, will take judicial notice of the fact that laboring men do ordinarily smoke while engaged in working under such circumstances as existed in the present case. It is an invariable rule that a charge of negligence must be supported by evidence before resulting damages may be imposed.

In support of the judgment, the respondent relies chiefly upon the case of Palmer v. Keene Forestry Ass'n, 80 N. H. 68, 112 A. 798, 13 A. L. R. 995, where a judgment for damages resulting from a fire occurring under similar circumstances was upheld. That action, however, is readily distinguishable from the present case. In that case there was evidence that the foreman himself and the employees were accustomed to smoke while engaged in working. The facts are recited as follows: "The evidence tended to show that the men, or some of them, including the foreman, smoked while doing their work; that they smoked at their boarding house and at the railroad station; that they were not forbidden to smoke while at work."

[7] Since there is no substantial evidence in the present case to support the findings to the effect that the appellant knew it was the habit of the employees to smoke while engaged in work, or knew they were smoking at the time the fire occurred, a reversal of the judgment becomes imperative.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

KELSEY et al. v. STRONG.

(Civ. 6460.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 16, 1929.

1. Wills 🔑285—Court properly denied leave to amend will contest to allege contestant was legatee under former will, where proponents tendered such legacy.

Court properly denied contestant's application for leave to amend will contest by alleging that she was legatee under former will, where proponents, at time application came on for hearing, tendered her amount of $10 bequeathed her under former will.

2. Wills 🔑285—Other legatees under former will not before court, could not be injected into will contest via contestant's application for leave to amend.

Where rights of other legatees besides contestant under former will were not before court, they could not be injected into contest via contestant's application for leave to amend contest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Petition by J. H. Kelsey and others for the probate of the will of Laura L. Turk, deceased. From an order dismissing the contest, Elizabeth Strong, contestant, appeals. Order affirmed.

R. S. Harrington, of Sawtelle, and Fogel & Beman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fredericks, Hanna & Morton, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, P. J. Contestant filed her written contest of the will of deceased. As showing her right to inaugurate the contest, she alleged that she was a sister of the deceased. In the answer to the contest, this allegation was not denied. More than a year after the contest was filed, however, an amended answer was filed, and a denial was then interposed. Up to this time the counsel for contestant had believed that she was a sister of the decedent, but he now made an inquiry and ascertained she was but a sister-in-law. He immediately made written application to the court for leave to amend the contest by alleging that contestant had been a legatee of decedent under a former will. The application showed that the amount of the legacy was $10. It was shown, too, that the counsel of contestant were also attorneys for other legatees under the former will, and that the contest had been filed by contestant "as representative of said other legatees." The proponents of the last will opposed the request for leave to amend the contest and tendered to contestant the sum of $10, the amount of her legacy under the former will. Leave to amend was denied by the court. When the contest came on for hearing, it failed because of the inability of contestant to show that she was a sister of the deceased, and the contest was dismissed. Contestant appeals from the order of dismissal.

[1] There was no abuse of discretion in the order of the trial court denying the application for leave to amend the contest. The amount to be secured to appellant as the result of a successful contest—the sum of $10—was so small as to render the contest a matter of negligible moment, especially as the amount was tendered to her at the time the application came on for hearing.

[2] The rights of the other legatees under the former will were not before the court and could not be injected into the proceeding via the application for leave to amend.

Order affirmed.

Evidence held sufficient to support finding that employer was not negligent, where housemaid fell in hole dug by plumbers in basement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul B. Dougherty, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Mary E. Daly against Mary A. Wight and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Warren L. Williams and Seymour S. Silverton, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LUCAS, Justice pro tem. By this action appellant, Mary E. Daly, housemaid and servant of respondent Mary A. Wight, seeks to recover damages from said respondent and from respondents Anderson Bros., plumbers, who were engaged in repairing the plumbing in the basement of the Wight home. It is alleged that appellant sustained personal injuries in the course of her employment by reason of the negligence of the several respondents.

The evidence shows that on the day the injuries are alleged to have been sustained, Anderson Bros. had made an excavation in the floor of the Wight basement approximately 3 feet long and variously estimated to be from 8 inches to 1½ feet wide and of a depth equal to its width. After Anderson Bros. had quit their work for the day, appellant went down to the basement for the purpose of turning off the electric lights, found the basement floor partially flooded with water, and while walking through the water for the purpose of turning off the lights stepped into the excavation, stumbled, and fell against a sledge hammer, thereby bruising her body and fracturing two ribs.

The respondents Wight and Anderson Bros. filed separate answers, in substance denying the material allegations of appellant's complaint and averring that negligence on the part of appellant was the proximate cause of her injury. In addition respondent Wight in her answer pleaded that, Anderson Bros. were independent contractors and that they alone were responsible for the injuries complained of, if any.

The case was tried without a jury, and the court rendered judgment for respondents. From this judgment appeal is taken on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify certain findings.

[1] The findings that Anderson Bros. did not negligently or at all leave the hole in the basement unprotected or uncovered, and that appellant had knowledge of the existence of said hole, are both said to be erroneous. Yet, in this regard, John R. Anderson, one of the respondents, and the witness John Lightfoot, both testified that when they quit work the afternoon in question, as a protection against accident, they left the electric lights burning in the basement and barricaded the excavation with an ironing board and so-called zig-zag clothes bars. They also testified that appellant was told by Anderson about the hole in the basement floor and was advised to leave the lights burning.

Appellant testified in effect that at the time of the accident the excavation was filled with water, the basement floor was covered with water, and that she saw nothing on the surface of the water at all. Appellant's son-in-law, C. H. Stoddard, gave similar testimony. Appellant denied that she knew anything about the existence of the hole or was told to keep the lights burning. There being a substantial conflict in the foregoing testimony, and the court hearing the evidence being in a far better position to say who told the truth than is this court, its findings in reference thereto should not be disturbed. "It is a cardinal doctrine often enunciated, that where, upon a question of fact, the testimony in the court below involves a substantial conflict, the action of the court below will not be disturbed." 10 Cal. Jur., p. 1172, and cases cited.

[2] The finding of the trial court that ap-pellant's injuries were sustained by reason of her own carelessness and negligence is, in the opinion of this court, sufficiently supported by the evidence. For, in spite of an oral warning of a hidden danger, a barricade indicating such danger, the presence of water obstructing the view of the course she was about to pursue, and the request not to do the very thing she was doing when injured, appellant nevertheless willfully persisted in a course of conduct which resulted in her injury.

In view of the supported findings that appellant herself was negligent and that the respondents Anderson were free from negligence, the question as to whether other findings are unsupported by the evidence becomes of no importance.

[3] As to the liability of respondent Wight, the most that can be said is that her negligence is to be measured by that of the Andersons, and since they have been properly found free from negligence, so must she. Neither being negligent, it is not necessary to consider the remaining issue as to whether or not the Andersons were independent contractors.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MOAKLEY v. LOS ANGELES PAC. RY. CO. et al. (Civ. 3769.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 21, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 20, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 18, 1929.

1. Records ⇨9(13)—Filing of title registration petition, not naming reversioners under deed to petitioners' grantor, held constructive fraud, because of which they were not notified and hence were not bound by decree (Land Title Law 1914 and § 12).

Filing of petition, under Land Title Law 1914 (St. 1915, p. 1932), for registration of titles to land, claimed by petitioners under quitclaim deeds from railway company, which abandoned use thereof as right of way, without naming parties who conveyed way to railway company, subject to reversion to them or their assigns if grantee failed to maintain and operate line for six months, constituted at least constructive fraud, by reason of which neither grantors nor their successor were notified of proceeding under section 12, so that court never acquired jurisdiction to bind them by decree; such notice serving purpose of summons in ordinary civil action.

2. Quieting title ⇨34(5)—Plaintiff in suit to quiet title need not state nature of defendant's claim.

In a suit to quiet title, plaintiff is not required to set forth the nature of defendant's claim.

3. Quieting title ⇨43—Plaintiff in suit to quiet title could prove want of notice and fraud invalidating title registration decree not pleaded by defendants (Land Title Law 1914, § 12).

While defendants in suit to quiet title were not required to set up nature of title claimed by them, nor to plead title registration decree on which they relied, plaintiff could prove invalidity thereof as against her for want of notice, required by Land Title Law 1914 (St. 1915, p. 1932) § 12, and extrinsic fraud in procuring it, under implied replication, without thereby collaterally attacking decree.

4. Records ⇨9(13)—Plaintiff in suit to quiet title held not bound by findings in title registration proceeding, of which she had no notice, that defendants had title by adverse possession (Land Title Law 1914 and § 12).

Plaintiff in suit to quiet title held not bound by findings in title registration proceeding, under Land Title Law (St. 1915, p. 1932), that defendants had acquired title by adverse possession, where neither she nor her grantors had notice thereof, as required by section 12.

5. Judgment ⇨243—Court cannot determine rights of defendant's grantee, not party to action to quiet title.

Where one, to whom one of defendants in action to quiet title conveyed all his interest in property, was not a party to action, court was without jurisdiction to determine whether such grantee's title was less vulnerable than that of her grantor as against plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action by Emily Moakley against the Los Angeles Pacific Railway Company, Alphonso Swaboda, and others. From a judgment for defendants Swaboda and others, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James W. Bell, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action to quiet title to a strip of land formerly occupied by the defendant railway company as a right of way. The complaint is in the usual short form. The answer of the defendants Young and Alphonso and Margaret Swaboda deny the allegations of the complaint. Their denial of the allegation that their claims are unfounded is in the following language: "Defendants deny that the claims of said defendants and each of them or of said defendants or each of them are without any right whatever and deny that said defendants or either of them have no estate, right, title or interest in or to said real property above described or any part thereof."

At the trial, the foregoing denial was treated as a sufficient statement of the defendants' claims to admit proof thereof, and no question in relation thereto is raised by the parties to this appeal.

Judgment was entered quieting plaintiff's title to a part of the strip of land and adjudging that Alphonso and Margaret Swaboda and "the successors in interest" of Young are the owners of the remainder of the strip and that the plaintiff "has no right, title, or interest," in such remainder. The plaintiff has appealed from the part of the judgment in favor of such defendants.

[1] February 28, 1900, Robert M. Turner and wife conveyed to the Los Angeles & Pacific Railway Company "a right of way for a state railway over" the strip of land described in the complaint. The deed contained the following:

"Should grantee fail to maintain and operate a line over said right of way for regular passenger traffic for a period of six months, said right of way and all rights under this instrument shall immediately revert to grantors or to their assigns."

"The railway company tore up its tracks and abandoned the use of the property * * * on or about September 1, 1915."

The defendants' claims of title are all based on quitclaim deeds executed by the defendant railway company October 11, 1921.

January 11, 1923, Young and others filed their petition in the superior court for the registration of their titles under the provisions of the Land Title Law of 1914 (Stats. 1915, p. 1932). Included in the lands described in the petition were the lands in controversy on this appeal. The petition was accompanied by an abstract of title showing all the conveyances mentioned. Notwithstanding the fact that the interest of the Turners clearly appeared from a mere reading of the abstract, they were not named in the petition, and one of the allegations thereof reads as follows: "That as applicants are informed and believe, and therefore allege, there is no person who has any estate, or claims any interest in the, or any part of the land hereinafter described, other than as stated in each application, in law or equity, in possession, remainder, reversion or expectancy."

The court ordered that "notice of filing said petition be given, as provided in the land registration act, directed to all persons known and unknown who have, or claim to have an interest in, or lien upon, said land, and to all whom it may concern," and that said notice be published in the Los Angeles Review for four successive weeks. Notice, directed to a long list of persons, but not containing the names of the plaintiff or the Turners, was duly published as ordered, and on May 7, 1923, a decree was entered confirming the titles of the petitioners and ordering the issuance of certificates of title to them. Certificates of title were so issued pursuant to the order.

It is clear from the record that the acts of the petitioners constituted at least constructive fraud, extrinsic in character, and that, by reason thereof, neither the Turners nor the plaintiff herein were given any notice of the registration proceeding, and that therefore the court never acquired jurisdiction to bind them by the decree. Section 12 of the act provides: "When the court shall order notice given, a notice must be issued, under the seal of the court, * * * which notice shall be directed to all parties appearing by the petition or the petition and abstract or by the report of the examiner of titles, if any, to have any interest in the land or any part thereof."

The notice in question is the process by the service of which the court acquires jurisdiction of the parties to whom it is directed. It serves the same purpose as a summons in an ordinary civil action. No one would contend that jurisdiction of the person of a known defendant can be acquired by publication of a summons in which his name does not appear. Respondents rely on American Land Co. v. Zeiss, 219 U. S. 47, 31 S. Ct. 200, 55 L. Ed. 82. In that case, however, the court was not considering the question of notice to known owners. The court said: "As no complaint is made concerning the provisions of the statute relating to the designation of and notice to known claimants, we put that subject out of view and address ourselves to the provisions relating to unknown claimants or claims." The precise question presented on this appeal was decided in Riley v. Pearson, 120 Minn. 210, 139 N. W. 361, L. R. A. 1916D, 7, in which case, quoting from the syllabus, it was held: "Where, in proceedings under the Torrens act to register title, the applicant fails to disclose to the court the names of persons known to him to have an interest in or lien upon the property, and such persons are not named as parties to the proceeding or served with summons, and do not have actual notice of the proceeding, a judgment rendered therein is not binding upon such persons."

In Follette v. Pacific L. & P. Corp., 189 Cal. 193, 203, 208 P. 295, 299 (23 A. L. R. 965) in considering the provision of section 12, requiring personal service on occupants of the land, it is said: "To adopt a construction of said law which would permit a petitioner thereunder to imperil or destroy the vested rights and interests of the occupants of the property by the simple process of omitting their names as parties to such proceedings and by so doing obtain jurisdiction by a mere publication of notice and without that personal service of process which the law designates as to those whose names are required to be set forth in said petition would be a manifest injustice and would work a departure from those constitutional principles which are as old as Magna Charta and which guarantee to the owners of vested interests in property that they shall not be deprived of these without due process of law."

The foregoing argument applies with equal force to the omission from the petition and the notice of the names of persons shown by the abstract of title to have an interest in the land to which the petitioner claims title. The omission was a failure to comply with one of the express provisions of the statute relative to the contents of the required notice, and such provision is mandatory. 21 Cal. Jur. 485. It appears from the record that the Turners were residents of the state of Kansas, and that therefore service of the notice might have been made on them by publication, but publication of a notice in which their names do not appear was not notice to them in any sense.

[2, 3] Respondent contends that appellant's attack on the decree is collateral. In the Follette Case the plaintiff relied solely on a similar decree. The defendant therein alleged facts, in effect the same as those relied on by the plaintiff in this case, showing fraud and lack of jurisdiction. The court held that "the assault which the defendant makes upon this decree is not a collateral but a direct attack." In a suit to quiet title "the plaintiff is not required to set forth the nature of the claim of defendant." Hyatt v. Colkins, 174 Cal. 580, 581, 163 P. 1007. If the defendants had alleged in their answer the entry of the decree in the registration proceeding, then all affirmative matter by way of replication would have been deemed to have been pleaded by the plaintiff. 21 Cal. Jur. 165; Jose Realty Co. v. Pavlicevich, 164 Cal. 613, 616, 130 P. 15; Kipp v. Reed 183 Cal. 49, 50, 190 P. 363. In that event the plaintiff would have been permitted to prove that the decree is void as against her for want of notice to her and the Turners and that the decree was procured by extrinsic fraud. The defendants were not required to set up the nature of the title claimed by them or to plead the decree upon which they rely. 22 Cal. Jur. 157. It would be a strange rule, however, which would permit them to prove the decree as the foundation of their claim without pleading it and at the same time prevent the plaintiff from making the proof she would have had the right to make if the decree had been alleged in the answer as the foundation of the defendants' claims. The rule applicable to such a situation is the same as that applied in Wendling Lumber Co. v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 153 Cal. 411, 95 P. 1029. In that case the plaintiff alleged in general terms its ownership of the personal property involved in the suit. The defendant merely denied the allegations of the complaint. At the trial, the defendant introduced proof that the property had been sold to it. It was held that the plaintiff had the right to meet such claim of ownership "by proof that such sale was void because of fraud, without having made any allegation of fraud in the complaint." After citing cases to the effect that a plaintiff is entitled to introduce evidence of fraud, without alleging it, to overcome proof of affirmative matter alleged by the defendant in his answer, it is said: "The same is, of course, true as to the matters disclosed by evidence in behalf of a defendant properly given under denials contained in the answer." The plaintiff in this case had the right to show fraud and lack of jurisdiction under the implied replication which the law raises under the circumstances stated. The Follette Case therefore is controlling, and, on the authority of that case, it must be held that the plaintiff's assault upon the decree in question is a direct attack. The decree being void as to the plaintiff, her rights, of course, are not affected by it.

[4] In the registration proceeding, the court found facts showing that the petitioners had acquired title by adverse possession, but no such finding was made in this case, and the plaintiff herein is not bound by the findings in the proceeding of which neither she nor her grantors had notice.

[5] The court also found that on September 15, 1923, Young conveyed all his interest in the property "to Ella J. Robinson, who is not a party to this action and has had no notice thereof." Since Ella J. Robinson is not a party to the action, the court was without jurisdiction to determine whether, as against the plaintiff, her title is less vulnerable than that of her grantor. Even if that question could be decided in this action, there is no finding that she is an innocent purchaser for value as defined in section 34 of the act. Besides, under the provisions of section 34, subd. 5, and section 45, the title of a registered owner is subject to a right of action such as this, commenced within "one year following the first registration." It is not intended to express any opinion as to whether, in such a case, an action may be commenced after the expiration of one year following the first registration, as that question is not involved in this case.

The part of the judgment appealed from is reversed.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 15, 1929.

1. Executors and administrators 🔑509(3)—Real estate agent employed to sell estate property was "party" with right to move to vacate order allowing commissions (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 1559).

Real estate agent employed to effect sale of estate property by virtue of authority of Code Civ. Proc. § 1559, was a "party" within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 473, so as to authorize motion to vacate order allowing commissions because of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Party.]

2. Executors and administrators 🔑509(9)—That order vacating previous order allowing broker's commission for sale of estate property was made after confirmation of sale did not affect validity (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

The fact that order under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, vacating a previous order allowing broker's commission for sale of estate property, was made at a time subsequent to the time of confirmation of the sale did not affect validity of order.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Thomas H. Ince, deceased. From an order vacating a previous order allowing a broker's commission to Harley Moore for sale of estate property and fixing anew the amount of commission, Ellen Priscilla Ince, executrix, and another appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Fourl and Edward W. Tuttle, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Walter R. Leeds and Dockweiler, Dockweiler & Finch, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. This is an appeal from an order vacating a previous order allowing a broker's commission for sale of estate property, and fixing anew the amount of commission due to respondent. Such motion to vacate was made under section 473, Civil Code of Procedure, and was based upon the ground that the first order was made and taken against respondent through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect.

Appellants contend that the superior court had no jurisdiction to entertain respondent's motion to vacate or to vacate its previous order for the reasons:

1. Respondent is not a party within the meaning of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

2. The order confirming sale of the realty is not severable as to that part thereof allowing the commission to respondent.

[1] As to appellants' first contention that respondent is not a party within the meaning of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the case of Eastwood v. Stewart, 64 Cal. App. 614, 222 P. 369, is decisive, holding that a real estate agent employed under the authorization given under section 1559, Code of Civil Procedure, is a person interested in the estate.

[2] The superior court had general jurisdiction to vacate its own order and make another increasing the amount to be paid, upon a motion made by respondent under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, on the ground that the first order was taken against him through his inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect. Levy v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 590, 73 P. 417. The fact that the later order was made at a time subsequent to the time of confirmation of the sale could not, on any admissible theory, affect the validity of said order.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

CROWHURST v. GREEN et al. (Civ. 6913.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 20, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 19, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 18, 1929.

1. Abatement and revival 🔑7—Plea in abatement for pendency of another action is not available after judgment therein becomes final.

Plea in abatement on ground that another action of same character is pending is no longer available after judgment in prior suit becomes final.

2. Mandamus 🔑154(7)—Petition for mandate, requiring city councilmen to act on annexation petition, need not allege specific demand to perform acts sought.

Petition for mandate requiring city councilmen to act on annexation petition need not allege specific demand on them to perform acts sought, since they act under statute for benefit of general public, without any private or personal interest in subject-matter.

Proceeding in mandamus by Frank G. Crowhurst against Lisle C. Green and others. Writ granted.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for petitioner.

Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, for respondents.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

NOURSE, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus to require respondents to act upon an annexation petition with a view to determining whether a special election should be called to vote upon the proposition of annexation.

The respondents, by demurrer and answer, have presented but two excuses for their failure to act which require consideration.

[1] First. It is pleaded that another action of the same character is pending. In October, 1928, a similar petition was filed with these respondents, asking them to call a special election for the same purpose. Having refused to act upon the petition, a proceeding in mandamus was instituted in the First Division of the District Court of Appeal. This was decided adversely to petitioners on March 15, 1929, and the judgment therein is now final. Carter v. Green (Cal. App.) 276 P. 120. Assuming that the two actions are of the same character, so that the pendency of the first action would support a plea in abatement to the second, such plea is no longer available when the former action is no longer pending.

[2] Second. It is argued that the petition for mandate herein does not sufficiently allege demand made upon the respondents to perform the acts sought by this proceeding. Without engaging in a technical discussion of the pleadings, it is sufficient to say that no specific demand was necessary, because the respondents are here acting under a statute for the benefit of the public in general and without any private or personal interest in the subject-matter. In such cases the law itself stands in lieu of a specific demand. Wilson v. Board, etc., 138 Cal. 67, 69, 70 P. 1059; Thoits v. Byxbee, 34 Cal. App. 226, 236, 167 P. 166; Jensen v. McCullough (Cal. App.) 271 P. 568, 571.

Let a writ issue as prayed.

ARMSTRONG CO. v. SHELL CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 6214.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 15, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 31, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 11, 1929.

1. Patents 🔑218(3)—Contract to pay percentage of proceeds of gasoline extracted at plant held not to require payment of royalties after ceasing operation.

Under a patent license agreement requiring licensee to pay royalty of 5 per cent. of net proceeds of gasoline produced at extraction plant for term of 10 years, provided that payment of royalties should cease on payment in aggregate of $100,000, licensee ceasing operation of such plant was under no further obligation to pay royalties, notwithstanding only fraction of $100,000 had been paid.

2. Patents 🔑218(4)—Assignee of licensee, by notice refusing to pay further royalties, held not estopped from denying obligation to pay further royalties.

Notice to owner of patent by assignee of licensee, refusing to make further payment of royalties under license, held not tantamount to admission of obligation to pay such royalties, and not to estop assignee from relying on defense that contract did not impose obligation to pay further royalties.

Houser, Acting P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Erwin T. Owen, Judge.

Action by the Armstrong Company, a California corporation, against the Shell Company of California. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bauer, Wright & Macdonald, Alexander Macdonald, Lyon & Lyon, and Frederick S. Lyon, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McCutchen, Olney, Mannon & Greene, of San Francisco, for respondent.

McLUCAS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff entered into a contract with Western Union Oil Company on September 19, 1919, wherein plaintiff, as owner of a certain patented process known as the Armstrong process, for the extraction and manufacture of high-grade gasoline from natural and casing-head gas, licensed Western Union Oil Company to use said Armstrong process on certain premises leased by Western Union Oil Company in a plant or plants to be constructed and equipped on said leased premises, and to treat therein natural gas or casing-head gas produced from the lands covered by said lease, or from lands adjoining thereto. Western Union Oil Company agreed to pay the entire cost of all labor and materials required in the construction and equipment of said plant, which was to be constructed under the supervision of the plaintiff in accordance with plans and specifications theretofore approved by Western Union Oil Company. The contract further provided as follows:

"The party of the second part further agrees to pay to the party of the first part, at the offices of said first party in the city of Los Angeles, California, on the 10th day of each and every month from and after the commencement of the production of gasoline at said plant, and thereafter during the life of this agreement, for the right to use said Armstrong process, a royalty of five per cent. (5%) of the net amount of money received by the party of the second part during the preceding month from the sale of gasoline produced at said plant, which net amount shall be ascertained after deducting the cost of production, including the amount of any royalties due to the lessors of said Western Union lease. It is mutually understood and agreed that the term for which said royalties shall be paid shall be ten (10) years from and after the date of the actual commencement of the production of gasoline at said plant: Provided, however, that should the aggregate amount of royalties paid to the party of the first part prior to the expiration of said term equal the sum of one hundred thousand ($100,000) dollars, then the obligation to pay royalties shall cease and terminate; and provided, further, that the party of the second part may at any time terminate its obligation to pay any further royalties by giving written notice to the party of the first part of its intention so to do and by paying to said party of the first part the difference between the aggregate amount of royalties already paid and the sum of one hundred thousand ($100,000) dollars. It being understood and agreed that when royalties as herein provided shall have been paid for ten (10) years from and after the date of the actual commencement of the production of gasoline at said plant, or if prior to the expiration of said ten (10) years, the party of the second part shall have paid to the party of the first part the sum of one hundred thousand ($100,000) dollars, as herein provided, it shall have the right to continue to use said Armstrong process in the manner herein provided, without the payment of any further royalties or sums whatsoever."

Plaintiff further guaranteed that it had the sole and exclusive right to license for use in the state of California the said Armstrong process, and plaintiff agreed to defend at its own cost and expense any suit, claim, or demand of any person based on the use of said process, and to indemnify Western Union Oil Company for any judgment rendered against it on account thereof. The contract further provided:

"It is further mutually understood and agreed that the license hereby granted to the party of the second part to use said Armstrong process is unlimited as to time, but that the same confers no rights upon said second party to authorize or license other persons, firms or corporations to use the same without the written permission of the party of the first part. This agreement shall extend to and be binding upon the successors, assigns, heirs, and representatives of the parties hereto during the full time this agreement may remain in force."

The gasoline plant was completed and operated by Western Union Oil Company until on or about January 1, 1922, when defendant succeeded to all the right, title, and interest of Western Union Oil Company under said agreement, and defendant took over said plant and operated the same up to about April 19, 1923. On said day defendant notified plaintiff in writing that it renounced and terminated said agreement and repudiated the license purported to be given thereby, in words as follows:

"As you know, we have succeeded to all right, title, or interest of Western Union Oil Company under said agreement. Please be advised that we hereby renounce and terminate said agreement; that we hereby repudiate the license purported to be given by said agreement to said Western Union Oil Company; that we hereby abandon any position as licensee under said agreement; that we hereby renounce any protection of said license; that we hereby refuse to make any further payments as royalty or otherwise for said license or under said agreement. We do this for the reason that the letters patent upon which you relied for your authority to grant said license are invalid and void. Please be further advised that we have completed and entirely abandoned the operation of the gasoline extraction plant erected pursuant to said agreement on the lands covered by the lease referred to in the said agreement; that from the date hereof we will not operate said plant, or any gasoline extraction plant, on the lands covered by the said lease pursuant to or in accordance with the terms of said agreement; that we declare that we are freed and discharged from any liability or obligation of making further payments as royalty or otherwise for said license or under said agreement."

The plant has not been operated since April 19, 1923. It was stipulated that the total payments made to plaintiff by defendant and defendant's assignor pursuant to said contract amounted to $20.840.88. Action was brought by plaintiff to recover the sum of $80,671.49, together with interest thereon from April 19, 1923, on an alleged difference between the sum of $100.000 mentioned in the contract and the amount of money paid to plaintiff as royalty under said contract. Judgment was rendered for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that, by refusing to pay further royalties to the plaintiff, defendant became liable under the contract to pay plaintiff the difference between the aggregate of sums already paid and $100,000, and that the trial court erred in finding to the contrary. It is argued that the cause of action arose out of a contract between the parties; that the contract imposed a direct and unqualified obligation to pay royalties for ten years and then provides an exclusive method by which the licensee may terminate its obligation in this behalf. Analyzing the contract, we find that the instrument contains no mention of the aggregate amount of royalties payable to plaintiff, except in paragraph 2. In the first sentence of this paragraph Western Union Oil Company is required to pay to plaintiff on the 10th day of each month after the commencement of production of gasoline, and "thereafter during the life of this agreement, for the right to use said Armstrong process, a royalty of 5 per cent. of the net amount of money received by the party of the second part during the preceding month from the sale of gasoline produced at said plant." The only obligation to pay royalties imposed upon the licensee in the foregoing sentence is to pay royalties "from the sale of gasoline produced at said plant" by the use of said Armstrong process. If no gasoline were produced by the use of said process, then no royalties were payable. The obligation to pay royalties has been fully performed by the payment of royalties during all of the time when the process was used and the plant remained in operation. While it may be inferred from the terms of the contract that it undoubtedly was the intention of the parties that Western Union Oil Company should produce gasoline by the use of said process in a plant to be erected on its lands, yet we have searched the contract in vain for any direct provision requiring Western Union Oil Company to produce any gasoline whatsoever by the use of said process. The contract merely requires Western Union Oil Company, under the supervision of the plaintiff, to erect and equip at its own cost and expense a gasoline extraction plant, and further licenses Western Union Oil Company "to use said Armstrong process in a plant or plants to be constructed and equipped on said Western Union lease, and to treat therein any natural gas or casing-head gas it may now or hereafter own or become entitled to," produced from certain lands.

Under the contract the licensee had the right, but was not under the obligation, of paying a total amount of $100,000 at any time during the life of the contract. Had defendant done so, there would have been no further obligation to pay royalties, even though it continued to use the process. Appellant assumes that the contract imposes an obligation on the licensee to pay royalties for ten years, and then points out that the contract provides the method by which the licensee may terminate its obligation in this behalf, namely, either by the payment of an aggregate amount of royalties in the sum of $100,000 prior to the expiration of said ten-year term, or during said term, by the licensee giving written notice of its intention to terminate its obligation to pay further royalties and paying to the licensor the difference between the aggregate amount of royalties already paid and the sum of $100,000. But, as we have already seen, there is no obligation to pay further royalties to be found in the contract. Appellant is mistaken in its premise. The premise being false, the conclusion must be false. There being no such obligation, it follows that there is none to be terminated, and there is no difference to be paid by the defendant.

[2] Appellant argues that, since defendant gave notice to plaintiff refusing "to make any further payment as royalty or otherwise for said license or under said agreement," and declaring that it is "freed and discharged from any liability or obligation to make further payments as royalty or otherwise," it is tantamount to an admission that if it had not been for the alleged invalidity of the patent it would not have been freed and discharged from such liability. We do not find in this notice any admission of an obligation to pay further royalties; nor do we find that the fact that defendant stated that it was refusing "further payments as royalty or otherwise, * * * for the reason that the letters patent upon which you relied for your authority to grant such license are invalid and void," prevented the defendant from availing itself of the contract and assignment defenses after litigation had begun. The doctrine that when a party gives a reason for his conduct and decision touching anything involved in a controversy he cannot, after litigation has begun, change his ground and put his conduct upon another and different consideration, is inapplicable in the instant case.

This doctrine is not applicable for two reasons: In the notice of renunciation the defendant refused payment on two grounds; first, the invalidity of the patent, and, second, the abandonment of the operation of the plant or any gasoline extraction plant on account of which the defendant declared that "we are freed and discharged from any liability or obligation to make further payments as royalty or otherwise for said license or under said agreement." In our opinion, the second of these grounds permits the defendant to rely on a defense that the contract imposed no obligation to pay further royalties. It follows that if the contract imposes no obligation to pay further royalties, then defendant is not estopped to rely on a defense that the defendant never assumed any liability under said contract. But even though the contract did impose a liability to pay further royalties, we do not think the defendant is estopped by the renunciation to set up the defense that defendant never assumed any liability under said contract.

If the contract imposes no obligation to pay further royalties, then a discussion of the further defenses becomes superfluous. But as plaintiff insists that the contract does impose such obligation to pay further royalties, for the purpose of a complete consideration of the case we proceed to a discussion of the further defenses. Plaintiff contends that, defendant having taken over operations under the contract, and having held itself out to plaintiff as assuming the liabilities thereunder, it is liable to plaintiff and that the trial court erred in finding to the contrary. In reply thereto, defendant states that, if the contract be construed as creating any obligation, defendant is not liable because it never assumed any of the obligations of the contract. The contract is by its terms made binding upon the assigns of the licensee. The mere assignment by the purchaser of its rights under an executory contract does not cast upon the assignee any of the personal liabilities imposed by the contract upon the assignor, even though the contract provides that its stipulations are to apply and bind the assigns of the respective parties, unless the assignee expressly obligates himself to perform the covenants binding upon the assignor or recognizes his personal obligation to the vendor or claims or accepts the benefits of a full performance of the contract. 25 Cal. Jur. 701; Lisenby v. Newton, 120 Cal. 571, 52 P. 813, 65 Am. St. Rep. 203; Tarpey v. Curran, 67 Cal. App. 575, 587, 228 P. 62; Barberich v. Pooshichian, 59 Cal. App. 507, 211 P. 236; Robinson v. Rispin, 33 Cal. App. 536, 165 P. 979; Jones v. Allert, 161 Cal. 234, 118 P. 794; Drips v. Moore, 179 Cal. 249, 176 P. 159; Wilson v. Beazley, 186 Cal. 437, 199 P. 772.

In the instant case the assignee did not expressly obligate itself to perform the covenants binding upon the assignor. In order that an assignee may be held liable under a contract, there must be an express assumption. The indenture of January 2, 1922, between Western Union Oil Company and defendant, attached to the amendment to the answer as Exhibit A, contains an agreement of assumption reading as follows: "The grantee hereby assumes, from and after the day of the delivery of this indenture, and hereby covenants and agrees to and with the grantor and Union Company, and each of them, promptly to pay and perform, when and as payment and performance may be due, subject as hereinafter provided, the following indebtedness, liabilities and obligations of the grantor, namely: (a) All the covenants, agreements and obligations, contingent or otherwise, existing under or pursuant to any of the leases or other instruments in writing respecting oil and gas properties, included in the property and assets hereby assigned, transferred and conveyed; provided that this assumption shall not become effective as to the covenants, agreements and obligations under or pursuant to any particular lease or other instrument in writing until the delivery and acceptance, pursuant to the second sentence of article III of this indenture, of an instrument specifically assigning the same. * * *"

In article III of said indenture the grantor agrees to execute not later than July 1, 1922, and deliver to the grantee an instrument in form satisfactory to counsel for the grantee assigning all contracts respecting oil and gas properties. No such instrument has been introduced into the record. Defendant has in the amended answer specifically denied assuming any liability under said contract, and it would appear that such liability has never been consummated, since the terms of the proviso as hereinbefore stated are not shown to have been complied with. Furthermore, if this assumption of the agreement had become effective by the delivery of the specific agreement of assignment of the contract in suit, plaintiff could not rely upon such admission for the reason that the indenture between Western Union Oil Company and defendant was expressly not for the benefit of plaintiff. It is provided in said indenture as follows: "Nothing in this indenture, express or implied, is intended or shall be construed to confer upon, or give to, any person, firm or corporation other than the parties hereto, any right, remedy or claim, under or by reason of this indenture, or of any term, covenant or condition thereof; and all of the terms, covenants, conditions, promises and agreements in this indenture contained shall be for the sole and exclusive benefit of the parties hereto and their successors and assigns."

The rule is well established that only an express beneficiary can recover on a contract between other parties. Civ. Code, § 1559; Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 15 P. 100; Buckley v. Gray, 110 Cal. 339, 42 P. 900, 31 L. R. A. 862, 52 Am. St. Rep. 88; Wilson v. Shea, 29 Cal. App. 788, 157 P. 543; Ericksen v. Rhee, 181 Cal. 562, 185 P. 847. Nor has the defendant recognized a personal obligation to the vendor to pay further royalties. The only obligation recognized by the defendant was the obligation to pay accruing royalties so long as the process was used by the defendant, which obligation has been fully met. Nor has defendant claimed or accepted the benefits of a full performance of the contract; in fact, the defendant by its notice of renunciation has waived full performance and released plaintiff therefrom. Plaintiff contends that defendant held itself out to plaintiff as assuming the liabilities under the contract in question by taking over operations and making payments of accruing royalties in accordance with the terms of the agreement. We are not able to perceive in what manner defendant by such conduct held itself out to plaintiff as assuming the liability to pay anything further than royalties accruing for the use of the process. We do not believe the defendant by such conduct assumed a liability to pay further royalties for a period of ten years, or until $100,000 in royalties should have been paid, especially since its assignor was not so bound by the terms of the original contract.

In support of its contention plaintiff relies upon section 1589 of the Civil Code, which provides, "A voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting," and upon section 3521 of the Civil Code, which provides that "he who takes the benefit must bear the burden." In this case the defendant was not a party to the original transaction. The rule is well settled that section 1589 of the Civil Code applies only to a person who was a party to the original transaction. Stone v. Owens, 105 Cal. 292, 38 P. 726; Canale v. Copello, 137 Cal. 22, 69 P. 698; Beazley v. Embree, 41 Cal. App. 706, 183 P. 298; Bryant v. Smith, 57 Cal. App. 214, 206 P. 1025; Tarpey v. Curran, 67 Cal. App. 575, 228 P. 62. In Stone v. Owens, supra, the court said, page 296 of 105 Cal. (38 P. 727): "But we think this section applies only to 'a transaction' to which the person accepting the benefit is, or purports to be, or is claimed to be, a party, but who would not have been bound by the transaction if he had not accepted the benefit thereof."

Appellant next contends that the trial court erred in overruling plaintiff's motion to strike out all testimony, exhibits, and proofs offered for the purpose of showing that plaintiff's patent was invalid. It is a well-recognized rule of law that a licensee under a patent right cannot dispute the validity of his licensor's patent. But an apparent exception to the rule of estoppel exists where the licensee repudiates the license. In Robinson on Patents, § 820, vol. 2, it is said: "A licensee, having accepted a license, and while exercising under its protection the rights therein conferred, is estopped from denying the validity of the patent in any suit in which such exercise of his license privileges is the basis of the controversy. In the absence of express provisions in the license to the contrary, however, he may repudiate the license, cease to claim its protection, and as to his future exercise of the privileges described therein defend himself upon the ground that the patent is invalid."

In Universal Rim Co. v. Scott (D. C.) 21 F.(2d) 346, the court said: "A licensee under a patent, who has manufactured an article pursuant to a license agreement and has regularly paid royalties during a number of years, is thereafter estopped to set up as a defense to a demand for payment of royalties that the article as made was not within the claims of the patents. Sproull v. Pratt & Whitney (C. C.) 97 F. 807; Andrews v. Landers (C. C.) 72 F. 666. A licensee is estopped to show invalidity of licensed patents as a defense to an action for royalties only so long as the relation of licensor and licensee continues and the licensee uses and enjoys the benefit and protection of the patents covered by the agreement. A licensee, if evicted from the use of the patents by a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction declaring the patents invalid, may, after giving notice to the licensor, defend against the payment of royalties subsequently accruing. A licensee, if the patents are in fact invalid, may, without waiting to be evicted, renounce and abandon the license, and after giving notice thereof to the licensor, may defend against an action to enforce the license or to recover royalties subsequently accruing, with the same freedom as may a stranger to the patent, and the licensor is remitted to his infringement suit. These principles of law, notwithstanding some respectable dicta to the contrary, will be found fully supported and established by the following authorities: Holmes v. McGill (2 C. C. A.) 108 F. 238, 244; Mudgett v. Thomas (C. C.) 55 F. 645, 647; White v. Lee (C. C.) 14 F. 789; Brown v. Lapham (C. C.) 27 F. 77; Macon Knitting Co. v. Leicester, 65 N. J. Eq. 138, 55 A. 401; Harlow v. Putnam, 124 Mass. 553; Ross v. Dowden, 147 Iowa, 180, 123 N. W. 182; Edison Elec. Co. v. Thackara Mfg. Co., 167 Pa. 530, 31 A. 856; Skinner v. Wood Mowing Mach. Co., 140 N. Y. 217, 35 N. E. 491, 37 Am. St. Rep. 540; K.-W. Ignition Co. v. Unit Coil Co., 93 Ohio St. 128, 137, 112 N. E. 199.

"The contention is made, and some support therefor may be found in the books, that a licensee cannot, in the absence of a provision permitting the license to be terminated, contest the validity of patents covered by the agreement, even after renunciation and notice. This contention originates in the common-law doctrine of estoppel by covenant. It requires to support it, first, a special admission of fact, namely, that the patent is valid, or, that the licensor is the first and true inventor of the invention covered by the patent; and, second, a deed or covenant under seal which, at common law, barred a party thereto from disputing the truth of an admitted fact. It is doubtful if this rule ever had any application in equity, which, from early days, gave relief against deeds or agreements under seal in certain situations; but, be that as it may, the true rule, in my opinion, now is that the licensee, whenever he ascertains that the patents covered by the license agreement are invalid, may refuse to be further bound thereby, and, upon repudiation and notice, may thereafter defend against an action for royalties or an infringement suit as freely as may a stranger. This is particularly true in a case like the present, where the license agreement contains no recital or clause admitting the validity of the patents and no stipulation not to dispute or contest the validity thereof. If the patents are in fact invalid, then there is no continuing consideration for the agreement, and, as was said by Mr. Justice Brown in Pope Mfg. Co. v. Gormully, 144 U. S. 234, 12 S. Ct. 636, 36 L. Ed. 414: 'It is as important to the public that competition should not be repressed by worthless patents, as that the patentee of a really valuable invention should be protected in his monopoly.' So long, however, as the invalidity of a patent has not been judicially declared and the licensee continues to operate thereunder without repudiation or notice such as will place him in the attitude of an infringer, there is no such want or complete failure of consideration as will permit the licensee to refuse to pay royalties which have been previously earned."

It should be noted that the contract in suit does not contain any recital or clause admitting the validity of the patent, nor any stipulation not to contest the validity thereof, but, on the contrary, contains a guaranty of the validity by the plaintiff. That a licensee who has renounced the license may defend on the ground of invalidity of the patent is recognized in the following cases: Brown v. Lapham (C. C.) 27 F. 77; Mudgett v. Thomas (C. C.) 55 F. 645, 647; Martin v. New Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co. (D. C.) 255 F. 93, 94; Schutte & Koerting Co. v. Wheeler Condenser & E. Co. (D. C.) 295 F. 158, 162. In Martin v. New Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co., supra, the court said: "A licensee under a license agreement, such as that upon which this suit is based, when sued for royalties payable under the agreement, where the patent which is the subject-matter of the license, is apparently valid and in force (where it has not been declared invalid by a court of competent jurisdiction or revoked by the Patent Office before the royalties have accrued), may not set up the supposed invalidity of the patent and the consequent failure of consideration of the agreement, unless, prior to the period for which the royalties are sought to be recovered, he has given to the licensor a distinct, definite, and unequivocal notice to the effect that he no longer recognizes the binding force of the agreement, and that he will thereafter manufacture or use the article covered by the patent under a claim of right, founded upon the alleged invalidity of the patent, and in hostility to and defiance of the authority of the patent and the license, so that the licensor can thereafter proceed against him for an infringement of the patent, if he choose so to do. Lawes v. Purser, 6 Ellis & Blackburn, 930; Martin v. New Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co., Ltd., 182 App. Div. 719, 170 N. Y. S. 234 (App. Div., 1st Dept. N. Y. Sup. Ct.); Skinner v. Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co., 140 N. Y. 217, 35 N. E. 491, 37 Am. St. Rep. 540; Hyatt v. Dale Tile Mfg. Co., 106 N. Y. 651, 12 N. E. 705 (quoted in full in 125 U. S. at 49, 8 S. Ct. 756, 31 L. Ed. 683); Marston v. Swett, 82 N. Y. 526; Skidmore v. Fahys Watch-Case Co., 28 App. Div. 94, 50 N. Y. S. 1016 (App. Div. N. Y. Sup. Ct., 1st Dept.); White v. Lee (C. C. Mass.) 3 F. 222; Brown v. Lapham (C. C. S. D., N. Y.) 27 F. 79; Mudgett v. Thomas (C. C. S. D., Ohio) 55 F. 645, 648; Holmes, etc., v. McGill, 108 F. 238, 244, 47 C. C. A. 296 (C. C. A. 2d Cir.); Macon Knitting Co. v. Leicester Mills Co., 65 N. J. Eq. 139, 152, 55 A. 401."

We see no merit in plaintiff's contention that defendant cannot avail itself of the renunciation exception to the general rule of estoppel because defendant has not notified plaintiff that it would manufacture in hostility to or in defiance of the authority of the patent and license so that the licensor could thereafter proceed against it for infringement of the patent. It is true that many cases apply the renunciation exception in favor of the licensee who abandons the license and thereafter infringes the patent. Nevertheless, it is inconceivable that defendant would be liable under the contract despite the alleged invalidity of the patent solely because it discontinued the use of the process, whereas if it had continued the use of such process in defiance of the patent it could now successfully defend itself against any liability by showing the invalidity of such patent. The authorities do not permit the invalidity of a patent to be asserted as a defense to any liability which accrued before renunciation. The alleged obligation in the present case did not accrue before the renunciation notice was given on April 19, 1923, and defendant thereby brings itself within the exception to the rule of estoppel. In United States v. Harvey Steel Co., 196 U. S. 310, 25 S. Ct. 240, 49 L. Ed. 492, cited by appellant, the liability accrued before renunciation, and recovery was had for accrued, but not for unaccrued, royalties.

Appellant urges that a mere licensee cannot raise the defense of invalidity, and cites authorities holding that, where the grant of an exclusive right is made, if the exclusive right fails, the consideration fails, but that where a mere license is given there is no failure of consideration until the licensee is actually prevented from using the invention. An apparent conflict of authority exists for the reason that many of the cases do not discuss the question of renunciation. In the following cases the right of a mere licensee to rely upon the defense of invalidity of the patent was recognized: Universal Rim Co. v. Scott (D. C.) 21 F.(2d) 346 (license expressly described in the court's opinion as "nonexclusive"); White v. Lee (C. C.) 3 F. 222; Brown v. Lapham (C. C.) 27 F. 77; Crossley v. Dixon, 10 H. L. C. 293; 11 Eng. Rep. 1039; Lawes v. Purser, 6 El. & Bl. 930; 119 Eng. Rep. 1110; Ross v. Dowden Mfg. Co., 147 Iowa, 180, 123 N. W. 182; K.-W. Ignition Co. v. Unit Coil Co., 93 Ohio St. 128, 112 N. E. 199. Appellant cites authority to the effect that a licensee cannot assert invalidity of a patent unless he has been evicted. Some of the cases cited by appellant state that the licensee, in order to avoid the payment of royalties, must prove an eviction, or what is equivalent thereto, but these cases do not discuss the effect of a renunciation notice upon the payment of further royalties. In the following cases, where renunciation was held an exception to the general rule, there was neither judicial declaration of invalidity nor eviction proved: Universal Rim Co. v. Scott (D. C.) 21 F.(2d) 346; Brown v. Lapham (C. C.) 27 F. 77; Mudgett v. Thomas (C. C.) 55 F. 645; Martin v. New Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co. (D. C.) 255 F. 93; Harlow v. Putnam, 124 Mass. 553; K.-W. Ignition Co. v. Unit Coil Co., 93 Ohio St. 128, 112 N. E. 199; Macon Knitting Co. v. Leicester Mills Co., 65 N. J. Eq. 138, 55 A. 401.

Appellant further claims that defendant cannot "escape its covenanted liability to pay the stipulated royalties for the use it has had of the plant and process as well as for the engineering services of plaintiff in designing and superintending the erection and construction of the plant, the production of the plans and specifications for such plant, and the performed covenant of plaintiff to protect the licensee from eviction from the use of the plant and process, or liability to any other patent owner on account of such use." In reply thereto it should be noted that under the contract Western Union Oil Company furnished the land on which the plant was built, did the necessary grading and excavating work, furnished all materials and labor, paid all the costs of labor and materials, paid the compensation of the engineer designated by plaintiff to superintend construction and became the owner of the completed plant. All that plaintiff did was to designate the engineer and furnish plans and specifications, matters which were purely and solely incidental and prerequisite to the license of the patent. If Western Union Oil Company did not receive any valid patented process, it does not matter how many plans and specifications for worthless and invalid patents it received or how many plants embodying worthless and invalid patents were designed or superintended by plaintiff. If it did not get such a valid patented process, it simply did not receive the only substantial thing for which it bargained, and there was a total failure of the only material consideration for its agreements. Furthermore, it is to be remembered that defendant never covenanted with plaintiff and never assumed the liabilities under the contract in suit. Whether there is any liability to pay further royalties by reason of the use the defendant had of the plant and process and of the performed covenant of plaintiff to protect the licensee from eviction from the use of the plant and process, or from liability to another patent owner on account of such use, is to be determined from the validity of the patent itself.

Finally, appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to show that plaintiff's patent was invalid. No good purpose would be served by reviewing the evidence submitted on the question of the validity of the patent. Suffice it to say that, in our opinion, the evidence submitted is sufficient to support the findings of the trial court.

For the reasons stated the judgment is affirmed.

YORK, J. I concur in the conclusion reached by reason of the first part of said opinion wherein it states that there was no further liability under the terms of the written contract.

HOUSER, Acting P. J. I dissent from the judgment.

Willedd Andrews, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. [1] This appeal is from a judgment made pursuant to an order of nonsuit in an action in which plaintiffs sought to have it judicially declared that by virtue of a subsisting agreement between the parties certain property owned by defendants was held by them subject to restrictions thereon that it should not be "leased or rented to any person or persons other than of the white or Caucasian race, * * * or be used or occupied, or permitted to be used or occupied, by any person other than of the white or Caucasian race." The only allegation contained in the complaint which in any way dealt with the violation of the agreement between the parties was: "That plaintiffs are informed and believe and therefore allege that the defendants are about to convey said property to Lucy Frost, a single woman, and Hannah F. Mayo, a widow, and that the said Lucy Frost and Hannah F. Mayo have knowledge of the existence of the covenant and know its terms."

By the answer to the complaint it was admitted that the grantees in the deed of conveyance referred to in the complaint were negroes. Without consideration of possible infirmities of the alleged agreement between the parties, it will be noted that by the allegations of the complaint a sale of the property was contemplated by defendants, rather than a lease or a rental to, or a use or an occupation of the property by, persons "other than of the white or Caucasian race." It is obvious that a sale of the property in question would not constitute a violation of the terms of the alleged agreement. The distinction between the two situations is considered in the case of Los Angeles Inv. Co. v. Gary, 181 Cal. 681, 186 P. 596, 9 A. L. R. 115, and authorities there cited.

[2] All intendments favor the judgment by the lower court; and it is apparent that, without taking into consideration objections which might be suggested other than the defect to which attention has been directed, no error was committed by such court in ordering a nonsuit of plaintiffs' case.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Mae Glass Marshall against the American Meter Company, a corporation, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Derby, Sharp, Quinby & Tweedt, Joseph C. Sharp, and Lloyd M. Tweedt, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to recover damages for injuries sustained in an automobile collision. The defendants answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendants have appealed.

The accident happened at about 10 o'clock at night on the 21st of June, 1926, in the intersection of Van Ness avenue and Eddy street, in the city of San Francisco. Neither machine saw the other machine until both were inside of the intersection. The plaintiff introduced evidence to the effect that her car was traveling on its side of the street at a speed of 7 or 8 miles an hour and in all respects was exercising due care. She also introduced evidence to the effect that the defendants' car was traveling in excess of 15 miles per hour, to wit, 25 miles or more. The defendants introduced evidence that their car entered the intersection at not more than 15 miles per hour and then slowed down to a lower speed; that they were traveling on their side of the street and in all respects exercising due care. They also introduced evidence that the plaintiff's automobile came down Eddy street at a speed of 25 or 30 miles an hour and having entered Van Ness avenue attempted to swing in front of the defendants' car and proceed north on Van Ness avenue. On all of these matters the evidence was directly conflicting.

[1, 2] The defendants quote some of the testimony and then assert that the plaintiff's driver was guilty of contributory negligence and that such contributory negligence is imputable to the plaintiff. That contention assumes that her driver was guilty of contributory negligence. The briefs do not proceed to show what act or acts constituted contributory negligence. As we have shown above, there was evidence of contributory negligence and there was evidence contradicting it. Under fundamental rules this court may not interfere under such circumstances. However, in support of the judgment, we must assume that the jury found that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

[3] Acting on the request of the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury as follows: "In case you find that only certain of the defendants are guilty of negligence which proximately caused any injuries to plaintiff, you are to find against such negligent defendant only." The defendants assert that the instruction assumed that at least one of the defendants was negligent and that the instruction omitted any mention of contributory negligence. It was not addressed to the subject of contributory negligence. It did not assume anything whatever. The defendants cite and rely on Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066. In that case the instruction under consideration was one of those instructions which on its face purports to be inclusive and exclusive and to direct the verdict. The case is not applicable to the facts before us.

[4] Acting upon the request of the plaintiff, the court instructed the jury as follows: "In time of imminent danger a person is not necessarily negligent because he fails to take every precaution or adopt every means of safety that a careful calculation subsequently shows he might have taken or adopted." The defendants assert that the instruction fails to consider the conduct of the plaintiff before the imminent danger arose. That is true; but it neither includes such conduct nor excludes such conduct. That was considered in other instructions specially addressed thereto. The instructions under consideration in Vedder v. Bireley (Cal. App.) 267 P. 724, were not so drawn. They expressly excluded and ignored plaintiff's prior conduct.

[5] Defendants requested and the trial court refused to give 17 instructions. The defendants have printed them en bloc. Thereupon they assert that they were entitled to have the jury instructed upon their theory of the case. That is quite true, and in fairness the defendants might have continued and might have said that the trial court gave to the jury 49 instructions in which it instructed with meticulous care on every element of the theory of each party to the litigation. They might have added that every instruction which was refused was fully covered by an instruction which was given and which was clear, sound, and complete in every respect.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

Application by Alice Brahm for a stay of execution after judgment on plea of guilty of arson. Granted.

See, also, 277 P. 896.

Arthur Brigham Rose, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an application for stay of execution of judgment by which the defendant in the action in the lower court was sentenced to the term of imprisonment prescribed by law for the commission by her of the crime of arson. It appears that the judgment was rendered several weeks after a plea of guilty had been interposed by defendant, and followed a denial by the court of defendant's application for probation.

After sentence had been pronounced, defendant presented a motion by which she asked leave to withdraw her said plea of guilty and substitute in lieu thereof a plea of not guilty. At the same time defendant moved the court to vacate the judgment which theretofore had been rendered in the action. The trial court denied each of such motions, and an appeal was taken from such order.

[1] Although the intimation contained in the language found in section 1243 of the Penal Code is to the effect that on appeal from a judgment of conviction on a charge where sentence less than death has been imposed, "in the sole discretion of the trial court" execution of the sentence may be stayed, the point has been directly ruled that, independent of statutory provision, the power of this court is inherent and plenary in all cases to issue writs or orders by which execution of the judgment will be stayed pending the determination of an appeal, whether such appeal be from the judgment itself, or from some other order made after judgment but which would be directly affected by the execution of the judgment (In re Albori [Cal. App.] 272 P. 321, and cases there cited; In re Mayen, 49 Cal. App. 531, 193 P. 813); and such has been the long-established practice of the Supreme Court of this state (People v. Durrant, 119 Cal. 54, 50 P. 1070; People v. Ross, 135 Cal. 59, 67 P. 13; People v. McNulty, 95 Cal. 594, 30 P. 963. See, also, 8 Cal. Jur. 548 et seq., and cases cited).

[2] As has been repeatedly pointed out by judicial decision, such a writ or order should be granted where the issues presented by the appeal constitute "debatable questions," and should be refused only where it unmistakably appears that the appeal is "clearly frivolous." In re Adams, 81 Cal. 163, 22 P. 547; In re Albori (Cal. App.) 272 P. 321.

[3, 4] In the instant case, on consideration of the appeal from the order to which reference has been had, it is manifest that the appeal is not "frivolous"; but, to the contrary, that "debatable questions" are presented for determination by this court. It follows that an order staying execution of the judgment should be and it is granted. However, in so doing, this court again directs attention to the fact that in a proper case the duty of issuing such orders or certificates of probable cause rests primarily with the trial court, and that the effect of a failure or a refusal by the trial court to perform its duty in that regard but adds a burden to this court in a matter in which properly it should not be called upon to act. Application by Alice Brahm to withdraw plea and to vacate judgment following plea of guilty of arson. From orders denying the motions, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 277 P. 895.

Arthur Brigham Rose, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant pleaded guilty to a charge of arson and, at her request, was granted leave to make application for probation. After several continuances had been had of the hearing, on the matter of probation for defendant, an order was finally made by which probation was denied, and judgment was pronounced against her. Thereafter defendant moved the trial court for leave to withdraw her plea of guilty to the charge and substitute therefor a plea of not guilty thereto. At the same time, and as a part of the same motion, defendant moved the court to vacate the judgment in the action. From an order denying each of such motions, this appeal is prosecuted.

[1, 2] The first point advanced by appellant is that, because she "pleaded guilty under duress, misapprehension, fear, intimidation," she should have been permitted thereafter to withdraw such plea. In connection therewith no pertinent facts, other than her own statement to the effect that she was advised by an "investigating officer" that, if she would plead guilty, probation would be granted to her, were submitted to the trial court—which statement was denied by such officer. The determination of the existence of either or any of the alleged causes which induced defendant to plead guilty to the charge preferred against her rested with the trial court; and, in the absence of an abuse of discretion in the matter, the conclusion reached by such court cannot be disturbed by this tribunal. People v. Manriquez, 188 Cal. 602, 605, 206 P. 63, 20 A. L. R. 144; People v. Junod, 85 Cal. App. 194, 259 P. 101. But even assuming the truth of appellant's said statement, it is clear that no abuse of discretion was committed by the trial court in denying the several motions or either of them. As is said in the case of People v. Manriquez, 188 Cal. 602, 605, 206 P. 63, 64 (20 A. L. R. 144): "Another ground upon which the appellant based his motion for vacation of the judgment was that his plea of guilty was entered without due deliberation, and with the hope and expectation that the punishment to which he might be exposed would be mitigated. Even if such were the case, the fact that a defendant, knowing his rights and the consequences of his act, hoped or believed, or was led by his counsel, or others, to hope or believe that he would receive a milder punishment by pleading guilty than that which would fall to his lot after trial and conviction by a jury, presents no ground for the exercise of the discretion necessary to permit a plea of guilty to be withdrawn. (People v. Dabner, 153 Cal. 398, 403, 95 P. 880; People v. Miller, 114 Cal. 10, 16, 45 P. 986; People v. Lennox, 67 Cal. 113, 115, 7 P. 260.)"

[3] Appellant also contends that the question of whether the motions in the premises should be granted should have been submitted to a jury for its determination. Certain authorities have been cited in support of the point; but, so far as this court can determine, none of them is applicable to the question here presented. We know of no authority which would warrant procedure such as is suggested by appellant.

[4] Appellant also complains that at the time judgment was pronounced against her she was not arraigned therefor as provided by section 1200 of the Penal Code. The record herein discloses the fact that, on the day preceding the date on which defendant was sentenced, at which time the question of whether probation should be granted to defendant, and in case it should be denied, the matter of pronouncing judgment, were before the court for its determination, defendant was arraigned for judgment in substantial compliance with the requirements of section 1200 of the Penal Code. After considerable discussion of the various matters presented to the court for its consideration at that time, with the acquiescence of defendant and her attorney, the conclusion with reference thereto was continued until the day following, at which time, without again arraigning defendant, judgment was pronounced. It is clear that in the circumstances here present no substantial right of defendant was violated; from which it follows that the point is without avail to appellant. Section 4½, art. 6, Const.

[5] Appellant suggests that, by reason of certain continuances, the trial court lost jurisdiction to pronounce judgment. From the record it appears that all such continuances were the result of defendant's application for probation, and each of them was either at defendant's request, or at least with her acquiescence. As the statutory time in the matter, as provided by section 1191 of the Penal Code, had not elapsed at the time sentence was pronounced, it follows that (without reference to other possible considerations) appellant's point is without merit.

[6, 7] It is urged by appellant that the information herein does not charge the commission of a public offense. The brief filed by appellant contains the statement that: "The slightest inspection of the information will disclose that the information fails to allege the offense of arson as required by law." Otherwise, this court is not informed as to the particulars in which it is claimed that the information is defective. In such circumstances this court should not be required to subject the information to rigid inspection or examination for the purpose of discovering in what possible respect it may be wanting as a pleading. However it may be noted that by the information defendant is accused of the "crime of arson, a felony, committed as follows: That the said Alice Brahm, on or about the 13th day of November, 1928, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, did, wilfully, unlawfully, feloniously and maliciously burn with intent to destroy the same, the building of one John Doe Meiling."

Section 447 of the Penal Code defines arson as the willful and malicious burning of a building with intent to destroy it. The "slightest inspection" of the information reveals the fact that it was in substantial accord, not only with the language of section 447 of the Penal Code, but that as well it included a statement with reference to the ownership of the building which it was alleged that defendant had burned. Section 452, Pen. Code. The case of People v. De Winton, 113 Cal. 403, 45 P. 708, 33 L. R. A. 374, 54 Am. St. Rep. 357, is ample authority to the effect that such an information is legally sufficient. See, also, People v. Russell, 81 Cal. 616, 23 P. 418, People v. Morhar, 78 Cal. App. 380, 384, 248 P. 975.

[8] Without an extended discussion of the denial of probation to defendant, it need only be said that, by practically all the authority on the subject in this state, the determination of that question rests with the sound discretion of the trial court. Since no abuse of discretion appears in the instant case, the decision reached by said court as to whether probation should be granted to defendant is necessarily conclusive.

The remaining points presented by appellant as reasons for reversal of the order made by the trial court are either included within those already considered by this court, or are of so little importance that, even if the position assumed by appellant therein be correct, a decision thereon in her favor could not affect the outcome of the appeal.

The order denying each of defendant's several motions is affirmed.

MIGALA v. DAKIN. (Civ. 3757.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 20, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 19, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 18, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Findings on conflicting evidence are conclusive.

Findings of trial court, where rendered on conflicting evidence, are conclusive on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⚷901, 931(1)—All reasonable inferences are indulged in support of findings, and appellant attacking them has burden to show error.

All reasonable inferences should be indulged in support of trial court's findings, and burden is on appellant to show existence of error therein.

3. Appeal and error ⚷989—Power of reviewing court extends only to inquiry whether there is substantial evidence supporting findings attacked for insufficiency of evidence.

Where findings are attacked on appeal for insufficiency of evidence, power of reviewing court extends only to inquiry whether there is substantial evidence to support them.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

4. Husband and wife 🔑281—Finding that property settlement for $260 between husband and wife in contemplation of divorce was fair held justified, under evidence of husband's previous payments and conduct of negotiations through attorneys.

Finding of trial court that property settlement between husband and wife for $260, entered into in contemplation of divorce, was just and was obtained without fraud or undue influence, held justified under evidence that negotiations were conducted through attorneys, and that husband was not present, and had not seen or communicated with his wife for over three years, and that husband had previously paid to wife considerable part of moneys accumulated by them during their marriage.

5. Husband and wife 🔑281—No presumption of confidential relations existed between husband and wife as to property settlement entered into pending divorce suits, after nearly five years' separation, where negotiations were conducted through attorneys (Civ. Code, §§ 158, 2235).

Where, at time of property settlement, husband and wife had been separated nearly five years, and each had brought actions for divorce, which were then pending, and negotiations for settlement were conducted through attorneys in absence of husband, no presumption of confidential relations existed, under Civ. Code, §§ 158, 2235, so as to place burden on husband to show that transaction was fair and just.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Myron Westover, Judge.

Action by Keturah T. Migala, formerly Keturah Townsend Rickard, against Charlotte Rickard Dakin, administratrix of the estate of William E. Rickard, deceased, substituted for William E. Rickard. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Smith & Breslin and Willard G. Cram, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Dana R. Weller and Frank R. Carrell, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff, Keturah T. Migala, brought this action against her former husband, William E. Rickard, to rescind a property settlement made between them on or about May 22, 1922, upon the ground that she was induced to make the settlement through the fraud, deceit, misrepresentations, and undue influence of said William E. Rickard. William E. Rickard died before the case was tried, and Charlotte Rickard Dakin was appointed administratrix of his estate, and substituted as defendant in this action in the place and stead of William E. Rickard. The case was tried by the court, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. From this judgment, plaintiff, Keturah T. Migala, prosecutes this appeal.

[1-3] The court found that no fraud, deceit, misrepresentations, or undue influence were practiced upon appellant; in fact, the court found against the appellant upon all the material issues in the case. Appellant contends that the findings are not supported by sufficient evidence. The findings of the trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of the findings. The burden is upon appellant, who claims error, to show its existence. The authorities supporting these well-known rules are legion, and we only need to cite the following: Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25; Wilbur v. Wilbur, 197 Cal. 1, 239 P. 332; Gjurich v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 129 P. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111. When the findings are attacked for insufficiency of the evidence to support them, our power begins and ends with the inquiry whether there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in and of itself will support the findings of the trial court. Treadwell v. Nickel, supra.

[4] A careful examination of the entire record fully convinces us that all the material findings of the trial court are amply supported by the evidence. The pertinent facts are briefly these:

Appellant and William E. Rickard were married in the state of Ohio on February 10, 1897, and lived there as man and wife until 1915, when they came to California and settled in Los Angeles. Shortly after their arrival in California they purchased a house and lot in Hollywood, Cal., which is the property in question. The deed was made to William E. Rickard and appellant, whose name was then Keturah T. Rickard. This property was purchased by them upon the following terms: $300 cash, which was community property, a first mortgage given for $1,600, and a second mortgage for $1,100. In October, 1917, appellant, without any apparent reason, abandoned William E. Rickard, and never afterwards lived with him. In 1919 she saw him on several occasions in the city of Los Angeles, but from 1919 to May 22, 1922, when the settlement was made, she did not see or correspond with Rickard at all. At the time of the settlement she was residing in Reno, Nev., and had instituted an action for divorce there against Rickard on the ground of failure to provide, which action was pending at the time of the settlement. The summons and complaint in this action were served upon Rickard in the city of Los Angeles, and he employed an attorney and sent said attorney to Reno to effect a reconciliation, if possible; if not, to make a property settlement with appellant. This attorney visited Reno, and in the office of appellant's attorney in that city had an interview with appellant and her attorney.

Being unable to induce appellant to return to her husband, said attorney informed appellant and her attorney that he would recommend to Rickard that he pay to appellant the sum of $260, if appellant would relinquish all rights she might have in the property to Rickard. Said attorney further stated to appellant and her attorney that he did not know the condition or the value of the property, but stated it had probably doubled in value since its purchase by the Rickards. Thereupon appellant's attorney stated that he was in correspondence with lawyers in Los Angeles and was fully informed regarding the property in question. At this interview Rickard's attorney produced an affidavit made by Rickard, in which it was stated that Rickard had paid to appellant about $3,700 out of the $4,300 community property which they possessed when they arrived in the city of Los Angeles, and that appellant had already received more than her share of the property. Appellant was questioned by her attorney, in the presence of Rickard's attorney, as to the truth of these statements, and she admitted receiving some of the money, but not all of it, but failed to specify the amount that she had received. Rickard's attorney returned to Los Angeles, prepared a property settlement agreement and a quitclaim deed from appellant to William E. Rickard, and forwarded the same, together with $260, to appellant's attorney at Reno. The $260 was retained, and the contract and deed were executed by appellant in Reno, and returned by her attorney to Mr. Rickard's attorney in Los Angeles. At the time of the settlement there was pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county an action by William E. Rickard against appellant for divorce upon the ground of adultery, naming the man whom she afterwards married as corespondent, which fact was made known to appellant by Rickard's attorney.

[5] Appellant contends that this case comes within the general rules controlling the actions of persons occupying confidential relations, as defined by the title on trusts (sections 158, 2235, Civ. Code), and that the rule laid down in such cases as Locke Paddon v. Locke Paddon, 194 Cal. 80, 227 P. 715, is controlling in this case. We are unable to agree with this contention. At the time of the settlement appellant and Rickard had been separated nearly five years, and for three years had not seen or heard from each other. Each had brought actions for divorce, which cases were then pending. The negotiations for settlement between them were conducted through their attorneys. Rickard was not present, and had not seen or communicated with his wife for over three years, so there was no chance for personal influence to be exercised by him upon her. Under such circumstances, there was no presumption of confidential relations, such as was found to exist in the cases relied upon by appellant.

We think this case falls within the rule stated in such cases as Hensley v. Hensley, 179 Cal. 284, 183 P. 445, and Chadwick v. Chadwick (Cal. App.) 273 P. 86. In the case of Hensley v. Hensley, supra, the Supreme Court, in considering the subject of confidential relations and to the extent it affects negotiations between husband and wife, who have been living separate and apart for some time, used the following language, which is particularly appropriate in the case at bar: "The husband and wife had been living apart for years. That they were in hostility the suit for maintenance sufficiently proves. The transactions for settlement of her claim were conducted through her agents and his, so there was no chance for personal influence to be exercised by him upon her. There was no presumption of confidential relation such as was found to exist in cases like Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525 [17 P. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189], and Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323 [27 P. 186]. The parties to the contract were dealing 'at arm's-length.'" See, also, Dimond v. Sanderson, 103 Cal. 97, 37 P. 189.

If, however, it be admitted, for the sake of argument, that a confidential relation existed between appellant and her husband at the time of the settlement, and that the burden was upon respondent to show that the transaction was fair and just, and fully understood by appellant, the evidence and finding show that respondent has fully met and sustained this burden. The court found that no fraud, concealment, or misrepresentations were resorted to in the settlement, and that no undue influence was exerted over appellant; that the value of all the property in question, at the time of the settlement, was of the reasonable value of $8,000, and was purchased in 1915 from funds acquired by them in the state of Ohio, partly from the separate funds of appellant, but the larger portion thereof having been acquired through their joint efforts; that appellant had received from William E. Rickard, prior and subsequent to her abandonment of him, $3,700 out of moneys accumulated by them during their marriage. The court also found that appellant never relied upon any statements made to her by Rickard's attorney, that Rickard himself made none, and that appellant executed both the agreement and quitclaim deed freely and voluntarily, under the advice of counsel, and after mature consideration and deliberation by her.

Appellant makes a multitude of objections to the findings, but the effect of all these objections is that the court should have found in favor of plaintiff, instead of defendant. This case, in its last analysis, presents only a question of fact, and the court has resolved all conflicts in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff and appellant, and, as we have seen, there is sufficient evidence to support the findings; so the findings are conclusive upon this court. We see no necessity for a further discussion of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROBERTS v. GRIFFITH CO. (Civ. 6709.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 18, 1929.

Rehearing Granted June 21, 1929.

1. Animals 🔑55—Defendant held not as matter of law free from negligence in permitting mules on streets without supervision, as respects injuries to deputy marshal.

Corporation engaged in doing street work, in connection with which it used some 20 mules, held not as matter of law free from negligence in permitting mules to run at large upon public streets of city without keeper or other supervision, in action against corporation by deputy marshal for injuries sustained in attempting to drive the mules from the streets, as against claim that there was no allegation by plaintiff that mules were vicious or of scienter on part of corporation.

2. Animals 🔑55—Alleged negligence in permitting mules at large held not as matter of law too remote as regards injuries to deputy marshal clearing streets (Pen. Code, § 370).

Alleged negligence of defendant corporation engaged in doing street work, in permitting some 20 mules to run at large on streets without supervision, could not be held as matter of law too remote to constitute proximate cause of injury to deputy marshal injured by mules while attempting to clear the streets and prevent obstruction claimed to constitute nuisance under Pen. Code, § 370.

3. Pleading 🔑225(1)—Plaintiff's failure to move to amend after sustaining demurrer, due to want of opportunity, did not prevent reversal of judgment.

Failure of plaintiff to ask leave to amend complaint held not to prevent reversal of judgment of dismissal entered after order sustaining demurrer, where judgment was entered without opportunity to plaintiff to move for leave to amend.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Clarence W. Roberts against the Griffith Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Brewton A. Hayne and Ernest M. Torchia, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. From a judgment of dismissal, entered pursuant to an order sustaining defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's complaint without leave to amend, plaintiff appeals.

The complaint, in substance, alleges that Lynwood is a city of the sixth class and plaintiff was and is a deputy marshal thereof; that defendant was and is a corporation chiefly engaged in doing street work and in connection therewith owned more than 20 mules; that on October 24, 1926, at the hour of 10 o'clock p. m., defendant carelessly and negligently allowed about 20 of its mules to run at large, without a keeper or other supervision, upon the public streets of Lynwood, thereby creating a public nuisance by unlawfully obstructing the free passage and use in the customary manner of said streets in violation of section 370 of the Penal Code; that it thereupon became the duty of plaintiff, as a deputy marshal, to abate such nuisance and while engaged with two other deputy marshals in driving such mules from the streets plaintiff was thrown by such mules violently to the ground and his left leg broken, to his damage. The demurrer was both general and special.

[1] It is not contended by respondent that under the circumstances alleged in the complaint plaintiff was not acting in the performance of his duty in endeavoring to remove the mules from the city streets; but respondent does contend that no actionable negligence is pleaded, because there is no allegation that the mules were vicious or of scienter on the part of respondent, and that the negligence, if any, in permitting them at large was not the proximate cause of appellant's injuries. With these contentions we cannot agree. While there is a conflict of authority on the subject in the various jurisdictions, we are satisfied that the better rule is that it may be actionable negligence to permit horses or mules to run at large and untended on the streets of a municipality regardless of their vicious character or of scienter.

In Goodman v. Gay, 15 Pa. 188, 53 Am. Dec. 589, the court said:

"The owner has no right, either by law or custom, to turn a horse loose in the streets of a city. All men know that a horse which has been stabled and well fed will, when turned out, run and plunge, and become dangerous in the midst of people. If one man has the right to turn out his horse, every man has the same right; and, if the one-fourth of people who own horses in a city would turn them out on the streets, not only the women and children, but even the men would have to abandon them.

"There is no reported case in which it was held that a person who turned out his horse in the streets of London or New York was not answerable, if he run over a child or a woman, unless the owner knew, when he turned him out, that he was vicious and prone to kick. But, I may say, that all horses are, when turned loose, more or less dangerous in confined streets; and all men know this. The gist of the action is, that the defendant did an act, not sanctioned by law nor custom, from which he must have known that injury might result."

To the same effect are Dickson v. McCoy, 39 N. Y. 400; Hardiman v. Wholley, 172

Mass. 411, 52 N. E. 518, 70 Am. St. Rep. 292; Baldwin v. Ensign, 49 Conn. 113, 44 Am. Rep. 205; Doherty v. Sweetser, 82 Hun, 556, 31 N. Y. S. 649; Wasmuth v. Butler, 86 Hun, 1, 33 N. Y. S. 108; Stern v. Hoffman Brewing Co., 26 Misc. Rep. 794, 56 N. Y. S. 188; Lyons v. Merrick, 105 Mass. 71; Drew v. Gross, 112 Ohio St. 485, 147 N. E. 757.

Respondent relies on the English case of Cox v. Burbridge, 13 C. B. (N. S.) 431, 143 Eng. Rep. 171, and the English cases following it, and the Indiana case, Klenberg v. Russell, 125 Ind. 531, 25 N. E. 596. The English cases hold that it is not actionable negligence to permit domestic animals to run at large on country roads. It does not at all follow that the same rule should apply to the streets within an incorporated municipality. Klenberg v. Russell extends the same rule to city streets. We refuse to follow the rule blindly in such fashion. It may well be that, in the absence of statutory restrictions, it is not unreasonable to permit domestic animals to run on country roads. Upon that question we do not need to express an opinion. It would be intolerable to permit such animals as horses, mules, and cattle to roam untended and untethered on the public streets of incorporated cities and towns. While the precise question has not come before our appellate courts, the early case of Ficken v. Jones, 28 Cal. 618, is instructive. In that case plaintiff was injured by a steer which was being driven with other cattle through Brannan street in San Francisco. There was no evidence that the cattle were wild, untamed, or vicious, or that defendants had cause to believe they were so, but the court held that defendants were nevertheless bound to exercise care in driving them for the safety of people on the streets, and would be liable for failure to do so, which resulted in injury to person, saying: "The driving of cattle through the streets of a city is attended with danger to persons who are of right there, and who can justly demand that the care, diligence and skill essential to their safety shall be commensurate with the necessities of the case." If the driving of cattle through city streets is attended with danger to persons, the permitting of them to wander untended is of necessity fraught with greater peril.

[2] The real question in this case is whether the defendant could reasonably foresee that by allowing a band of 20 mules to be loose upon the streets an injury such as occurred to defendant might ensue. To that question there is only one reasonable answer. Any one who has had experience with animals in herds or bands, however docile they may ordinarily be, must know the danger attendant upon frightening, alarming, or startling them, and must equally know that it is impossible to foretell what trifle may throw them into a stampede.

We conclude that the complaint stated a cause of action as against the general demurrer, and it was error not to grant leave to amend.

[3] Respondent urges, however, that the judgment should not be reversed because certain grounds of special demurrer, particularly as to the failure to specify the manner in which the accident to plaintiff occurred, were well taken, and plaintiff did not ask leave to amend. The record shows that the order sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend was made on March 18, 1927, and judgment of dismissal was signed and filed on March 22, four days later. There is nothing to show that plaintiff had notice of the order sustaining demurrer or any opportunity to move for leave to amend before the judgment was entered. The case falls within the rule laid down in Metzger v. Vestal, 76 Cal. App. 409, 418, 244 P. 942, 945: "The rule that a party, against whom an order has been entered sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend, must ask leave to amend in order to have the ruling reviewed on appeal presupposes that the complaining party had an opportunity to ask such leave prior to the time of entry of judgment on the order. To hold otherwise would be to carry a technical rule to the extreme of absurdity."

Judgment reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant plaintiff leave to file an amended complaint.

RINGLAND et ux. v. HOCKENSMITH et al. (Civ. 3781.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 20, 1929.

1. Libel and slander ⚿100(8)—Policeman's testimony that defendant said plaintiffs were handling booze or dope held not variance from allegation as to saying, if he watched their premises, he would find they were peddling whisky or dope.

In action for slander, policeman's testimony that defendant told him plaintiffs were either handling booze or dope held not a variance from allegation of complaint that she told him that, if he watched plaintiffs' premises, he would find they were peddling whisky or dope; such testimony sufficiently conforming with rule requiring that substance of words alleged be proved.

2. Evidence ⚿317(1)—Admission of testimony as to conversations outside defendant's presence concerning latter's accusations against plaintiffs held erroneous.

In action for slander, court erred in admitting testimony of plaintiffs' landlady and her agent as to conversations between them and with plaintiffs and a policeman out of defendant's presence concerning accusations alleged to have been made to such policeman against plaintiffs by defendant.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1170(7)—Admission of hearsay testimony as to conversations concerning defendant's disputed statements to policeman about plaintiffs held reversible error (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Admission of hearsay testimony of plaintiffs' landlady and her agent in slander suit as to conversations between themselves and with plaintiffs and policeman concerning accusations alleged to have been made to latter by defendant held reversible error, in view of conflicting testimony of defendant and policeman as to what was said to him; Const. art. 6, § 4½, being inapplicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by David L. Ringland and wife against Elsie Hockensmith and husband. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Sherman & Sherman, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Loraine B. Beyer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This appeal presents for our consideration an action wherein it is alleged in the complaint that the defendant Elsie Hockensmith, on or about the 26th day of May, 1925, spoke to one L. Chalfant, of and concerning the plaintiffs, the following words, to wit: "If you will watch the premises at 730 Spence street you will find that these people are peddling whisky or peddling dope." The plaintiffs in their complaint allege that, by reason of the use of said words by the said Elsie Hockensmith, of and concerning them, they were damaged in the sum of $25,000. Upon the trial of the action, judgment was awarded in favor of the plaintiffs as against the defendant Elsie Hockensmith in the sum of $1,000. From this judgment the defendants appeal.

While several grounds for reversal are alleged, the consideration of two of them will sufficiently dispose of all the issues here presented, to wit: First, as to whether the proof substantially corresponds with the allegations of the complaint; and, second, the alleged errors of the court in the admission of testimony. The record shows that the plaintiffs and defendants occupied apartments in a certain bungalow court in the city of Los Angeles; that on the 26th day of May, 1925, the defendant Elsie Hockensmith called to the apartment occupied by the defendants a police officer by the name of L. R. Chalfant, and complained to him of the use of an incinerator by the plaintiffs at No. 730 Spence street, and also complained to said Chalfant of the keeping of a barking dog by the said plaintiffs at their premises, which very much annoyed herself and her husband.

The testimony of L. R. Chalfant is in substance as follows: That he went to the residence of the defendants, pursuant to a call, to investigate the use of an incinerator by the plaintiffs; that, after a conversation about the incinerator, he stepped into one of the rooms occupied by the defendants; that the said Elsie Hockensmith invited him to sit down, and then said, if I would keep my eyes open I would be able to see something. I said, "What do you mean?" She said, "These people over there are either handling booze or dope because they get up along about two to four o'clock in the morning and leave here and I don't know what they are doing unless they are handling that." It appears that the names of the plaintiffs were not mentioned, but the following question and answer indicates to whom reference was made. "Question by the Court: Did she say in her conversation that it was the people in the house where the incinerator was? A. Yes." Upon cross-examination the witness further testified: "She said, 'If you will watch those people you will see them; I think they are peddling dope or booze.'"

[1, 2] Without setting forth further of the testimony of this witness, which is in line with what we have just quoted, it appears to us to sufficiently conform with the rule which requires the substance of the words alleged to be proved; not merely that other words which correspond in substance, but a sufficient number of words alleged, as is stated in the case of Fleet v. Tichenor, 156 Cal. 343, 104 P. 458, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 323, to wit: "In an action for slander, where the defendant is charged with the speaking of certain specified slanderous words, it is sufficient to prove the substance of the precise words alleged. By this is meant, not that it is sufficient to show the speaking of other words which would produce an impression similar to that which the words alleged would produce, but that the words alleged, or enough of them to amount to a charge of the particular offense alleged to have been imputed, must be substantially proved." See, also, 16 Cal. Jur. 97, § 67. Without further elaboration we hold that the objection of variance is not well taken. That the court erred in the admission of testimony as alleged by the appellants appears to be clearly and distinctly established. Over the repeated objections of the defendants, which were followed by timely motions to strike out, which were denied, the court permitted the following testimony to be introduced: A witness called for the plaintiff, by the name of Jack Gaines, who appears to have been acting for a certain Mrs. Haley, who was the owner of the premises occupied by the plaintiffs, was permitted to testify, as to matters which occurred out of the presence of the defendants, and which was entirely hearsay testimony, as follows: "On May 26, 1925, I resided at 720 Spence street, and am acquainted with the plaintiffs and defendants in this case. I am a newspaper man, and on the 26th day of May, 1926, had a conversation with Mr. Ringland. Mr. Ringland, his wife and myself were present. Mrs. Haley phoned me at my office and said they were having a little trouble there, that there had been a police officer over there, and advised me that one of our tenants on the property was indulging in the sale of narcotics and liquor, and asked if I would leave my office and come right home and handle the matter for her. I arrived home and Mrs. Haley told me that Officer Chalfant had been called from the Boyle Heights division and that Mrs. Hockensmith had advised this officer by indicating the Ringland home, where they had been living, they had been selling narcotics and booze, and that if he would keep his eyes open he would learn that they were engaged in that business. At that time I said to Mrs. Haley. 'If you own this property you better ask the people for your property.' I said to Mr. and Mrs. Ringland when I went over there for Mrs. Haley, 'You have been accused of peddling booze and dope and if you are engaged in that kind of traffic, we do not allow that on the property and would like to have the property now.' Mr. Ringland asked the source of my information. I told him that Officer Chalfant had advised Mrs. Haley that he had been in discussion of this matter with one of our neighbors and that Mrs. Hockensmith had made the accusation."

The witness Eva P. Haley, called for the plaintiff, testified as follows: "I reside at 720 Spence street. I first met Officer Chalfant when he came to my house on May 26, 1925, in the forenoon, and had a conversation with him at that time. My daughter, Mrs. Fuller, who lives with me, was present. Officer Chalfant came to my house and asked me if I knew the business of Mr. Ringland who lived at 730. I told him that he was a driver for the Crescent Creamery. He said, 'I have been informed that he is selling booze and peddling dope.' I asked him where he got his information. He said, 'Mrs. Hockensmith, who lives in the house directly back of you.' Mrs. Fuller asked him some questions. She asked him if that was not libelous." Question by the Court: "Who asked you? A. My daughter, Mrs. Fuller, asked Officer Chalfant at the time that he was there in our house and had told me that he had been informed that these people were selling booze and peddling dope, and my daughter asked me if that was not a slanderous statement, unless they were doing—unless they were peddling booze. He said, 'If it were my family I should certainly consider it so.'" Other hearsay testimony was also introduced along somewhat similar lines.

[3] That this testimony was inadmissible we think requires no argument nor much citation of authority. In 37 C. J. p. 151, on the subject of libel and slander, the rule is stated in relation to the admission of evidence in slander cases as follows: "The general rules in regard to presumptions and burden of proof apply in prosecutions for libel or slander. The burden is upon the prosecution to show every fact essential to the commission of the crime. The general rules governing the admissibility of evidence are applicable in prosecutions for libel or slander. The evidence must be relevant, and must not come within the prohibition of the hearsay rule," —citing a number of authorities. To the same effect are the cases of People v. Thornton, 74 Cal. 482, 16 P. 244; Morris v. Lachman, 68 Cal. 109, 8 P. 799; Carpenter v. Ashley, 148 Cal. 422, 83 P. 444, 7 Ann. Cas. 601. In the Carpenter Case it was held that newspaper recitals of the alleged slanderous words were properly excluded under the rules which we are discussing that what others may have said about what the defendant in the slander case is alleged to have said is inadmissible. That there was a sharp conflict between what the officer, called as a witness for the plaintiffs, recited as the conversation he had with the defendant Elsie Hockensmith, and what said defendant claims was the conversation, appears from the following excerpt taken from her testimony:

After stating that the officer had been called on account of the burning of refuse in the incinerator referred to, this witness testified that there was this further conversation: "Yes," I said, "those dogs—this dog annoys my husband; he is a working-man and has to have his rest, and the other people in the neighborhood don't care whether they have rest or not." I said, "My husband has to have his sleep." I said, "There are some people around here that don't work, and the dogs annoy us." He said, "What do you mean, 'not work?'" I said "Well, we have to have our rest." So then he said, "Don't work for a living, hard?" I said, "I don't know; they don't act like it; they don't seem to get their rest." He said, "What do you mean, they don't work hard, they bootleg or peddle dope?" I said, "I don't know."

This witness claimed that she made no further reference to bootlegging or peddling of dope by the plaintiffs, and did not use the words testified to by the witness Chalfant. We might further add that the cross-examination of the witness Chalfant, which we have not set forth herein, indicated that he was not quite definite as to the words alleged to have been used by the defendant Elsie Hockensmith, but, assuming that the exact words or the substance of them were testified to by him, the testimony of the two witnesses referred to is in direct conflict, and, under such circumstances, section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution cannot be held applicable. The record shows that the court participated in bringing out the objectionable testimony, overruled all of the defendants' objections thereto, and denied their motions to strike it out. Under such circumstances we cannot conclude that the hearsay testimony was not given consideration by the court in arriving at its conclusions.

As the cause must go back for a new trial, it is unnecessary to consider the question of the alleged excess of damages.

The judgment is reversed.

MIRATTI v. BANCA POPOLARE FUGAZI et al. (Civ. 3774.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 15, 1929.

1. Venue ⟹8—Complaint held to support order denying change of venue as showing payment of money because of resident defendant's fraudulent statements (Civ. Code, §§ 1570, subd. 3, 1572, subds. 1, 4, 5).

Complaint in action by bank teller and his mother against bank and officers thereof to recover amount of note, executed by plaintiffs for shortage of cash intrusted to teller and paid by his mother, held to support order denying motion for change of place of trial as showing on its face entire want of consideration for such payment and payment thereof because of resident defendant's untrue statements, denounced as fraudulent by Civ. Code, § 1572, subds. 1, 4, 5, and threats of injury to teller's reputation in violation of section 1570, subd. 3.

2. Appeal and error ⟹863—Sufficiency of complaint and question of limitations are immaterial on appeal from order denying change of venue, if defects are curable by amendment.

Whether complaint is good as against special demurrer, facts alleged are defectively stated, or cause of action is barred by statute of limitations, cannot be considered on appeal from order denying motion for change of place of trial, if defects can be cured by amendment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Frank Miratti, Jr., and another against the Banca Popolare Fugazi and others. From an order denying their motion for a change of place of trial, certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. W. Squier, of Santa Barbara, and R. T. Harding, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Scherrer & McCarty, of Los Angeles, and Heaney, Price & Postel, of Santa Barbara (Charles Robert McCarty, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This cause is before us upon an appeal by the defendants Banca Popolare Fugazi, F. N. Belgrano, Sr., and F. N. Belgrano, Jr., from an order of the superior court in and for the county of Santa Barbara, denying their motion for a change of place of trial of said action to the city and county of San Francisco. The grounds of their motion are that no cause of action is stated in the complaint against the defendant U. Dardi, the only defendant residing in Santa Barbara county, and that the other defendants are residents of the city and county of San Francisco, etc. The motion appears to be supported by proper notices and affidavits. The argument of appellants is addressed to the point that the complaint states no cause of action against any of the defendants, and, therefore, the fact that U. Dardi is a resident of the county in which the action is brought must be disregarded. The complaint alleges the residence of U. Dardi in the county of Santa Barbara; that Pasqualina Miratti is the mother of the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr.; that both of the plaintiffs are residents of the county of Santa Barbara; that the defendant Banca Popolare Fugazi was and is a banking corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of California, and owned and operated the bank and branches thereof throughout the state; that the headquarters of said bank was and is in the city and county of San Francisco; and that said defendant owned and operated a branch bank thereof in the city and county of Santa Barbara.

The complaint then sets forth: "That on or about the 10th day of October, 1921, the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., was an employee and assistant cashier of the defendant bank, and was employed in such capacity at the branch bank of said defendant in the City and County of Santa Barbara, and had been such for a period of approximately four years prior to the date just mentioned; that the defendant U. Dardi was an employee of the defendant-bank, and was employed by the bank in the capacity of manager of the branch bank of the defendant-bank owned and operated by it in the City and County of Santa Barbara; that on or about October 10, 1921, the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., was employed by the defendant to act as teller at one of its paying and receiving windows; that one Emil Toscanini was also an employee and teller of the defendant-bank, in charge of another and adjoining paying and receiving window, and was the head teller of said bank and superior in authority to the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., and was in charge of all the cash of said branch bank; that on the 10th day of October, 1921, said Emil Toscanini, pursuant to the practice and custom of said bank, turned over and delivered to the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., at the paying and receiving window occupied by the said Frank Miratti, Jr., the sum of $2240.00, in lawful money of the United States, and that the said Frank Miratti, Jr., thereupon placed said money in the cash drawer in the cage at the window where said Frank Miratti, Jr., was acting as receiving and paying teller, and as provided by the defendant-bank for such purpose; that at the conclusion of the day's business, the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., checked over his cash and discovered that he was short to the extent of $2240.00; that the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., then and there so informed the said Emil Toscanini and delivered to said Emil Toscanini all the cash on hand in his cage, and the said Toscanini checked the same with the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., but the said shortage still remained; that on the opening of said branch bank on the following morning the said Toscanini and the said plaintiff rechecked said cash, and also checked the entire cash of said branch bank, but the shortage still remained; that thereupon the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., and the said Emil Toscanini informed U. Dardi, the manager of said bank, of said shortage; that the said U. Dardi then and there communicated with the head office of said bank in San Francisco, and informed them of such shortage; that thereafter, and on or about the 12th day of October, 1921, the defendants in this action informed the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., that the said Frank Miratti, Jr., was under fidelity bond and had been bonded with such a bond by a Bonding Company; that they did not believe that said plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., had appropriated or committed any wrongful act in or about the loss or shortage of said sum of $2240.00, or any part thereof; but that for the protection of said bank it would be necessary for the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., to pay the said bank the sum of $2240.00, and that unless the said plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., did pay the same to said bank, it would be necessary for them to, and they would turn the entire matter over to, and refer the same to the said Bonding Company for refund; that the said defendants then and there further stated to said Frank Miratti, Jr., that in the event the said matter was turned over to, or referred to the Bonding Company, that the Bonding Company would bring great disgrace upon the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr.; that the character and reputation of the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., for honesty and integrity would be utterly ruined; that the defendant Banca Popolare Fugazi would be compelled to immediately discharge the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., and that the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., would thereafter be unable to hold any position of honor or trust in any place whatever; that he would be so disgraced in his own community that he would be forced to leave Santa Barbara where he was born and had been raised and where his family had resided ever since, and that the said plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., would, in addition thereto, have to repay to the Bonding Company the said sum of $2240.00; the said defendants at the same time and place, stated to the said plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., that if the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., forthwith paid said sum of $2240.00 to the defendant Banca Popolare Fugazi, that the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., would not suffer said misfortune or disgrace; he would not be discharged, and the matter would not be turned over to the Bonding Company, but would be kept quiet, and the said plaintiff could retain his position with the bank, and that said plaintiff was in line for promotion; that the defendants, at the same time and place, further stated to the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., that if he, the said plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., paid to the said bank the said sum of $2240.00, the defendants would employ detectives, without cost to the said plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., and would make an exhaustive investigation of said matter and endeavor to locate and recover the said sum of $2240.00, and that the defendants were convinced that the same would be recovered; that thereafter, and on or about the 13th day of October, 1921, the defendants, at and within the County of Santa Barbara, repeated the aforesaid statements and representations to the plaintiff Pasqualina Miratti."

The complaint then goes on to allege that the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., and his mother, the plaintiff Pasqualina Miratti, were greatly agitated, placed in great fear, etc., and, by reason of the statement just herein referred to, executed and delivered to the defendant bank a promissory note in the sum of $2,240, and thereafter paid to said bank the said sum of $2,240. The complaint then goes on to allege that the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., was not under any bond whatsoever; that the defendants, at the time they made the statements herein referred to, knew that the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., was not under any bond whatsoever, and that the bank, of which the plaintiff was an employee, had not taken out any bond as alleged by the defendants; that the plaintiffs had no knowledge of the falsity of the defendants' statements. The complaint further alleges that the defendants knew, at the time they were making the statements, that the same were false, and that each and every of the statements herein referred to were untrue, and that the statements were made for the purpose of intimidating the plaintiffs and causing them to pay to the bank the said sum of $2,240; that the statements made by the defendants relative to employing detectives to ascertain what had become of the money, and secure its repayment to the bank, were made without any intention whatever, on the part of the defendants to perform, and that said defendants had no such intentions at the time said statements were made, but were falsely made for the purpose of inducing the plaintiffs to execute and deliver to the defendants a promissory note for said sum of $2,240, and to thereafter pay the same. The complaint then further alleges that the falsity of the statements made by the defendants was not discovered until after the said $2,240 had been paid to said bank, to wit, on or about the month of April, 1926. The complaint asks for the recovery of said sum of $2,240, with 7 per cent. interest, and also for exemplary damages.

[1] The appellants in their presentation of this cause have presented authorities having to do with circumstances involving the embezzlement of funds where the embezzlement has been established as a matter of fact or admitted, and promissory notes given to cover the amount of funds embezzled, and our attention is called to a number of cases where statements that the parties whose funds have been embezzled would take legal proceedings for the recovery of the loss so incurred and where statements of that kind have been held insufficient to support an action for recovery. There seems to be no reason why we should review the authorities dealing with conditions such as we have just stated, for the simple reason that those conditions are not presented to us upon the pleadings upon which the trial court based its order denying the defendants' motion for a change of place of trial. Whether the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., was or was not liable to the bank in the sum of $2,240 or any other sum is really immaterial, unless such liability is an admitted fact or must necessarily be concluded from the complaint itself. We are not dealing with the facts, but only with the pleadings in determining this question. We think it clear that there is nothing in the complaint which would justify the court in finding as a fact that the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., was, at the time of the giving of the promissory note by himself and his mother to the bank, or at the time of paying the sum of $2,240 to the bank, liable to the bank in any sum whatever. So far as the complaint is concerned, it appears therefrom that the defendants entertained no such idea, but that it would simply be better for the reputation of Frank Miratti, Jr., if said sum of money were paid by him and his mother to the bank. This presents a situation which we think supports the ruling of the trial court in denying the motion for a change of place of trial, and that is, the complaint upon its face shows an entire want of consideration for the payment of any money by the plaintiff Pasqualina Miratti to the defendants. It also shows that the plaintiff Pasqualina Miratti was induced and caused to sign the note and pay the money by reason of the alleged fraudulent and untruthful statements of the defendants. While the complaint itself does not in so many words charge fraudulent acts, it does charge statements as untrue and made for the purpose of deceiving the plaintiffs which, especially as to the plaintiff Pasqualina Miratti, are denounced as fraudulent by section 1572 of the Civil Code. To constitute a fraud within that section to induce one to enter into a contract to pay money, subdivision 1 of the section provides: "The suggestion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who does not believe it to be true," is sufficient to constitute fraud. Likewise, subdivision 4: "A promise made without any intention of performing it" is sufficient to constitute a fraud. And subdivision 5: "Any other act fitted to deceive." We may also call attention to section 1570 of the same code, in so far as it applies to the plaintiff Pasqualina Miratti, which shows that the allegations of the complaint are sufficient as to menace, to wit, subdivision 3 of the section relating to injury to the character of such person. While there is no allegation in the complaint as to injury to the character of the plaintiff Pasqualina Miratti, there are allegations in the complaint as to the statements of the defendants relative to the threatened injury to the character and reputation of the plaintiff Frank Miratti, Jr., the son of the plaintiff Pasqualina Miratti. We state this as showing that the plaintiff Pasqualina Miratti was induced to sign the note and make payment to the bank, as alleged, without any valid consideration, and that a cause of action exists on her part for the recovery of the money from the defendants, and also for damages, if any, on account of the fraudulent acts of the defendant, U. Dardi, the manager of the bank.

[2] That the complaint may not be good as against special demurrer is entirely immaterial. Likewise, this is true if it be admitted that the facts attempted to be alleged are defectively stated. It may also be true that the plaintiffs' cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations. These are questions which can only be considered upon their presentation to the court by way of demurrers on the part of the defendants. Thus, as said in the case of McClung v. Watt, 190 Cal. 155, 211 P. 17: "Allegations which do no more than shadow forth the semblance of a cause of action are proof against assault upon the ground that they are sham and frivolous." And further: "It is enough upon the hearing and determination of a motion for a change of place of trial by an individual defendant in an action brought against him and a corporation in the county of the latter's residence, that the cause of action purported to be stated against the corporation was apparently pleaded in good faith and is not, prima facie, so glaringly and vitally defective as to be beyond correction by amendment." (We have quoted from the syllabus.) Thus, it may be admitted in the present case that the complaint is defective; that the trial court would be justified in sustaining a demurrer directed to certain defects therein; but if it appears that the pleading is such that the defects can be cured by amendment, then and in that case the motion for a change of place of trial was properly denied.

We think, with the respondents, that the case which we have just cited is conclusive, and that the motion for a change of venue was properly denied, and the order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BROWN et al. (Cr. 1532.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 23, 1929.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 20, 1929.

1. Conspiracy ⚷47—Evidence held to sustain conviction for conspiracy to rob.

Evidence warranting conviction of defendants of joint robbery held sufficient to sustain conviction of conspiracy to commit robbery.

2. Conspiracy ⚷23—Criminal conspiracy is criminal agreement.

A criminal conspiracy is a criminal agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Homer R. Spence, Judge.

Bertha Brown and another were convicted of conspiracy to commit robbery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Leo A. Sullivan and J. L. Royle, both of Oakland, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendants, charging them with robbery, and in the second count charging them with conspiracy to commit robbery. They pleaded not guilty. Both were tried together before the court sitting with a jury. The jury found each defendant not guilty of robbery, and it found each defendant guilty of conspiracy to commit robbery. Both defendants have appealed.

[1] In presenting their appeal the defendants assert that the evidence introduced was not sufficient to prove that a conspiracy was formed. We think that the point is not well founded and that the evidence was abundantly sufficient to prove that a conspiracy was formed.

Prior to December 8, 1928, the alleged date of the offense, the two defendants had been living together as man and wife. On the evening of that day and prior to the appearance of the complaining witnesses the two defendants had been together for several hours. On that same evening the complaining witnesses, Peter Olson and Olaf Jurgensen, two brothers, registered at the San Pablo Hotel, in Oakland. A few minutes later they went out on the street to find an eating place. On approaching a restaurant they found it was locked, and, as they were about to turn away, Bertha Brown turned to them and asked, "What do you want?" At the time that she spoke to them she stood by the side of an automobile that was parked near the sidewalk, and was talking to a man who was seated in the automobile. The complaining witnesses answered Bertha by saying they wanted something to eat. Thereupon she remarked that she would assist them. They followed her to a restaurant, but it was closed. She then proposed that they get a drink. She asked them their names, and, on being told, she took them to a bootlegger's, introduced them, and they had some drinks. Olson took one drink, but Jurgensen and Bertha took several. Bertha asked the complaining witnesses to go with her to a private place, which she said she could get into; however, it was finally agreed that they would all return to room 514 of the San Pablo Hotel. The two complaining witnesses were taken up to the room by the night clerk, who operated the elevator. Bertha remained outside for the time being and later went up the stairs and entered room 514.

While the night clerk was taking the complaining witnesses up in the elevator the defendant Hoffer entered the house. He looked at the register and then went up the stairway. When the clerk heard that Hoffer had entered he went upstairs and found Hoffer standing alone outside of room 514. At that time no one else was present in the hallway. On being asked what he was doing there, Hoffer ran. Later he was found on the third floor in one of the stalls with the door closed. On being found he came out, went downstairs, registered under the name of "Williams," was assigned to room 428, went to his room, left his hat there, and then walked up the stairs and met Olson in the hall. As stated, there is hearsay evidence in the record that two taxi drivers saw Hoffer enter, and that they told the clerk. Whether they saw the defendant Brown enter, whether both defendants entered together or separately, and, if separately, which entered first, there is no evidence.

After Bertha entered room 514 Olson stepped out, leaving Jurgensen and Bertha alone. While the two were in the room Bertha proposed a drink and produced a flask and two glasses. She gave Jurgensen a good-sized drink, and from that time, as Jurgensen testified, everything seemed to go black, hazy. When he took the drink the witness had in his trouser pockets between $65 and $70.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

When he came to, his pockets were turned inside out and he had no money.

When Olson left the room he went into the hallway, and soon afterwards he left the hall for a short period of time and then returned and took a seat near the stairway. After he had been seated there a while the defendant Hoffer came up the stairs and asked him if there was a woman in room 514. Olson said there was. Hoffer asked him if he would tell her when she came out to come to his room, 428. In a few minutes Olson knocked on the door. Bertha called, "Come in." He opened the door wide, and Bertha was standing in the middle of the floor, looking toward the door. As Olson entered the room Bertha pointed toward the door and said, "What do you mean by talking to my husband?" Hoffer was then standing in the doorway. Taking Bertha by the arm Olson said, "If that is your husband, you had better go." At about that time Hoffer struck Jurgensen squarely in the face and knocked him down and out. He then commenced striking Olson. While the two men were fighting Bertha picked up the crockery cuspidor and, from behind, hit Olson two severe blows on the head. Realizing that he was in a losing fight, Olson dropped to the floor, with his head under the bed, and pretended to be unconscious. Almost immediately he felt a hand pulling his purse from his hip pocket. The purse contained about $45. Bertha then said: "Let's get out of here before the police come." Together the two defendants left the hallway. They walked to the lower floor together, Hoffer carrying Bertha's coat on his arm and having no hat on his head. At once they attempted to leave the house. When they got outside they attempted to flee, but both were stopped and arrested by the police. Two days later Hoffer appeared at the hotel and inquired for his hat. The clerk produced the hat, and then followed a conversation in which Hoffer stated to the clerk that he would pay $75 if the clerk would take $40 to the police and tell them it was found in the room when the room was being cleaned up.

[2] A criminal conspiracy is a criminal agreement. People v. Flanagan, 65 Cal. App. 268, 275, 223 P. 1014. The Code fixes no time at which the conspiracy must be entered into. People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444, 460, 50 P. 675. Notwithstanding the verdict of the jury the facts are not debatable that the defendants actually robbed Olson and Jurgensen. The facts delineated were sufficient on which the jury might, and doubtlessly did, base the inference that after Olson and Jurgensen left the defendant Brown and went up in the elevator the defendant Brown communicated with Hoffer and either advised him of the names of their victims or the number of the room and that she was going to their room, and that they then agreed to do what they later did do.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Suit by Albert Vail, as administrator of the estate of Annie H. Vail, deceased, against G. H. Jones and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Modified.

Crouch & Sanders, of San Diego, for appellant.

Herbert C. Kelly, of San Diego, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. One of the purposes of the suit upon which the appeal herein is predicated was to vacate a judgment rendered in a former action in which title was quieted as to certain real property. Primarily the basis for the vacation of such judgment was that the complaint and the copy of the summons therein were never served on Annie H. Vail, who was one of the defendants in the action. In that regard the judgment contains the recital that each of the defendants therein (including Annie H. Vail) had been "duly, regularly and personally served with process. * * *"

In the instant case, with reference to the issue as to whether service of process in the former action had been made on Annie H. Vail, the trial court found that "in truth and in fact the said A. A. Crosbie did not serve the said Annie H. Vail with the said summons or with a copy thereof, or with the said complaint or with a copy thereof, on the said 25th day of July, 1923, or at any other time; that it is not true that the said Annie H. Vail was never served with said summons or with the said complaint by any other person. * * * The court finds that said Annie H. Vail was in fact served with summons attached to a copy of the complaint in said action. * * *"

The evidence relating to such finding showed that, although process was never served on Annie H. Vail, personally, a copy of the complaint and the summons in the action had been left by the constable with the son and the daughter of Annie H. Vail at the home occupied by all of them as one household, and that each of such persons had made statements which tended to show that a copy of the summons and the complaint in question in some manner had come into the personal possession of Annie H. Vail and that she was fully informed of the fact that "an action had been started to quiet title." No evidence was introduced to the effect that in rendering judgment in the former suit the trial court had before it any affidavit of service of the summons and the complaint therein other than the erroneous, but unintentionally false, affidavit of the constable that he had served the required process on Annie H. Vail personally.

[1] At the outset, it should be noted that by the provisions of section 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure a "summons must be served by delivering a copy thereof * * * to the defendant personally," and that unless made by the sheriff, proof of the service of summons and complaint must be by the affidavit of the person making it. Section 415, Code Civ. Proc. Section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "in case the complaint is not answered by any defendant, the summons, with the affidavit or proof of service" shall constitute a part of the judgment roll. Although, as illustrated in the case of Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, 407 (94 Am. Dec. 742), the fact that service was not made by the constable is merely argumentative of the conclusion that service was not made by some other person, and the recital in the judgment that the defendant "was in fact served with the summons attached to the complaint in said action" is presumptive of service in accordance with statutory requirements (In re Eichhoff, 101 Cal. 600, 36 P. 11; Crouch v. H. L. Miller & Co., 169 Cal. 341, 146 P. 880; Bank of Commerce & Trust Co. v. Kenney, 175 Cal. 59, 165 P. 8), nevertheless, in consideration of the provisions of the statutes to which reference has been had herein, this court is constrained to hold that, inasmuch as the record herein purports to disclose the entire evidence upon which the recital in the judgment was based and that such evidence is insufficient to support the finding of due and legal service, the presumption which ordinarily would obtain must be disregarded. Houghton v. Tibbets, 126 Cal. 57, 58 P. 318; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 P. 220; County of Yolo v. Knight, 70 Cal. 431, 11 P. 662; 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 130, and cases there cited.

In the case of Houghton v. Tibbets, 126 Cal. 57, 60, 58 P. 318, 319, it is said: "* * * But respondent contends that if there is no evidence of service upon Curtis except as found in the judgment we must, in support thereof, presume that he was duly served. The point is, that if there is no evidence of service upon William T. Curtis, the recital in the judgment that he was served is sufficient to confer jurisdiction. This we understand to be the rule upon collateral attack (Freeman on Judgments, sec. 130, and cases cited); but when from the whole record it appears even upon such attack to be untrue, or when the record discloses the evidence upon which the recital was based, and such evidence overthrows rather than supports the recital, the recital in the judgment will be disregarded. * * *"

The complaint in the action which resulted in this appeal contained two causes of action. The first of such causes of action, as hereinbefore stated, was for the purpose of vacating a former judgment which assumed to quiet title of the defendants herein to certain real property; and the second of which causes of action sought to quiet the title of plaintiff herein in the same property. In the second cause of action several of the allegations contained in the first cause of action were adopted by reference only—among which was an allegation to the effect that defendants claimed to be the holders of the legal title to the property alleged to have been acquired by them by virtue of the judgment rendered in the former action, which judgment was predicated upon a false return of service of the complaint and summons in that action.

[2] Respondents raise the question of the sufficiency of plaintiff's pleading, and contend, first, that a complaint to quiet title cannot be maintained by one who is out of possession, but who is the holder of the equitable title, as against one who is in possession and who is the holder of the legal title. Although it may be conceded that in ordinary circumstances the rule is as stated by respondents, at the same time it is apparent that, if by the allegations of the complaint it appears that the asserted legal title in the defendants in effect was fraudulently obtained through the medium of a void judgment rendered in another action, and that in fact they have no title whatsoever, either legal or equitable, the general rule should have no application. It is only because of the asserted or assumed validity of the title in the defendants that the real owner of the title seeks redress. By his pleading, he does not admit any title whatsoever in the defendants. To the contrary, he denies their title, and asserts title in himself. There is no middle ground. Either plaintiff has no title of any sort, or he is the absolute owner of the property. If, as an ultimate deduction or inference from the allegations contained in the complaint, the utter invalidity of the apparent legal title in the defendants appears, the real spirit and intent of the rule here suggested by the respondents is not violated.

[3] With reference to the contention on the part of plaintiff that the judgment was founded on a false affidavit of service of summons and a copy of the complaint therein, the record shows that the complaint contained the allegation: "That in truth and in fact the said A. A. Crosbie did not serve the said Annie H. Vail with the said summons, or with a copy thereof, or with the said complaint, or with a copy thereof, on the said 25th day of July, 1923, or at any other time, nor was the said

Annie H. Vail ever served with the said summons, or with the said complaint, by any other person, or in any other manner, and at the time of her death, as aforesaid, she did not have, nor at any time prior thereto did she have, any notice of, or knowledge of, the commencement of the said action, or of any of the other proceedings thereafter therein had and taken."

Referring to such allegation, respondents urge the point that it constituted but a conclusion of law (Lindley v. Lindley, 49 Cal. App. 631, 194 P. 85), and consequently failed to state the essential facts as a basis for the complaint. Considered from a standpoint of what constitutes an example of perfect pleading, it is possible that the position assumed by respondents is correct; but also considering the rule that the plaintiff is required to state his case in "ordinary and concise language" (sec. 426, Code Civ. Proc.), which must receive a liberal construction (sec. 452, Code Civ. Proc.), and also remembering that which appears from the remainder of the record in the case, to wit, that the issue thus presented by plaintiff was fully understood by defendants and the evidence in their behalf relating thereto exhaustively presented by them, it is clear that in any event no prejudice of any sort resulted to defendants by reason of the defect in question.

[4, 5] Further objection by respondents to the complaint herein is that relief should have been sought by plaintiff by way of motion under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, rather than by a suit in equity; and that in any event, because more than one year elapsed between the date of the judgment in the suit in which the title of defendants herein purportedly was quieted in the property in question and the date when the instant action was commenced, plaintiff should not be permitted to maintain it. That in the instant case neither of such positions is well taken, see: Ex-Mission L. & W. Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610, 32 P. 600; Baker v. O'Riordan, 65 Cal. 368, 4 P. 232; Wickersham v. Comerford, 96 Cal. 433, 31 P. 358; California B. S. Co. v. Porter, 68 Cal. 370, 9 P. 313; Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 P. 317; Victor Oil Co. v. Drum, 184 Cal. 226, 193 P. 243; Estudillo v. Security Loan, etc., Co., 149 Cal. 556, 87 P. 19; Hawley v. State Assurance Co., 28 Cal. App. 41, 151 P. 153; Holmes v. O'Brien, 28 Cal. App. 264, 151 P. 1151; Altpeter v. Postal Tel.-Cable Co., 25 Cal. App. 255, 143 P. 93; Swallow v. Tungsten Products Co. (Cal. Sup.) 270 P. 366; Vaughn v. Pine Creek Tungsten Co. (Cal. App.) 265 P. 491.

[6] Respondents urge that the complaint was also defective in that it contained no allegation regarding the ability of plaintiff to make proof of the facts alleged or the means by which such proof was to be established; and cite certain cases as authority therefor. Although in proper circumstances, especially as pointed out in the authorities to which reference is had, where actual fraud is the basis of the action, good pleading may require a compliance with the condition here demanded by respondents, nevertheless it should be remembered that the instant action is not founded on actual fraud of one of the parties against the other, but rather arises from an alleged want of jurisdiction in the court to render the judgment because of noncompliance by the plaintiff in the former action with a statutory regulation regarding the manner of bringing his opponent into court. In effect the complaint herein contained the essential allegation that the plaintiff in the former action had failed to serve the defendant in that action with a summons and a copy of the complaint. No claim is made that defendants herein were in any wise misled by such a statement, and the record herein abundantly testifies to the fact that the case went to trial largely on that issue. In the circumstances, regardless of the true rule of pleading, it is apparent that no harm ensued so far as defendants were concerned. It is well established that error must be shown to have resulted in prejudice before it may be considered a reason for the reversal of a judgment. (Section 4½, art. 6, Const.)

[7] Respondents also suggest the rule that an action of the character of that here involved will not lie on behalf of a successor in interest of the person against whom the former judgment was rendered; and their brief contains many well-considered authorities in apparent support thereof. None of them, however, was a parallel of this action so far as concerns the parties to the litigation. In each of them the plaintiff was a stranger to the original proceeding, and in the action to have it vacated he appeared merely as a grantee or assignee of the defendant in the former action. In the instant case the defendant in the former action is deceased and the plaintiff herein appears as her administrator. Such distinction is commented upon and extensively treated in the case of Collins v. O'Laverty, 136 Cal. 31, 68 P. 327, where in principle it is held that an action of the character of that here involved may be maintained. To the same effect is the case of Rianda v. Watsonville W. & L. Co., 152 Cal. 523, 93 P. 79, where, however, owing to the particular circumstances surrounding the controversy, it was held that the action could not be maintained. See, also, Sec. 1582, Code Civ. Proc.; Rice v. Carey, 170 Cal. 748, 151 P. 135; Pennie v. Hildreth, 81 Cal. 127, 22 P. 398; Doherty v. Courtney, 150 Cal. 606, 89 P. 434. It is therefore concluded that respondents' objection to the complaint is not well taken.

[8] But assuming that the allegations in the complaint in the instant case were sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants, respondents advance the point that on the trial thereof plaintiff failed to show that title was ever lodged in the deceased Annie H. Vail as to 100 acres of the 343 acres involved in the controversy; and that as to the remainder she was legally possessed of an undivided five-sixths interest therein only. As to the first of such contentions, namely, that which affected the specified 100 acres, it appeared that the husband of Mrs. Annie H. Vail, under whom she claimed title, had acquired the property (which at that time consisted of an inchoate interest in public land) by quitclaim deed which had been executed and delivered by the grantor prior to the time that patent to the land was issued to him by the United States government. In such circumstances the weight of authority in this state is to the effect that on the issuance of the patent to the grantor the title thereby acquired relates back so as to confirm title in the grantee. 9 Cal. Jur. 278, 279; Touchard v. Crow, 20 Cal. 150, 81 Am. Dec. 108; Crane v. Salmon, 41 Cal. 63; Schmitt v. Giovanari, 43 Cal. 617; Thompson v. Spencer, 50 Cal. 532; Watkins v. Lynch, 71 Cal. 21, 11 P. 808; Wholey v. Cavanaugh, 88 Cal. 132, 25 P. 1112; Walsh v. Abbott, 145 Cal. 285, 78 P. 715, 104 Am. St. Rep. 38.

[9, 10] Among the "findings of fact" made by the trial court in the instant action was one "that plaintiff in this action does not come into court with clean hands"; which decision is relied upon by respondents as a determination of a question of fact which is binding and conclusive upon this court. Without setting forth herein the evidence in the case, it may suffice to state that the finding under consideration depended generally upon evidence relating to the situation hereinbefore outlined, to wit: That plaintiff was present at the time process was inadvertently served on the sister of plaintiff, who was a daughter of Mrs. Annie H. Vail, and that at no time did he make any attempt to inform the plaintiff in that action of the mistake which had been made by the person who erroneously made the affidavit of service. It will be remembered that by further finding of the trial court it is made plain that at the time when the service of process was attempted to be made on Mrs. Vail no actual service was made upon her. That decision involved one of the principal issues in the case, and the determination thereof was made in accordance with and reliance upon the testimony given by plaintiff. The fact that plaintiff made no effort to correct the error into which the serving officer had fallen is clearly insufficient evidence upon which to base a finding of "unclean hands." Nor would the further fact, as respondents claim, that as to other matters plaintiff gave untrue testimony on the trial of the case, present a situation which would justify the conclusion that by reason of the falsity of his individual testimony in that regard (which fact is not established by the findings) the estate which plaintiff represented as administrator thereof should be made to suffer therefor. Incontestably the record discloses the fact that plaintiff is acting solely in a representative capacity and his personal shortcomings should not prejudice the rights of heirs or possible creditors of the estate. This court is therefore unable to concur in the conclusion that the "unclean hands" of plaintiff should present an insuperable obstacle to a correct determination of the dependent issues in the case.

As a general answer to each of the objections both now and heretofore interposed by defendants as affects the complaint as well as the appeal herein, it is manifest that, if it be concluded that in equity defendants have no title to the property involved in the action, no substantial right of defendants in the premises is in any wise prejudiced by reason of either or any or all of the conditions of which they complain.

[11] Assuming the correctness of the foregoing conclusions, ordinarily it would follow that the judgment in the former action to which reference has been had should be vacated. However, by the parties to this litigation it seems to be conceded law that in an action of the character of that here under consideration, in addition to a showing that process was not served upon the defendant Annie H. Vail in the former action, before relief may be obtained in this action from the consequences of the former judgment the burden devolves upon the plaintiff herein to establish that he has suffered a real and substantial injury therefrom; in other words, that Annie H. Vail had a good defense to the action in question, and that, if in truth and reality she had been served with process therein, she would have maintained such defense, and thereby and therefrom no judgment would have been rendered against her. In accordance with such understanding of the law (as to which this court finds it unnecessary to express an opinion), on the trial in the lower court of the instant action, among other things, plaintiff endeavored to establish the invalidity of the title of the plaintiff in the former action, which primarily rested upon a sale by the state of the property involved in the action on account and by reason of the failure of plaintiff's predecessor in interest to pay the taxes levied thereon. In that connection plaintiff has specified numerous alleged defects, of which but one will receive consideration by this court. It has to do with one of the items which goes to make up the total amount chargeable against a given piece of property on a sale for the nonpayment of delinquent taxes. The property which is the subject-matter of the instant action consisted of one entire, compact parcel of land of approximately 343 acres. In levying the assessment, instead of describing the land as one parcel, it was described by the assessor as of four parcels. In connection with a sale of property for failure to pay the taxes levied thereon, section 3770 of the Political Code provides that: "The tax-collector must collect, in addition to the taxes due on the delinquent-list, together with the penalties for delinquency, fifty cents on each lot, piece, or tract of land separately assessed. * * *" The ultimate question presented by appellant is whether under the law, although the property consisted of but one entire parcel of land, the tax collector was authorized to add 50 cents to each of the four separate parcels described by the assessor on the assessment roll. If in the exercise of an authority not lawfully possessed by him the property of plaintiff was charged with an amount of money not legally chargeable against it and the property was sold for an amount including such illegal charge, it is clear that the sale was void.

By section 4125 of the Political Code the assessor is charged with the performance of such duties as are elsewhere prescribed in the Political Code. Section 3628 of the Political Code requires that "* * * land shall be assessed in parcels, or subdivisions, not exceeding six hundred forty acres each, * * *"; and by section 3650 of the Political Code it is provided that: "The assessor must prepare an assessment-book, * * * in which must be listed all property within the county, and which shall show under the appropriate head: * * * Land, by township, range, section, or fractional section; and when such land is not a congressional division or subdivision, by metes and bounds, or other description sufficient to identify it, giving an estimate of the number of acres, not exceeding in any tract six hundred forty acres. * * *"

In the case of Cooper v. Miller, 113 Cal. 238, 45 P. 325, one of the questions involved therein was the authority of the county assessor to unite and assess as one parcel five separate but adjoining lots on which a livery stable was situated. Following the case of People v. Morse, 43 Cal. 534, in which a similar question was before the court, it was held that such a course was within the authority of the assessor. To the same effect is Houghton v. Kern Valley Bank, 157 Cal. 289, 107 P. 113. In the case first cited, in deciding the particular point to which reference has been had, in part the Supreme Court said: "* * * In People v. Morse, 43 Cal. 534, it was held that an entire block or a half block owned by a single individual might be assessed in one parcel, and this notwithstanding the blocks were divided into lots, and in sound reason there is no more cause for assessing a block of land owned by one party in lots, than there is in assessing a section of land owned by a single individual in eighty or one hundred and sixty acre tracts. * * *" It is apparent that the court might have carried its illustration farther by saying that no more cause existed for making a separate assessment of each of the lots in a block owned by one person than for assessing a section of land of 640 acres owned by a single individual in 640 one-acre lots. Perhaps the absurdity of the situation would have been heightened if, instead of contrasting the uniting of all the lots in a block into one assessment with a section of land arbitrarily divided by the assessor into 640 one-acre lots and so assessed by him, the court had suggested the possibility of the illegal division by the assessor of a 50-foot city lot into 50 one-foot strips and the levying of his assessment in accordance therewith. It is apparent that under such a void assessment of the 50-foot lot, assuming that the owner thereof should fail to pay the taxes thereon, and the tax collector should advertise the lot for sale as a whole, in addition to the several penalties imposed by law, 50 separate charges of 50 cents each would be added to the sum for which the lot would have to be sold.

As hereinbefore stated, in the instant case the 343 acres which forms the subject-matter of the action consisted of one entire, compact parcel, which was readily describable as such. For some undisclosed reason the assessment thereof was entered as of four separate parcels. On the failure of the owner to pay the taxes levied thereon within the time allowed by statute, the necessary statutory steps were taken by the state to sell the property. In so doing, and as a part of the statutory procedure, the property was advertised in a so-called delinquent or addenda tax list. Having been divided by the assessor into four separate parcels and so "assessed" by him, in accordance with the provisions of section 3770 of the Political Code, the tax collector added to the regular charges and penalties for the delinquency of the owner in paying the taxes, fifty cents to each of the four parcels into which the 343 acres had been divided. However, in advertising the property for sale, instead of describing it therein as four separate parcels of land, as to each of which theretofore had been added the various statutory charges and penalties, the 343 acres were described as a single parcel of land, and the several amounts so charged against each of the four parcels into which the 343 acres had been divided by the assessor were aggregated into one total sum and represented as one gross amount chargeable as against the entire tract. It is manifest that the property owner was substantially prejudiced by such procedure. In the first place, his property having consisted of a single parcel of land, he was entitled to have it so assessed, and, if he failed to pay the taxes levied thereon, neither the tax collector nor any other officer had authority to place penalties and charges against it not provided by law. In the second place, assuming that the charges and penalties made against each of the four parcels into which the land had been arbitrarily divided by the assessor were authorized by statute, then certainly the tax collector thereafter had no right to combine the four parcels so as to make one single parcel and advertise it for sale as such.

On the opening of the trial of the case in the lower court, plaintiff submitted to defendants and filed in court his "offer to do equity," which consisted of an offer to pay defendants for a release of all their claim upon the real property described in the complaint, the amount paid by them to the county tax collector for the purchase of said property at the sale thereof by the state, also all amounts paid for taxes thereon subsequent to the said sale, together with all amounts by them expended in or about the said property, with 7 per cent. interest upon each of said sums, and for such other amounts as the court might find the defendants entitled to.

As from the record herein it appears that at the time the instant action was commenced defendant G. H. Jones was the owner of an undivided one-sixth interest in the property described in the complaint, the conclusion of this court is that the judgment herein should be modified so that the title as to an undivided five-sixths interest in the property described in the complaint should be quieted in plaintiff, subject to the condition that on the going down of the remittitur herein, evidence be taken by the trial court as to the amount of defendants' expenditures, with interest thereon, included in plaintiff's "offer to do equity," as shown on page 44 of the transcript on appeal; which total sum, after deducting therefrom plaintiff's costs in the lower court as well as on appeal, with like interest thereon, should be secured by a lien on the premises in controversy. It is so ordered; and it is further ordered and directed that the findings of fact made by the lower court be amended so as to accord with the conclusions herein indicated.

GENERAL ACCEPTANCE CORPORATION OF CALIFORNIA v. ROBINSON.

Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1929.

Contracts ⚷127(4)—Agreement between parties to contract as to place of trial held void and not binding on guarantor (Code Civ. Proc. § 395 et seq.).

Agreement between parties to contract that action thereon should be brought in a particular county, which was contrary to Code Civ. Proc. § 395 et seq., relating to place of trial of civil actions, was void and not binding on guarantor of contract, who was entitled to be sued in county of his residence.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Francisco County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by the General Acceptance Corporation of California against E. C. Robinson. From an order granting defendant's motion for change of venue, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arnold C. Lackenbach, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Breed, Burpee & Robinson, of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from an order granting a change of place of trial from the city and county of San Francisco, where the action was brought, to the county of Alameda, the residence of the defendant herein. The action was one to recover upon an alleged contract of guaranty claimed to have been made by the defendant in the course of a certain transaction involving the sale or agreement to sell certain automobiles and the transfer of such agreement from the seller thereof to the plaintiff herein. The contract for such transfer was made and entered into by the Auburn Motor Sales Company, seller, and contained certain agreements by which the seller undertook to assure to the transferee of said contract the bona fides thereof and the ability of the purchaser under said agreement to fulfill the terms thereof. The obligation of the seller under such agreement was therein declared to be an absolute and unconditional one as distinguished from that of a surety, guarantor, or indemnifier, and it was agreed therein that said obligation should be enforceable, even though the purchaser's obligation under the original agreement for the sale of said automobiles should for any reason be suspended or impaired. The seller's agreement contained the final provision "that should suit be brought upon the contract or this assignment, that the trial of said action be in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California." The defendant had placed his name at the foot of said contract as "E. C. Robinson, guarantor."

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

The original contract not having been performed, and the Auburn Motor Sales Company not having fulfilled the aforesaid obligation on its part to be performed, this action was commenced in the city and county of San Francisco against the defendant as such guarantor for the recovery in several counts of sums aggregating the sum of $4,534.71, claimed to be due to the plaintiff for the breach of the aforesaid agreement. The defendant, upon being served, appeared by demurrer, and, at the time of such appearance, duly demanded that the place of trial of said action be changed to the county of Alameda, and, upon such demand, gave notice of motion in due form for the change of such place of trial, supporting the same by a proper affidavit to the effect that the place of residence of the defendant was at all the times mentioned in said complaint in the county of Alameda. He also presented and filed in due form an affidavit of merits. It is not contended by the appellant that there was any defect in the form or substance of the defendant's moving papers upon said motion, and the sole ground on which the same was resisted upon the hearing thereon was that under the terms of said agreement and of the defendant's guaranty thereof it had been agreed that the place of trial of any action brought thereon should be in the city and county of San Francisco. The trial court granted the motion for a change of place of trial, and from the order made in that regard the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The sole question presented upon this appeal is that under said agreement and the guaranty thereof the defendant had entered into a binding agreement that the place for the commencement and trial of said action should be the city and county of San Francisco, and not elsewhere, and that the order of the trial court granting the defendant's motion for change of place of trial was void as in violation of the terms of said agreement.

On behalf of the respondent it is urged, first, that under the peculiar wording of the terms of the agreement it must be held that the guarantor's obligation was not to be extended so as to cover that portion thereof which related to the place for the commencement and trial of any action instituted for the enforcement of the seller's said agreement; and, second, that, even if it should be determined that the defendant's guaranty is so far inclusive as to embrace the aforesaid condition in the agreement, it is ineffectual, for the reason that any agreement between the parties thereto as to the place of trial of actions to be brought thereon is void as in violation of the provisions of law with respect to the place for the institution and trial of civil actions. We shall first consider the respondent's second contention, for the reason that, if we shall conclude to uphold the same, it will become immaterial and unnecessary to consider and decide his first contention.

The appellant places its main reliance upon the case of State ex rel., etc., v. Superior Court of King County, 61 Wash. 681, 112 P. 927, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 814, wherein the Supreme Court of that state upholds the view that parties to an agreement may properly stipulate therein as to where any action may be brought thereon, or for the violation thereof, and that the courts will uphold and enforce such agreements. On the other hand, the respondent directs our attention to the fact that the aforesaid decision of the Supreme Court of the state of Washington is based upon an express provision of the statutes of that state relating to the place of trial of civil actions, to the effect that the parties to said actions may by stipulation in writing agree as to the place of trial thereof (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 216), and that, in so far as the laws of California are concerned relating to the same subject, there is no such statutory provision. The respondent further proceeds to show that the precise question presented upon this appeal was decided adversely to the appellant's contention in the case of General Motors Acceptance Corporation v. Codiga, 62 Cal. App. 117, 216 P. 383, wherein that court not only gave express and careful consideration to the state of our California Code provisions (section 395 et seq., Code Civ. Proc.), relating to the place of trial of civil actions, but also, expressly considered the scope and application of the aforesaid Washington decision to the state of the law in California governing the place of trial of civil actions. The respondent further directs our attention to the case of McCarty v. Herrick, 41 Idaho, 529, 240 P. 192, wherein the Supreme Court of Idaho, construing the statutes of that state, which are substantially identical to the like provisions in our California Code, held that the Washington case was not to be given application, for the reason above set forth. Respondent further refers to the cases of Rabinowitz v. Lipschitz (Sup.) 127 N. Y. S. 486; Nashua River Paper Co. v. Hammermill, 223 Mass. 8, 111 N. E. 678, L. R. A. 1916D, 691; Stoddard v. Stoddard, 187 App. Div. 258, 175 N. Y. S. 636, and Christensen v. Morse Dry Dock, etc., Co., 216 App. Div. 274, 214 N. Y. S. 732, 741, in each of which last-named cases the respective courts deciding the same held that contracts relating to the place of trial of civil actions for the enforcement of contracts made by the parties thereto were void. In so doing each of said courts referred to the case of Benson v. Eastern Building & Loan Association, 174 N. Y. 83, 66 N. E. 627; Id., 67 App. Div. 319, 74 N. Y. S. 507, upon which the appellant herein also relies, and distinguishes said case upon the facts thereof, and in so doing directs attention to the fact that the Benson Case is authority for the general statement that "jurisdiction of the court is beyond the agreement of the parties." See Christensen v. Morse Dry Dock, etc., Co., supra. The case of Nute v. Hamilton Ins. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 174, is quite in point. In that case a clause in an insurance contract requiring any action thereon to be commenced in a particular county was held to be invalid as in violation of the provisions of the Massachusetts statutes determining in what court and county actions may be brought. In so declaring, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts aptly said: "The rules to determine in what courts and counties actions may be brought are fixed, upon considerations of general convenience and expediency, by general law; to allow them to be changed by the agreement of parties would disturb the symmetry of the law, and interfere with such convenience. Such contracts might be induced by considerations tending to bring the administration of justice into disrepute." We are satisfied that the foregoing authorities cited by the respondent herein sufficiently sustain his second contention to the effect that the agreement between the parties to the contract upon which this action was brought was void, and hence that the defendant, as the guarantor of the contract, was not to be held bound thereby, even though it should be determined that otherwise his agreement to guarantee was broad enough to cover and include that particular clause in the contract. Having reached this conclusion, it becomes immaterial to this inquiry to further construe the terms of said contract.

It follows that the order granting the change of place of trial to the county of Alameda should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: SHENK, J.; PRESTON, J.; LANGDON, J.; CURTIS, J.; SEAWELL, J.

PEOPLE v. ROWLAND. (Cr. 3209.)

Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1929.

1. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal of instruction covered by instructions given held not error.

Refusal to give self-defense instruction requested by defendant in prosecution for murder held not error, where court fully instructed jury and embodied in one of its own instructions not only substance, but much of language, of instruction refused.

2. Criminal law 🔑1171(3)—In prosecution for murder of convict confined in state prison at Folsom, argument respecting conditions at such prison which were common knowledge throughout state held not prejudicial.

In prosecution for murder of convict confined in state prison at Folsom, district attorney's argument directed to condition existing in such prison, being in nature of comments on what was common knowledge throughout state, held not prejudicial error, since every juror was familiar with situation, especially where no objection or specifications of error were made at time and no exceptions taken to remarks.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Paul Rowland was convicted of murder in the first degree with sentence of death, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Mark L. Burns, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, C. J. The defendant, a convict confined in the state prison at Folsom, was indicted, tried, and convicted of murder of the first degree for the killing of Elgar Morrison, a fellow prisoner. The jury made no recommendation as to the penalty. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and the defendant has appealed from the judgment imposing the sentence of death and from the order denying his motion.

The defendant and the deceased worked together in and about the prison grounds. Rowland claimed that Morrison borrowed tobacco from him which he did not return. While the prisoners were at liberty in the prison yard on the morning of October 15, 1928, Rowland approached Morrison and stabbed him with a knife or stiletto, causing the death of Morrison a short time thereafter. Rowland's defense was that he did not intend to kill Morrison, but cut him with the knife in self-defense. There was ample evidence of a number of eyewitnesses establishing beyond any doubt that the killing was premeditated and unprovoked murder.

The appellant claims there were discrepancies in the testimony of the witnesses for the people, who were, for the greater part, attendants and prisoners at Folsom, but he fails to point them out. We discover nothing of importance in that behalf.

[1] Appellant presents another point, asserted error in refusing to give all the instructions requested by the defense; but he specifies but one—an instruction in regard to self-defense, based on the language of the District Court of Appeal in People v. Vernon, 71 Cal. App. 628, 235 P. 737. The court did, however, fully instruct the jury, and, on the subject of self-defense, it embodied in one of its own instructions not only the substance, but much of the language, of the one refused.

[2] Complaint is made that in several instances the district attorney's oral argument to the jury as to the verdict which should be rendered was prejudicial to the defendant. The objectionable remarks were aside the record, but were directed to conditions existing in the state prison at Folsom, where the murder was committed, and were in the nature of comments on what was common knowledge throughout the state of California at the time of the trial of this defendant. It is almost inconceivable that every juror was not familiar with the situation at the prison at that time. No objections or specifications of error were made at the time, and no exceptions were taken to the remarks.

We have carefully considered the cause on appeal and the record in the court below. The jury disbelieved the story told by the appellant, and he stands convicted of a vicious murder by an abundance of testimony given by eyewitnesses to the affray.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are, and each is, affirmed.

BRYANT v. BOYLE, Auditor. (S. F. 13413.)

Supreme Court of California. May 27, 1929.

Municipal corporations ⚷886—Money for recreation centers held payable from general fund, without recourse to regular parks' appropriation (San Francisco City Charter, art. 14A, § 10, and amendment; art. 14, § 11; art. 3, c. 1, § 11).

Money necessary for construction and maintenance of recreation centers by park commissioners, as required by amendment to San Francisco City Charter, art. 14A, without requiring supervisors to provide funds therefor, as for maintenance of parks and playgrounds under section 10, held payable from general fund, without recourse to regular parks' appropriation, which cannot exceed 10-cent tax limit fixed by article 14, § 11; article 3, c. 1, § 11, limiting tax rate to $1 per $100 valuation of property assessed, applying.

In Bank.

Application by J. A. Bryant for a writ of mandate to Thomas F. Boyle, Auditor of the City and County of San Francisco. Writ granted.

William F. Humphrey and A. T. O'Connell, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Frank L. Fenton, of San Francisco, for respondent.

H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ, for petitioner and in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. This matter comes before us upon an alternative writ of mandate directed to the auditor of the city and county of San Francisco requiring him to audit and approve a demand of petitioner or show cause for his refusal to do so.

Petitioner alleges that, pursuant to a contract between himself and the board of park commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, he did certain work in enlarging and improving Kezar Stadium, and under the terms of his contract the sum of $7,640 is due and owing to him; that a demand has been made therefor against the general fund, which demand was approved by the board of park commissioners, by the board of supervisors, and by the mayor of the city and county of San Francisco, and the defendant auditor refused to approve the same, on the ground that the budget appropriation of $250,000 for the construction and completion of said Kezar Stadium was in excess of the 10-cent tax limit fixed by section 11 of article 14 of the charter for moneys to be expended by the park commissioners for the maintenance, preservation, and improvement of parks, squares, avenues, and grounds, and that payment of the demand on this fund was unlawful. This presents the only question involved in the proceeding.

By article 14 of the charter, the park commissioners are given the exclusive management and control of the parks, squares, and public pleasure grounds and the exclusive right to erect and superintend the erection of buildings and structures thereon, and while the money necessary for the maintenance, preservation, and improvement of the parks, squares, avenues, and grounds is provided by section 11, there is no charter provision for money for the erection of buildings and structures.

Article 14A gives the playground commissioners jurisdiction over the children's playgrounds and similar public recreation centers in the city and county of San Francisco, and by section 10 of that article the supervisors are required to provide money for the development, equipment, and maintenance of such playgrounds and recreation centers.

By an amendment added at the end of article 14A, but without being numbered as a section, the recreation centers known as "the Aquatic Park," situate adjacent to Ft. Mason; "Fleishhacker Pool and Playfield," situate south of Sloat boulevard and adjacent to the Pacific Ocean; the "Municipal Golf Links," situate in the Lake Merced lands; and "The Stadium," opposite the Polytechnic high school, together with such land now acquired or hereafter acquired by the city and county adjacent to said centers which the supervisors shall designate, shall be under the exclusive control and management of the park commissioners. There is no provision in the charter requiring the supervisors to provide funds for the maintenance and development of these recreation centers. The people of San Francisco placed them under the control of the park commissioners and required their maintenance and development, but did not create a specific charter fund like the one created for the parks and playgrounds, and therefore, there being no other fund created or provided, the maintenance and development of these recreation centers must be paid for from the general fund. This construction has been placed upon this provision of the charter by the officials of the city and county.

We think that, since the voters sought to charge the park commissioners with the construction and maintenance of recreation centers which are outside of the ordinary park activities, it must be held that the voters, by necessary implication, intended that the park commissioners should receive the money necessary to carry on the additional work without recourse to its regular appropriation for the operating expenses of the parks. Unless it be held that recreation centers separately constructed and placed under the jurisdiction of the park commissioners by the voters by an amendment to article 14A can be provided for under separate appropriation, the entire plan of the people in creating these centers by charter amendment must fail and the will and desire of the voters and taxpayers be defeated for lack of necessary funds to build and maintain these centers. Article 3, c. 1, § 11, of the charter, limiting the annual maximum tax rate, except for the purposes therein mentioned, to $1 on each $100 valuation of the property assessed, furnishes a guaranty against extravagance in such appropriations from the general fund.

Let the writ of mandate issue as prayed.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Benito County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Actions by Francis W. Shields and wife and by Francis W. Shields alone against C. S. King. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. Dale Thomson and J. Hampton Hoge, both of San Francisco, and A. M. Runnells, of Hollister, for appellant.

James Snell, of Hollister, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. The judgment entered in each of the above-entitled cases is hereby affirmed. The reasons impelling this conclusion are properly set forth in one opinion as by stipulation of the parties, the actions were tried together before a jury, and both appeals by defendant argued in a single set of briefs.

On November 22, 1926, by reason of an accident which resulted from defendant's alleged negligence and failure to use ordinary care in the operation of his automobile, plaintiff Bertha A. Shields received severe personal injuries, for which by said first case, S. F. 13012, she and her husband seek to recover damages; the second action, S. F. 13013, is for consequential damages suffered by the husband. The jury in cause S. F. No. 13012 returned a verdict upon which judgment was entered for plaintiffs in the sum of $6,000, and in cause S. F. 13013, returned a verdict upon which judgment was entered for plaintiff in the sum of $800. Defendant has appealed from both judgments, urging as his sole ground for reversal thereof that the undisputed facts established by the evidence show that plaintiff Bertha A. Shields was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The word "plaintiff" where hereinafter used will refer to the plaintiff Bertha A. Shields. The following is a brief résumé of the facts:

On the date above mentioned said plaintiff, a woman of approximately 60 years of age, was en route by automobile from Hollister to Napa, Cal., as the guest of defendant, the husband of her stepdaughter. Defendant's wife and son were also with him on the trip. Defendant was driving; plaintiff occupied one of the back seats. The day was cloudy and rainy. Between San Rafael and Black Point, at a place along the sloughs where the road was wet and slippery, with defendant driving at a good rate of speed, possibly 35 or 40 miles an hour, the car skidded and went over the embankment, thereby rendering plaintiff unconscious and causing the severe and permanent injuries of which she complains. Plaintiff, who was not seated within view of the speedometer, testified that she had no fear of defendant's driving, nor did the speed of the machine seem excessive to her, until the latter part of the trip. Then, although he failed to heed her warning or to slacken his speed, she twice took occasion to caution him, saying the first time, "Clement, don't drive so fast on the wet pavement;" and again saying about ten minutes later, and but a short time before the accident, "Clement, don't drive so fast; we had better be out longer than not to get home at all."

[1] It is principally upon the testimony just quoted that defendant bases his contention that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in that he claims it is apparent that she had ample opportunity to insist that the automobile be stopped and to alight therefrom; that in failing so to do, and in remaining upon the ride, she assumed the risk of defendant's continued carelessness and was thus guilty of individual contributory negligence as a matter of law.

We cannot subscribe to this construction of the evidence. We do not believe that it was incumbent upon this elderly woman, even granting that the driver might have acceded to a request from her that he stop the machine, to alight therefrom alone upon a rainy highway at an isolated point, leaving to chance the possibility of reaching shelter or her destination by some other conveyance, in order to hold herself free from the charge of contributory negligence.

[2-4] Numberless cases in this and other jurisdictions, recognizing that the negligence of the person operating a vehicle is not imputed to his passenger, uphold the doctrine here applicable, that a passenger is bound to exercise ordinary care for his own safety; but whether or not he has exercised such care is a question of fact, which, unless the evidence is all one way, must be submitted to a jury, and their determination thereof is conclusive. Parmenter v. McDougall, 172 Cal. 306, 309, 156 P. 460, and many cases there cited; Nichols v. Pac. Elec. Ry., 178 Cal. 630, 174 P. 319; Fujise v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 12 Cal. App. 207, 107 P. 317; Curran v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., 77 Cal. App. 462, 247 P. 236; Drouillard v. Southern Pac. Co., 36 Cal. App. 447, 450, 172 P. 405; Carpenter v. Atchison, etc., Co., 51 Cal. App. 60, 195 P. 1073; Wyseur v. Davis, 58 Cal. App. 598, 209 P. 213; Marchetti v. Southern Pac. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 529.

[5] In this case, however, we are forced to the even broader statement that, in our opinion, the record contains no showing whatsoever of any contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, but, on the contrary, shows that she acted as any reasonably prudent person would have done, and under the circumstances set forth in the evidence the jury would not have been warranted in finding other than as it did. As stated in Curran v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., supra, at page 471, of 77 Cal. App. (247 P. 239), citing Dowd v. Atlas T. & A. Service Co., 187 Cal. 523, 202 P. 870: "The duty of a passenger to remonstrate against excessive speed or to withdraw from the vehicle, a reasonable opportunity therefor being afforded, is not absolute, the question whether by failing to do either he is wanting in ordinary care being dependent upon the circumstances of the particular case."

The case of Clark v. Traver, 205 App. Div. 206, 200 N. Y. S. 52, relied upon by appellant, recognizes this rule. Plaintiff there, a guest passenger, made a polite protest against the speed of the automobile, but did not quit the car; thereafter defendant slowed down, but even then his speed was so excessive as to almost immediately overturn the machine when rounding a curve in the road. Affirming the judgment for plaintiff, the court said: "We think it was for the jury to say whether there was an acquiescence on the part of the plaintiff in the wrongful conduct of the defendant, and that there is evidence upon which to sustain the finding of the jury that there was no such acquiescence." The case of Sheehan v. Coffey, 205 App. Div. 388, 200 N. Y. S. 55, is likewise in harmony with this holding, although the circumstances there compelled a reversal of the judgment for plaintiff upon the ground that the finding of the jury was against the weight of the evidence and contrary to law and the damages awarded were excessive.

The above reasoning sufficiently supports, without further comment, the conclusion first herein announced.

We concur: CURTIS, J.; LANGDON, J.; SHENK, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.

BENJAMIN v. NOONAN et al. (S. F. 13028.)

Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1929.

1. Automobiles 🔑245(87)—Automobile guest held not contributorily negligent, as matter of law, in not protesting against speed of automobile, nor in seeking to leave car.

Guest injured in collision between automobile in which she was riding and another automobile held not contributorily negligent, as matter of law, in failing to protest against speed of 20 to 30 miles an hour in residence district on a foggy day, or in failing to request that driver either diminish speed or permit her to leave car, where she had never driven an automobile and was not qualified to judge the safety or nonsafety of driving conditions.

2. Automobiles 🔑224(1)—Automobile guest must exercise ordinary care for his safety.

A guest passenger, traveling by automobile, is bound to exercise ordinary care for his own safety.

3. Automobiles 🔑245(87)—Whether automobile guest exercised ordinary care is fact question for jury, unless evidence is all one way.

Whether a guest in automobile has exercised ordinary care for his own safety is a question of fact, which, unless the evidence is all one way, must be submitted to a jury, whose determination is conclusive.

4. Automobiles 🔑171(2)—Instruction that violation of statute limiting speed and regulating operation of automobiles at intersections is negligence as matter of law held correct (Motor Vehicle Act).

Instruction that violation of Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517), providing that vehicles shall be driven at careful, prudent, reasonable, and proper speed, so as not to endanger life, limb, or property, and that it shall be lawful to drive at speed not exceeding 15 miles an hour in traversing intersection where view is obstructed, constitutes negligence as matter of law, held not erroneous, as against contention that such violation of statute is merely evidence of negligence.

5. Automobiles 🔑246(47)—Instructions that automobile driver was negligent if he proceeded at intersection in reckless disregard of obvious danger held warranted under evidence.

In action for injuries to automobile guest in collision at intersection on foggy day, instructions that, even though driver of colliding automobile had right of way at intersection, he had no right to proceed blindly in reckless disregard of obvious danger, but was required to keep machine under such control as would enable him in exercise of ordinary care and skill to avoid a collision, and that, if he failed in these respects, or by use of ordinary care and skill could have stopped his automobile within 15 feet and failed to do so, he was guilty of negligence proximately causing injury to plaintiff, held warranted under evidence.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1033(5)—Instruction that it must reasonably appear that plaintiff's physical condition must continue or grow worse because of injuries before jury could consider such condition in computing damages held favorable to defendants.

Instruction that, even though jury believed plaintiff's physical condition might continue or grow worse as result of her injuries, it had to appear with reasonable certainty that such condition would continue or grow worse before that fact could be considered in computing any verdict in her favor, held favorable to defendants, and they could, therefore, not complain that there was no premise therefor in the evidence.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1067—Refusal of instruction respecting plaintiff's duty to use ordinary care in securing necessary medical aid after injury held not prejudicial error.

Refusal to give defendants' requested instructions respecting plaintiff's duty to use ordinary care in securing and continuing to have all necessary medical aid after her injury, based on charges of plaintiff's negligence in making only some two or more visits to her physician during period of over a year after accident, held not prejudicial error, in view of testimony of her physician and given instruction respecting injured person's duty to submit to treatment prescribed by attending physician and that such person may not by failing to use reasonable care allow damages to be unnecessarily increased.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Aimee Benjamin against John F. Noonan and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert L. McWilliams and Ralph H. Lachmund, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Lasher B. Gallagher, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. In this cause the judgment for plaintiff is affirmed. The action is one to recover damages for personal injuries received as the result of an automobile accident which occurred in San Francisco on August 14, 1926, at about 10:40 p. m., while plaintiff was riding as his guest in the automobile of appellant John F. Noonan. Said appellant, with plaintiff in his car, was driving west on Irving street at a speed varying from 20 to 30 miles an hour; at about the same time appellant Harold Gallagher at the wheel of a Studebaker roadster, accompanied by defendant H. C. Gallagher and another person, was proceeding south on Forty-Eighth avenue at a slow speed, perhaps 15 miles per hour, having stopped just previously to avoid hitting an obstruction in the street. The night was very foggy and the two automobiles collided where Forty-Eighth avenue intersects

Irving street. Plaintiff was thrown from the car and severely injured in the manner hereinafter described. She subsequently commenced this action for damages, including as defendants the drivers of both machines. Trial was had before a jury and a verdict was returned in her favor for the sum of $6,000. Judgment followed, from which both defendants Noonan and Harold Gallagher have appealed, claiming first, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and, second, that the court erred in the giving of certain instructions and the withholding of others requested to be given.

[1-3] The claim of contributory negligence is based upon the argument that, notwithstanding the foggy weather and poor visibility, plaintiff negligently permitted her host to travel the entire distance between Thirteenth and Forty-Eighth avenues, on Irving street, a residential and business district, at a speed ranging from 20 to 30 miles an hour, without the slightest protest, remonstrance, or request that he either diminish his speed or permit her to leave the car, which failure on her part to either so speak or act amounted to contributory negligence as a matter of law and that the court erred in refusing to give a requested instruction bearing upon this point. This claim is urged in the face of plaintiff's undisputed testimony that she had never driven an automobile and was not qualified to judge the safety or nonsafety of driving conditions and that, although she was of a nervous temperament, the speed at which appellant Noonan drove on the night in question did not seem to be excessive or fast enough to arouse any sense of fear in her. It is unnecessary to discuss the point at length. This very situation was before us and received our full consideration in the recent case of Shields v. King (Cal. Sup.) 277 P. 1043, this day decided. Upon that authority, and the cases there cited, and for all the reasons therein set forth, we hold the contention that plaintiff here was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law and that the court erred in refusing to give the instruction mentioned to be wholly without merit. In other words, a guest passenger, traveling by automobile, is bound to exercise ordinary care for his own safety; but whether or not he has exercised such care is a question of fact, which, unless the evidence is all one way, must be submitted to a jury, and their determination thereof is conclusive.

[4] Appellants complain of an instruction given by the court at its own instance which first stated the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 517) to the effect that vehicles shall be driven on the public highways at a careful, prudent, reasonable, and proper speed, so as not to endanger the life, limb, or property of any person and that it shall be lawful to drive at a speed not exceeding 15 miles an hour in traversing an intersection of highways where the view is obstructed, etc., and then charged that a violation thereof constituted negligence as a matter of law. They contend for the distinction that an infraction of said provisions would constitute not negligence per se, but mere evidence of negligence which might or might not amount to proof of negligence.

We find no error in said instruction. As said in Scragg v. Sallee, 24 Cal. App. 133, 144, 140 P. 706, 710: "While it is undoubtedly correct to say that the act of driving a vehicle over a street or public highway beyond the speed limit established by a municipal ordinance or a statute merely constitutes evidence of negligence in cases where damage has followed the infraction of such an ordinance or law, the rule in this state is, however, that it is conclusive evidence of negligence [citing cases]. Therefore, the statement that such an act is 'of itself negligence,' or 'negligence as a matter of law' or 'negligence per se' (equivalent expressions) is, in this state, strictly correct." See, also, Baillargeon v. Myers, 180 Cal. 507, 508, 182 P. 37; Flynn v. Bledsoe Co. (Cal. App.) 267 P. 887; Towne v. Godeau, 70 Cal. App. 148, 232 P. 1010; Greeneich v. Knoll, 73 Cal. App. 1, 238 P. 163. We find nothing in the cases cited by appellants at variance with the rule above set forth.

[5] Appellant Gallagher attacks three instructions which told the jury in effect that, even though he had the right of way at the intersection in question, he had no right to proceed blindly in reckless disregard of obvious danger, but it was his duty to keep his machine under such control as would enable him in the exercise of ordinary care and skill to avoid a collision, and if he failed in these respects, or if by the use of ordinary care and skill he could have stopped his automobile within 15 feet and failed to do so, then he was guilty of negligence proximately causing injury to plaintiff. To our mind the evidence amply warranted instructing the jury as to appellant's duty under the circumstances, which duty was properly limited in all three instructions to the use of ordinary care and skill to avoid an accident. In fact, an instruction almost identical with one of them was approved in Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 201 P. 471. See, also, Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 317, 237 P. 1066; Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 340, 208 P. 125; Hatzakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 197 Cal. 82, 239 P. 709, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1027; Truitner v. Knight, 83 Cal. App. 655, 661, 257 P. 447; Broedlow v. Le Gros (Cal. App.) 263 P. 1027.

[6] Appellant Gallagher further contends that there was no premise in the evidence for the instruction given the jury to the effect that, even though they believed plaintiff's physical condition might continue or grow worse as a result of her injuries, it had to appear with reasonable certainty that such condition would continue or grow worse before that fact could be considered in computing any verdict in her favor. Said appellant should not complain of an instruction which could not have prejudiced him as it was favorable both to himself and his codefendant; moreover, evidence was adduced relating to the possible continuance of after effects resulting from plaintiff's injuries.

[7] We find no prejudicial error on the part of the court in refusing to give certain instructions requested by appellant Noonan with respect to the duty of plaintiff to use ordinary care in securing and continuing to have all necessary medical aid after her injury. The complaint alleged that plaintiff sustained as a result of the accident severe and permanent injuries, to wit, a transverse fracture of the sacrum, concussion of the brain, a contused wound on the left elbow, a scalp wound in the occipital region, wrenching and straining of the back, lacerations, contusions, and abrasions of limbs and body. She was confined to the hospital for several weeks and her physical condition became much improved; however, she had always been of a highly nervous temperament and the experience so heightened her nervousness and fears that she was thereafter subject to more frequent fainting spells than she had ever before had; was practically unable to drive by automobile for any distance or to even sit or remain quiet for any length of time. Under these facts appellant charges her with negligence and claims that the jury should have been instructed upon this subject, in that during the period from October, 1926, to January, 1928, she made only some two or more visits to her physician. However, the doctor himself testified that he kept no record of her case after she left the hospital, as he knew she was able to call upon him when she needed help; that she did visit him several times and, with his approval, went to stay with her sister at Napa and while there at his suggestion took sun bath treatment and endeavored to hasten recovery through a complete rest. Furthermore, the court instructed the jury as to the requirement that an injured party submit to the treatment prescribed by his or her attending physician and that such party may not by his or her own failure to use reasonable care allow damages to be unnecessarily increased.

We have carefully examined all the points urged by appellants and find no reversible error; hence our conclusion first herein announced.

Charles Reagh, of San Francisco, for defendants.

PER CURIAM. The judgment in department was set aside and the hearing in bank ordered, to the end that the questions involved might be given further consideration. Upon such further consideration we are satisfied with the opinion in department prepared by Mr. Justice Preston, and adopt the same as the opinion of the court in bank. It is as follows:

By stipulation cross-appeals are submitted on one bill of exceptions. Defendants appeal from the whole judgment. Plaintiffs appeal from that portion of the judgment only which withholds the full relief prayed for by them. If the defendants prevail upon their appeal, the whole judgment must be reversed, and the appeal by plaintiffs becomes abortive.

[1] A careful consideration of this cause, together with independent search of the authorities, convinces us that the appeal of defendants must be sustained, and the whole judgment reversed. Plaintiffs and some 10 other persons owned in undivided interests 240 acres of a half section of 320 acres of land in the county of Kern. The remaining 80 acres were held in a like undivided interest by one C. T. Dunkle. Dunkle desired to purchase in 10-acre blocks the interests of the other owners. On December 14, 1923, plaintiffs and their associates, binding themselves together by mutual covenants, entered into a written contract wherein they constituted Mervyn R. Dowd as a trustee for the purpose of selling their said property to said C. T. Dunkle, and to that end and for that purpose agreed to and did execute and deliver to the said Dowd, as grantee, an ordinary grant, bargain, and sale deed of their respective interests in said property. The written agreement above mentioned contained the terms and conditions of sale, and rested upon the mutual covenants therein contained, the last and most significant of which was as follows:

"Upon receipt by the said trustee of the first payment of one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars, each of the grantors hereby agrees with all of the other grantors that his or her interest in said lands shall thereupon be converted into and deemed to be and held as an interest in common in said entire half section with all other owners and not in severalty."

Acting under said contract and the deed made pursuant thereto, said trustee Dowd transferred and conveyed certain portions of said land to the said Dunkle and received certain moneys from him on account thereof. Plaintiffs brought this action against the said Dowd as trustee and against the said Dunkle to have said trust agreement declared void as to them, to have the deed canceled as to them, and to have their title to their former interest in said lands declared and quieted against the claims of said defendants. The defendant Dunkle, it is claimed, was a purchaser with notice of their rights, and further plaintiffs alleged that they had been damaged in the premises in the sum of $5,000. Defendants answered, denying the grounds set up for the cancellation of said deed and for the quieting of plaintiff's title to said land, and in addition thereto filed their cross-complaint, asking that said underlying agreement be declared valid, and that the title of said trustee be quieted as to said real property as against said plaintiffs and cross-defendants Fred W. Lake and Fannie D. Lake, and that said plaintiffs be estopped, enjoined, and forbidden from asserting any right, title, or interest in and to the premises, save such interest as they might have under the written contract above described.

The court made findings and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiffs quieting their title to five-twelfths, or 180 acres, of said tract, and restraining and enjoining defendants from claiming or asserting any interest therein adverse to them, but refused to give plaintiffs judgment for the sum of $5,000, or any other sum, as damages. Defendants, as above stated, appealed from the whole of said judgment, and plaintiffs appealed from so much thereof as refused their prayer for damages.

It will be noted from the above description of the pleadings that the 10 other persons who joined with plaintiffs in the agreement between themselves to sell said lands through said defendant trustee were not made parties to the suit by plaintiffs, nor were they made parties to said suit by defendants under their cross-complaint. Defendants, at the opening of plaintiffs' case, objected to the introduction of any evidence, upon the ground that the other signatories to said contract had not been joined as parties defendant, and were not before the court, and at the close of plaintiffs' case said defendants moved for nonsuit upon the same grounds, taking the position that all the parties to said contract were necessary to a full determination of the issues, and the court could make no decree in the premises, unless said parties were before it. This motion was denied.

Defendants' position is well taken. Plaintiffs seem to overlook the fact that the mutual covenants between the signers of said contract were sufficient to give to each of said signers a joint interest in the whole subject-matter. The contributing of the several interests of the parties signing said contract and the surrender to a common agent or trustee of their rights and interests therein were a sufficient consideration to make said contract binding as between themselves and the contract is in reality as though it were made between them for the direct sale of the property, instead of the sale through a trustee. Each party to said contract is, therefore, a proper and necessary party for a determination of any rights in said property held by the trustee under said deed. Code Civ. Proc. § 378.

A case not cited by either counsel and determinative of this question is Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 6, 7, 84 P. 145, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275. There a debtor executed a deed of trust to secure debts to two persons. The trustees brought a suit to have the court declare the interests of the respective parties under the deed of trust and to foreclose same. But one of the persons for whose benefit the trust was created was not made a party thereto, and the point was made that a court of equity could not properly dispose of the case until such party was before it, and that the trustee could not properly represent such absent creditor or beneficiary. Lengthy quotations from this case are unnecessary; a reference thereto will reveal the rule, the reason for it, and the equitable principles upon which it is founded. The cases of McPherson v. Parker, 30 Cal. 455, 89 Am. Dec. 129, and O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 444, 16 P. 236, cited in the above-mentioned case, also fully sustain the holding here announced.

It will be noted that section 369 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes a trustee of an express trust to sue without joining the beneficiaries, is inapplicable to this case, as this is not a controversy between a trustee and strangers to the trust. Said section is for the same reason inapplicable to the cross-complainants, who undertook to try their title against the claims of said plaintiffs without joining the other beneficiaries.

[2] This position determines the issues involved in this appeal. We have, however, in view of a probable retrial of the cause, examined the record on the merits as to the other questions presented. It is our conclusion that in this aspect also the cause must be reversed, upon the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and judgment. The judgment is predicated upon the asserted right of the plaintiffs to withdraw from said agreement at any time because of the delay or failure of the trustee to complete the sales contract with Dunkle so long as the withdrawal was prior to the actual consummation of any such binding contract; the theory being doubtless that, the trustee having paid no consideration to plaintiffs, they could withdraw at any time prior to action on his part under the trust. The assertion is that such withdrawal occurred in this manner and at such time.

This argument is, as above stated, a misconception of the relation of the parties to said agreement. The question is not, May plaintiffs withdraw because of the failure of the trustee to act? But the true question is, Do plaintiffs show grounds upon which to withdraw from the agreement for failure of consideration, or other cause, as against all of the cosigners of said agreement? The trustee is but the agent upon whom authority has been conferred. The real contract is between the parties of the first part thereto. The delay in perfecting a contract of sale was a defect in the title of said parties of the first part to the said lands to be conveyed. In other words, the delay was in perfecting their title, and such defect affected the owners alike. Plaintiffs actively advocated the remedying of this defect, participated in the proceedings necessary therefor, and paid a large portion of the expense thereof from moneys paid to the trustee by Dunkle. The formal notice of withdrawal of May 17, 1924, was nullified by their own admitted conduct. The attempted withdrawal of November 17, 1924, was after the consummation of the contract with Dunkle, and after at least two payments by him, and after at least two deeds to him had been made by the trustee.

There is no substantial conflict in any of the evidence material to this issue. The evidence shows no ground whatever to cancel this agreement as against any one, and particularly as against the coparties to same. The contention that plaintiffs did what they did upon an understanding that Dunkle would complete at once a cash purchase of the whole tract does not, under the admitted facts and under the circumstances then obtaining, raise a conflict in the evidence.

[3] Neither do we discern any ground upon which it may be said that said trust is invalid or void upon its face. The instrument is clearly a trust to convey, and the powers conferred are succinctly and clearly set forth. Section 857, Civ. Code.

The judgment is reversed and the appeal of plaintiffs is dismissed.

In re SCHULTZ. (Cr. 1534.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 24, 1929.

1. Appearance ⚷20—Where one not served in proceedings regarding custody of child voluntarily appeared, failure of minutes to note waiver of service was not prejudicial.

Where one in whose home minor child was placed was not served with process in proceeding involving custody of child, but her voluntary appearance was undisputed, failure of minutes to note a waiver of service was not prejudicial to her.

2. Appeal and error ⚷440—Court could correct clerical error after appeal had been perfected.

Court could correct clerical error relating to section of statute applying in case in order to make decree speak the truth after an appeal had been perfected.

3. Infants ⚷19—Evidence held sufficient to support finding that home in which child was living was unfit place for child.

Evidence showing that woman with whom child was left had given birth to illegitimate child, and that men in home were of questionable repute, held sufficient to support finding that home in which minor child was living was an unfit place for child, so that decree adjudging child to be ward of juvenile court was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Proceeding involving the custody of Walter Schultz, a minor. From a decree adjudging him to be a ward of the juvenile court and depriving Jeanette Connors and her mother, Mrs. Lena Connors, of the custody of such ward, an appeal was taken. Affirmed.

Bryce Swartfager, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Carl Barnard, Dist. Atty., and E. T. Koford, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a decree adjudging Walter Schultz a ward of the juvenile court and depriving Jeanette Connors and her mother, Mrs. Lena Connors, of the custody of said ward.

Walter Schultz is an illegitimate child of about five years of age. About four years ago his mother, who has since disappeared, left the child with Jeanette Connors, an unmarried woman, upon the promise to pay her for its care. Miss Connors lived in the home of her mother, Mrs. Lena Connors, and with two adult brothers. The court found, upon evidence amply sufficient for the purpose, that this home was not a fit place for the child, because Jeanette Connors had recently given birth to an illegitimate child in the home, and that the two sons were men of questionable repute.

[1] On this appeal it is argued that Mrs. Lena Connors has been deprived of the custody of the child without legal process. The record does not show that she was served with process, but it does show that she appeared at the hearing personally and with counsel, and made no objection to the want of service. Though the evidence is somewhat conflicting, it was sufficient to support the conclusion that the child had been placed in the custody of Jeanette Connors, and that Mrs. Connors was not one upon whom service of process was necessary to confer jurisdiction over the child. Even so, her voluntary appearance is undisputed, and the failure of the minutes to note a waiver of service is in no way prejudicial to her.

[2] It is argued that the findings are insufficient because it adjudged the child a person coming within the provisions of subdivision 13 of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1225), whereas the evidence disclosed that he came within the provisions of subdivision 4 of that section. The reference to subdivision 13 was an obvious clerical error, which was duly corrected by the court after notice and hearing. It is objected that the trial court was without jurisdiction to so "amend" its findings because the transcript on appeal had then been filed. But that act was not an amendment of findings; it was merely a correction of a clerical error in the decree. It is unnecessary to cite authorities to the rule that a court may correct clerical errors of this character in order to make the decree speak the truth, and that such correction may be made after an appeal has been perfected.

[3] The argument that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the home was an unfit place for the child is answered by the statement of the conditions found in the home heretofore made. We do not know what further evidence of vice and immorality appellants contend should have been shown, but we are certain that the very purpose of the law is to empower the juvenile court to take over the custody of children living under such environment as was shown here.

The decree is affirmed.

BELL v. REDWINE. (Civ. 3495.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District.
California. May 15, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 14, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 11, 1929.

1. Mortgages ⟹522—Refusal of purchaser at mortgage foreclosure to pay authorized resale, notwithstanding subsequent sale by mortgagor and tender of redemption money (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 695, 726).

Where highest bidder at mortgage foreclosure sale to whom property was declared to be sold refused to pay amount of bid, and no certificate of sale was issued, and no return of sale made, and thereafter E. purchased mortgaged lands from mortgagor, and tendered to commissioner amount required for redemption, and demanded certificate of redemption, which tendered commissioner accepted only as mere tender, such tender and check in commissioner's possession was immaterial in subsequent proceeding by plaintiff in foreclosure suit to require commissioner to resell property, situation being merely one of refusal of purchaser at foreclosure sale to pay amount of his bid, authorizing commissioner to again sell property to highest bidder and recover any deficiency from original bidder, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 695, 726.

2. Execution ⟹237—Word "may" in statute authorizing resale of property sold under execution to highest bidder failing to pay held construable as "must" (Code Civ. Proc. § 695).

Since private persons are interested in performance of official duty prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 695, providing that, if purchaser refuses to pay amount bid by him for property struck off to him at sale under execution, officer may again sell property at any time to highest bidder, and, if any loss be occasioned thereby, officer may recover amount of such loss with costs from bidder so refusing in any court of competent jurisdiction, word "may" therein is to be construed as "must."

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by R. R. Bell, as executor of the last will and testament of J. W. Swales, deceased, substituted for J. W. Swales, against G. E. Redwine. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. L. Held and Keith C. Eversole, both of Ukiah, for appellant.

Hale McCowen, Jr., of Ukiah, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. [1] In an action to foreclose a mortgage on real estate, prosecuted by J. W. Swales against Joseph Burns, judgment was entered in favor of the former against the latter for $3,927.90, and the appellant herein was appointed commissioner to sell the mortgaged property. December 13, 1924, the commissioner duly offered the property for sale at public auction. Hale McCowen, Jr., one of the attorneys for the plaintiff in the foreclosure proceeding, became the highest bidder, and the commissioner thereupon publicly announced that the property was sold to McCowen. It is not claimed that McCowen purchased the property for his client, but the answer alleges "that respondent sold each of said lots or parcels to said Hale McCowen, Jr., on the personal credit of said Hale McCowen, Jr., and upon his promise and assurance that he would pay the purchase price on demand." McCowen has at all times refused to pay the amount of his bid for the property, and no certificate of sale has been issued to him or to any other person, and no return of sale has been made.

December 15, 1924, Keith C. Eversole purchased the mortgaged lands from Burns. On the same day Eversole tendered to the commissioner $231.24, the amount required for redemption, and demanded a certificate of redemption. Two days later Eversole tendered to the commissioner "a check for the sum of $231, the amount of the bid of the said McCowen; * * * said action on the part of said K. C. Eversole was not done at the request of or with the knowledge of the said McCowen, * * * but on the contrary, the said action of said K. C. Eversole has been disavowed and disaffirmed by the said Hale McCowen, Jr." Appellant testified in relation to the tender last mentioned as follows: "I took the check. * * * I told him at the time that it would be considered as a tender and not a payment." Swales demanded that the appellant proceed to resell the property, but he refused, and this proceeding was commenced for the purpose of requiring him to do so. Judgment was entered as prayed for by the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

It appears from the evidence and the findings that the appellant has no moneys in his hands which can be reached by the judgment creditor in the foreclosure action. Appellant is holding a check for $231, not as payment, but as a mere tender. Eversole, the maker of the check, is not a party to this proceeding, and would not be bound by any judgment entered herein. The tender and the check, therefore, may be eliminated from consideration as immaterial, and it is unnecessary to consider what would have been the effect of an acceptance of payment by the appellant from Eversole. The situation, therefore, is the simple one of the refusal of a purchaser at a foreclosure sale to make payment of the amount of his bid.

"Upon the failure of the purchaser to comply with the terms of the sale, the sheriff may, in some jurisdictions, proceed against the purchaser for the full amount of his bid, but his usual remedy, which in some jurisdictions it is his duty to pursue, is to resell the property and proceed against the defaulting purchaser for any deficiency between the amount bid by him and the amount realized on the resale." 23 C. J. 651.

An action against a purchaser for the amount of his bid, in many cases, would be an inadequate remedy by reason of the expense and delay incident to such a suit. A simpler remedy is provided by section 695 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

"If a purchaser refuse to pay the amount bid by him for property struck off to him at a sale under execution, the officer may again sell the property at any time to the highest bidder, and if any loss be occasioned thereby, the officer may recover the amount of such loss, with costs, from the bidder so refusing, in any court of competent jurisdiction."

[2] The provisions of section 695 are applicable to sales made by commissioners in foreclosure proceedings. Code Civ. Proc., § 726. Since private persons are interested in the performance of the official duty prescribed by section 695, the word "may" therein is to be construed as meaning "must." Brenner v. Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 72, 79, 116 P. 397; Stockton Plumbing & Supply Co. v. Wheeler, 68 Cal. App. 592, 599, 229 P. 1020; County of Los Angeles v. State, 64 Cal. App. 290, 297, 222 P. 153.

The judgment is affirmed.

Complaint that district attorney, after order admitting defendant to bail, issued instructions that bond should not be written for defendant under any circumstances, could not be made to appellate court or in habeas corpus proceeding to secure reduction of bail.

2. Bail 🔑51—Judge fixing amount of bail could consider fact that defendant was fugitive from justice.

3. Bail 🔑42—On application for admission to bail after indictment returned, court must assume defendant is guilty of offense charged.

4. Bail 🔑53—It must clearly appear trial court abused discretion before higher court will reduce amount of bail.

On an application to Court of Appeal for reduction of bail upon ground that amount fixed by court is excessive, it must clearly appear that trial court has abused its discretion before higher court will reduce amount.

6. Bail 🔑53—Petitioner, a fugitive from justice, charged with conspiracy to maliciously procure another's arrest, held not entitled to reduction of bail fixed at $20,000, though bail of codefendants was fixed at $2,000.

Petitioner, a fugitive from justice at time of arrest on charge of criminal conspiracy to falsely and maliciously procure another to be arrested and charged with crime, who was allowed bail in sum of $20,000 which she was unable to procure, held not entitled to reduction of bail, where codefendants were admitted to bail in sum of $2,000 each.

Application by Callie Grimes for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure reduction of bail. Writ denied, and petitioner remanded.

Leo D. Dazé, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and George B. Bush, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On the 18th day of February, 1929, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, an indictment was returned whereby the petitioner and seven others were charged with the crime of criminal conspiracy, a felony, to wit, a conspiracy to commit the crime of falsely and maliciously procuring another to be charged and arrested for a crime in violation of subdivision 2, § 182, of the Penal Code. Prior to that date petitioner had been a witness before the grand jury in relation to said matter, and knew that the subject of the proposed indictment was being considered. Between the time of the filing of the indictment and issuance of a warrant for petitioner's arrest she left the state of California. On March 11th she was arrested in the state of Texas, waived extradition proceedings, and returned in the custody of the arresting officers to the county of Los Angeles, Cal., where she was brought before the superior court, and was allowed bail in the sum of $20,000, which she has not been able to procure.

By her petition in this proceeding, petitioner alleges that said amount of bail is per se unreasonably large and disproportionately excessive; that the court abused its discretion in fixing her bail at said sum, especially in view of the fact that each of her codefendants was admitted to bail in the sum of $2,000.

[1] At this point we will digress from the main issue to take notice of the allegation in the petition that several bond companies have informed petitioner that for political reasons her bond could not be written, and the further allegation "that in one instance the attorney for your petitioner learned that the district attorney of Los Angeles county had issued instructions that bond should not be written for your petitioner under any circumstances." We venture to suggest that such conduct of the district attorney after an order admitting a defendant to bail would constitute contempt of court and would be an unlawful interference with the order of the court, and that, if in fact the attorney for petitioner has knowledge of any such conduct, he might appropriately bring the facts before the proper tribunal, which, however, is not this court or in this proceeding. It must not be inferred, however, that we have given any weight or credence to the charge.

[2-5] It is not denied by petitioner that she was present in the state of California at the time of the commission of the offense charged in the indictment. The facts show that at the time of her arrest in Texas she was a fugitive from justice. In re Jackson, 82 Cal. App. 719, 256 P. 250; In re Thurber, 37 Cal. App. 571, 174 P. 112. The judge by whom the amount of the bail was determined had a right to take that fact into consideration. Upon an application for admission to bail after indictment returned, the court must assume that the defendant is guilty of the offense with which he is charged. Upon an application to a court of appeal for reduction of bail upon the ground that the amount fixed by the court is excessive, it must clearly appear that the trial court has abused its discretion, before a higher court will reduce the amount. Ex parte Ruef, 7 Cal. App. 750, 752, 96 P. 24. It is sometimes stated that in order to justify such interference, the bail demanded must be per se unreasonably great and clearly disproportionate to the offense involved. The moral turpitude of the offense, as well as the penalty provided by law, are also matters for consideration in admitting to bail.

[6] In the matter now before us the evidence presented is not convincing of the contention that the amount of bail required by the court is necessarily excessive. The facts which may have been presented to the judge, and upon which he deemed it reasonable to admit the other defendants to bail in the sum of $2,000, are not before us. On the face of the matter it would be just as reasonable to assume that the bail required of these other defendants was too low in amount as to say that the amount required of this petitioner was excessive. The other defendants did not occupy, as did the petitioner, the unfavorable position of a defendant brought in as a fugitive from justice.

The application for reduction of bail by this court is denied, and the petitioner is remanded to custody.

We concur: HOUSER, J.; YORK, J.

17. Pleading 🔑279(1)—Permitting filing of pleading denominated supplemental complaint was not error, notwithstanding facts alleged therein did not arise after filing of original complaint, but might have been expressly alleged in amended complaint (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 379, 464).

Where appellant was proper party to action, there was no error in permitting him to be made party under Code Civ. Proc. § 379, and to permit filing of pleading denominated supplemental complaint, notwithstanding that under section 464 office of supplemental complaint is to allege only new matter which occurs after filing of original complaint or answer, where matter alleged in such pleading would have been appropriate in amended complaint.

18. Receivers 🔑110—Receiver holds custody of property in behalf of court for real owners, and court may direct delivery to receiver of specific property involved.

Receiver merely holds custody of property involved in litigation in behalf of court for real owners thereof, and court may direct delivery by receiver of specific property involved.

19. Receivers 🔑179—Custodian of property cannot complain that receiver was not party to action in which he was ordered to deliver property to such receiver.

Custodian of property cannot, on appeal, complain that receiver was not made party to action in which delivery of property to receiver was ordered.

20. Parties 🔑80(6)—Objection on ground of nonjoinder of parties is waived, unless presented by demurrer or answer.

Objection on ground of nonjoinder of parties plaintiff or defendant must be presented by demurrer or answer in manner provided by statute, or it will be deemed to have been waived.

21. Appeal and error 🔑187(2)—Objection to misjoinder of parties cannot be made on appeal for first time.

Objection to misjoinder of parties plaintiff or defendant cannot be made for first time on appeal.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Actions by Henry Irer against J. D. Gawn and others, in which defendant Gawn filed a cross-complaint, and in which H. M. Buchanan and W. J. Defendants Buchanan, Irer, Gawn, and Kitts appeal. Affirmed.

THOMPSON, J. From the judgment and findings covering a group of three consolidated cases which involved an accounting of a joint adventure to construct a bungalow court several appeals were perfected and will be considered conjointly.

The plaintiff Irer owned three lots in the city of Los Angeles. December 1, 1923, he entered into a written contract with the appellant Gawn to engage in a joint adventure, by the terms of which they agreed to construct a bungalow court on these lots. For the purposes of this enterprise, the lots were valued at $10,000. Gawn contributed $4,000, which he secured by obtaining credit for $2,200 to purchase materials for the bungalow court from the Hammond Lumber Company, in payment for which he transferred to that company a trust deed upon other property. The remaining $1,800 he procured by transferring to W. J. Kitts a note and mortgage, with instructions to sell the securities and pay as directed existing bills for labor and materials also used in the building. An additional sum of $20,000 was raised by mortgaging the property. Two-sevenths undivided interest in the property was conveyed to Gawn. The contract provided that, in the event of a sale of the property, each party was to be first reimbursed the amount of his contribution to the enterprise, after which the net proceeds of sale were to be equally divided between them. There was no provision concerning the subject of losses. Regarding the obligation for paying the cost for construction in excess of the initial sums contributed, the contract provided (paragraph 8): "If the said sum of $4,000 and the proceeds of said mortgage in the sum of $20,000 shall not be sufficient for the erection and construction of said bungalow court * * * each of said parties shall forthwith advance one-half of the amount or amounts necessary for the completion of the improvement." After providing for reimbursement for the original specified sums of contribution, the contract declared that (paragraph 15): "In the event of a sale * * * each party shall be entitled to one-half of the net profits of said matter." By the following June all of the funds were expended in the process of constructing the bungalow court. It was still incomplete, and required several thousand dollars to finish the contract. Dissensions arose between the parties. Both refused to expend more money on the enterprise, and the work ceased. The plaintiff Irer thereupon commenced suit for dissolution of the relationship which existed between them, and for an accounting. The appellant Gawn answered the petition and filed a cross-complaint, praying that "said joint venture may be dissolved"; that a receiver be appointed; and that an accounting be had. Upon application to the trial court, both W. J. Kitts and the Hammond Lumber Company, to whom the appellant Gawn had transferred securities to obtain credit for his share of the contribution to the joint adventure, were made party defendants, and each filed a separate cross-complaint for the value of the materials furnished. A receiver was duly appointed by the court, and the bungalow property was sold and conveyed to H. M. Buchanan for $2,000, subject to all existing incumbrances, liens, and claims. Buchanan was then also made a party defendant, and filed a cross-complaint; setting up his equities. Prior to Buchanan's appearance as a defendant in the Irer case, he had commenced a separate suit for accounting against W. J. Kitts and the Redlands Building & Loan Association as holders of the Gawn note and mortgage for $1,800, claiming that they were a part of the assets of the enterprise, which he had purchased with the bungalow property. These suits were subsequently consolidated for trial. An accounting was had, resulting in a conflict over several items. Findings were adopted, and an interlocutory decree was rendered. Subsequently on motion this decree was set aside, and modified conclusions of law were filed, based upon which an amended judgment was entered. The chief change adopted in these findings and judgment, of which the appellant Gawn complains, is that the court finally held that each of the joint adventurers, Irer and Gawn, were bound to pay one-half of the losses of the enterprise. Separate notices of appeal were filed by the defendant Gawn from each of said judgments, and another appeal was taken from the order setting aside the first findings and decree. Both Kitts and Buchanan also perfected separate appeals from the last judgment entered and from the order setting aside the first findings and decree. Gawn's appeal is presented by means of a clerk's transcript prepared pursuant to section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The other appeals are presented in the form of bills of exceptions, including, however, no evidence, but being composed only of the judgment roll and the proceedings necessary to the prosecution of the appeals.

In the several appeals which have been perfected in this combination of consolidated cases, numerous grounds of alleged error are urged, among which it is contended that the court erred in failing to find that the transaction constituted a joint adventure; or that the contract was breached by the appellant Gawn. It is further asserted that the assets of the enterprise were distributed between the parties in improper proportions; that the court was without jurisdiction to set aside the original findings and judgment, or to modify and enter the final judgment; that the court erred in charging each of the joint adventurers with the obligation of paying one-half of the net loss of the enterprise, instead of fixing the relative proportions of loss according to the value of their respective contributions. Finally, it is asserted that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence; that the trial judge was guilty of misconduct; and that the appellant Gawn was not accorded a fair trial.

[1, 2] In both the original and amended conclusions of law the court did correctly find "that the said agreement * * * constituted a joint adventure." The single transaction of becoming joint owners of real property upon which a bungalow court is constructed for sale from the joint contributions of the interested parties, under the circumstances disclosed by the record in these cases, clearly indicates that the parties intended to create a joint adventure. The nature of this transaction, as a joint adventure, is not changed by the fact that the agreement incidentally provided that the respective parties were to render personal services in the construction of the buildings, and, when so employed, they were to receive $10 per day, which allowance was to be charged as "items of expense in the construction." But, so far as the interests of the principals in this transaction are concerned, it is immaterial whether it be deemed to be a copartnership or a joint adventure, for the legal principles which are applicable are the same. 14 Cal. Jur. 760, § 2, Butler v. Union Trust Co., 178 Cal. 195, 172 P. 601.

[3-6] It is asserted by the appellant Gawn that the court erred in failing to find that the contract of joint adventure was broken by him; that this is fatal, for the reason that the losses must be borne alone by the party who is guilty of the breach. In the present cases, however, the joint adventure was apparently terminated by mutual consent. The pleadings allege without dispute, and the court found, that dissensions arose between the parties, that the operations in the construction of the bungalow court ceased about June 1, 1924, leaving the building incomplete, with unpaid bills in the aggregate sum of about $10,000, and that the respective parties agreed to terminate the venture, hold an accounting, and appoint a receiver to take charge of the property and liquidate the debts. In truth, the appellant Gawn prayed for this very relief in his cross-complaint. It is unnecessary to adopt findings upon a subject upon which no issue is presented by the pleadings. 24 Cal. Jur. 952, § 191. It was therefore unnecessary for the court to adopt findings on this subject. The court subsequently ordered the receiver to sell the property to satisfy the obligations. An agreement of joint adventure may be terminated at any time by the mutual consent of the contracting parties. 33 C. J. 848, § 21; Nevins v. Heckscher, 223 N. Y. 551, 119 N. E. 1061. In the event of a dissolution of a joint adventure, either of the parties to the enterprise may require its property to be applied to the discharge of the valid debts. Section 2405, Civ. Code. In the present cases, the amounts contributed by the respective parties were not equal. By the terms of the contract it was agreed that the value of the lots which were contributed by the plaintiff Irer was $10,000, while the appellant furnished only $4,000 to the enterprise. In spite of these unequal contributions, the contract provided that the "net profits shall be divided equally." It is true that the contract conveyed to the appellant Gawn only a two-sevenths undivided interest in the land, which was his share according to the relative proportion which his contribution of $4,000 bore to the agreed value of the property, which was estimated at $10,000. The aggregate amount which was contributed was therefore $14,000, two-sevenths of which the defendant Gawn supplied. The relative amounts contributed to a joint adventure do not necessarily determine the proportions of profits or losses which are to be enjoyed or borne by each of the interested parties, unless the contract so provides. In 33 C. J. 861, § 67, it is said:

[7] "In the absence of an express agreement between the parties to a joint adventure as to the proportions in which they are to share in the profits thereof, the law presumes that they intended that each should share equally with the others, notwithstanding an inequality in the amounts contributed by them to the capital employed in the venture."

Reason prompts the application of the same rule to the participation in the losses of such an enterprise, where the contract fails to specify the relative obligations of the parties. 14 Cal. Jur. 762, § 3. The rule prescribed by the statutes of California with respect to partnership profits and losses announces only the common-law doctrine which is applicable to the circumstances of the present cases. Section 2403 of the Civil Code provides: "In the absence of any agreement on the subject the shares of partners in the profit or loss of the business are equal, and the share of each in the partnership property is the value of his original contribution, increased or diminished by his share of profit or loss."

This means that, in the event of the termination of a contract of joint adventure, the respective parties are entitled to be reimbursed to the extent of the value of their original contribution, less their proportion of the loss sustained. Section 2404 of the Civil Code also provides that: "An agreement to divide the profits of a business implies an agreement for a corresponding division of its losses, unless it is otherwise expressly stipulated."

These sections of the Code are in accord with the common-law rule applicable to the relationship of a partnership or joint adventure, where the contract is silent as to the participation in losses. Whatever inferences may be drawn from the contract in the present cases lead to the conclusion that it was the intention of the parties to participate equally in the losses as well as the profits of the enterprise. It follows that the court therefore properly held that the respective parties to this joint adventure were bound to participate equally in the losses.

[8, 9] The appellant Gawn complains of alleged misconduct and prejudice on the part of the trial judge, depriving him of a fair trial. It is asserted that, while he was a witness and testifying in his own behalf in support of a claim for $805 for personal services as carpenter and care taken of the premises for 80½ days between May 17 and August 14, 1924, at the agreed rate of $10 per day, the court became displeased with the conduct of the witness, and criticized the unsatisfactory character of his evidence. In a colloquy with counsel, the judge said: "I think this man did some work, Mr. Wells, during that time. I think he has padded his bill very badly. * * * I don't blame the referee for disallowing the claim entirely."

Later, in reply to this appellant's attorney, the court again said: "* * * To be very frank with you * * * I was rather disgusted with your client on the witness stand, his manner of answering questions, and I came to the conclusion he was padding his report. I didn't want to do him an injustice. I could just as easily have said, I approve the report of the referee (who disallowed the entire bill), and let it go (without allowing him anything on this claim for $805). * * * Your client impresses me he wasn't entitled to anything."

[10] The record discloses evidence which tends to warrant the court in discrediting the merits of this claim. It included only 21 days' actual carpenter work. The balance appears to have been for care of the premises to August 14th. But the construction work ceased June 1st, and this suit was commenced June 4, 1924. It may well be said there is not much merit in a claim for more than 60 days' pay at $10 per day for a mere inspection of the premises after the work ceased and the suit for accounting was commenced. The record is indeed unsatisfactory with respect to this claim. The referee disallowed this entire claim, and the court seemed satisfied that nothing should have been allowed, yet, with an evident disposition to compromise it, out of an abundance of precaution for appellant's welfare, he allowed him $320. This procedure may not be said to indicate a prejudiced mind on the part of the court or unfairness toward this appellant. Certainly no misconduct on the part of the judge is shown. No objection or exception to these remarks was reserved by the appellant. The question of prejudice on the part of the trial judge is raised for the first time on appeal. In order to avail himself of the benefit of alleged prejudicial utterances of a trial judge, exception to the remarks or an assignment of misconduct must be reserved during the process of the trial. Compton-Gardena Milling Co. v. McCartney, 69 Cal. App. 708, 710, 231 P. 764; Franceschi v. Nardi, 77 Cal. App. 78, 81, 246 P. 130; Hughes v. Hartman, (Cal. Sup.) 273 P. 560. In support of the validity of this claim it is urged that plaintiff's attorney acknowledged its merits by offering to allow one-half of the claim. He did say: "I think the testimony shows conclusively that the bills are padded. * * * I am willing, for the purpose of saving time * * * that one-half of this amount claimed be allowed." This offer to compromise was, however, not accepted. It was specifically made in the interest of saving time. A proffer of compromise under such circumstances is not an admission of the merit of the claim. Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) 437, § 291; 5 Cal. Jur. 408, § 20.

[11] The appellant Gawn contends that the amended findings and judgment, to the effect that the fund of $1,800 in the possession of the defendant Kitts belongs to the joint adventure and must be paid to the receiver of the enterprise, are not sustained by the evidence. In support of this assertion, no evidence whatever is printed in his briefs, nor is any reference made to the typewritten record where the subject may be found. In the absence of a compliance with Supreme Court rule 8, part 5, as amended in 1928, no consideration will be given on appeal to a mere declaration that specific findings or the judgment is not supported by the evidence. It would require too arduous a task for an appellate judge to search the record to confirm or disprove a general statement not supported by any attempt to quote the evidence, or point out the defect relied upon. It is true that upon this subject the construction of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure has been modified by the Supreme Court rule above cited, since the decisions were rendered in Wong Ah Sure v. Ty Fook, 37 Cal. App. 465, 174 P. 64, and Jones v. Express Pub. Co. (Cal. App.) 262 P. 78. That rule, however, still requires the substance of the record relied upon to be printed either in narrative form or otherwise, with reference to the page and line of the transcript for verification. It now reads: "Where the parts of the typewritten record relied upon on appeal are required to be printed in the briefs (Code Civ. Proc., § 953a et seq.) it shall be sufficient to state therein the substance of such record parenthetically referring to the line and page of the typewritten transcript for verification. * * *" Because of the failure to comply with this rule, it must be assumed that the challenged findings are amply supported by the evidence.

November 30, 1926, findings of fact and conclusions of law were adopted and filed, based upon which a judgment was entered. Subsequently, upon motion, these findings and judgment were set aside, and other findings with modified conclusions of law were adopted and a new judgment entered thereon. From the order setting aside the later findings and judgment, an appeal has been perfected.

[12] A judgment may be set aside upon motion and another judgment entered in lieu thereof, where erroneous conclusions of law are adopted which are inconsistent with the findings of fact. In the event of such modification, the conclusions of law should be amended to conform to the findings of fact and a judgment entered accordingly.. Section 663, Code Civ. Proc.; Gale v. Dixon (Cal. App.) 267 P. 342; Modoc Co-operative Ass'n v. Porter, 11 Cal. App. 274, 104 P. 710. From the order granting this motion an appeal may be taken in the same manner as from an order which is made after final judgment. Section 663a, Code Civ. Proc. Upon appeal from this order, the question to be determined is whether the original conclusions of law were in conflict with the findings of fact. A single set of findings and judgment were entered in the three consolidated cases which are under consideration. In the case of Buchanan v. Kitts, which is one of these three cases, the facts heretofore narrated, constituting the cause directly involved in the joint adventure of Irer and Gawn, were alleged, together with additional facts to the effect that Gawn, as a part of his contribution to the enterprise, had delivered to Kitts a certain mortgage upon other property, with directions to sell it and apply the proceeds to the payment of claims for labor and material furnished in the construction of the bungalow court; that obligations were incurred on that account in the aggregate amount of $1,780.60, which claims were paid by Buchanan and then assigned to him for a valuable consideration, and that he thereupon became the owner and holder thereof; that the mortgage was sold by Kitts for $1,800, which money he refused to apply on said claims pursuant to instructions, but still holds the same in violation of his trust; that the enterprise was abandoned, a suit was commenced for an accounting between the joint adventurers, and by mutual consent a receiver was appointed, and the bungalow property was sold and conveyed to the plaintiff Buchanan for $2,000, subject to all mortgages, claims, and liens.

The plaintiff prayed that Kitts be required to account for and pay to him said sum of money. The answer admitted substantially all the facts alleged, except that it was stated that the $1,800 was held by Kitts to be applied on the payment of said bills only when directed by the joint adventurers, and that the bungalow court was never completed and the defendant Kitts was not instructed to pay the claims. Upon trial, the court found all of the aforesaid allegations of the complaint to be true, except that it was not found that the claims had been assigned to the plaintiff Buchanan. The court further found that Buchanan bought the bungalow property because of the promises made to him by the receiver, Gawn and Kitts, to the effect that the $1,800 held by Kitts would be applied to the payment of the claims, but that this promise was made without the knowledge or consent of Irer. It was then found that the equity of Irer and Gawn "in and to said real property" was sold and conveyed to Buchanan in consideration of $2,000 "subject to all existing encumbrances, liens and claims * * * amounting to approximately $10,000 in addition to the $20,000 mortgage against the property."

[13-15] Based upon these findings, as a conclusion of law, the court first held that Buchanan was entitled to a judgment against Kitts for the sum of $1,800. This conclusion seems to have been based upon the theory that the sale of the property was procured by the fraudulent oral promise of the referee, Gawn, and Kitts to see that the $1,800 was contributed to the payment of debts. The court seems also to have first assumed that the purchase of the real property carried with it all the other assets of the joint adventure. Fraud, however, was not pleaded, and unfortunately the alleged agreement to apply the $1,800 to the payment of debts was not in writing or signed by the interested parties to be charged. It was, therefore, not enforceable. Moreover, it was found by the court to have been made without the knowledge or consent of Irer, one of the material parties to the joint adventure, who was vitally interested in the enterprise and the sale of the property. According to the findings, the sale does not purport to convey any assets belonging to the joint adventure, except the right, title, and interest in the bungalow property. The $1,800 constituted a trust fund, which was a money asset of the joint enterprise entirely independent of the sale and conveyance of the real property. It cannot be said that real or personal property entirely separate and distinct from the bungalow property, which was all that was sold, would pass to the purchaser in the absence of a written contract to that effect. If an assignment of these claims had actually been made to the plaintiff Buchanan, an appropriate action would lie against Kitts, the holder of the trust fund. The court, however, failed to find that such an assignment occurred, and in this action for an accounting the court first erroneously concluded that this $1,800 fund passed to the plaintiff Buchanan by virtue of the purchase of the bungalow property. It therefore follows a discrepancy existed between the original findings of fact and conclusions of law which the court was authorized to correct pursuant to the provisions of section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This is precisely what the court did, setting aside the conclusions of law and judgment, and adopting modified conclusions of law to conform to its findings of fact, upon which a new judgment was entered holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment for this fund of $1,800 but that, upon the contrary, the money belonged to the assets of the joint adventure and should be paid to the receiver thereof.

Since this inconsistency existed between the original findings of fact and conclusions of law which authorized the modification of the conclusions of law and judgment, it was not error to add to the judgment a provision holding that the joint adventurers were equally liable for the losses of the enterprise, for this declaration followed the original findings as a mere matter of law. The appeal from the order setting aside the original findings and judgment is without merit. The case of Hughes v. De Mund (Cal. App.) 274 P. 405, cited by appellant Gawn, is not in conflict with the law applicable to the facts of the present case. In that case one judge heard the evidence in an action for partnership accounting, and adopted findings of fact. Another judge who did not hear this evidence subsequently set the findings aside, and adopted other findings of fact. As the court very properly says in its opinion: "The findings of fact * * * were final on the issues therein," and could not properly be set aside in the proceeding. But in the present case the findings of fact based upon the evidence formerly adduced were not modified or disturbed, but remained in the precise form in which they were adopted. All that the court attempted to do in the present case was to modify the conclusions of law pursuant to section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure to conform to the facts adopted by the former trial judge. This became a mere matter of applying the principles of law to the facts which had been previously ascertained and found by another judge. The very purpose of the adoption of the Code provision above mentioned was to permit a trial judge to remedy a mistake of law applicable to the ascertained facts, without the necessity of requiring the cost and delay of an appeal.

[16, 17] Subsequent to the filing of the original complaint by Irer for an accounting, upon motion under section 379 of the Code of Civil Procedure, W. J. Kitts, who held possession of a portion of the joint adventure funds involved in the controversy, was made a party defendant. A pleading which was denominated a supplemental complaint was filed, setting up the facts with relation to the custody of the trust funds. On appeal from the final judgment, the defendant Kitts claims that he was improperly united as a party defendant, and that the office of a supplemental complaint is to allege only new matter which occurs after the filing of the original complaint or answer. Section 464, Code Civ. Proc. He asserts that all of the facts which are alleged in the pleading designated as a supplemental complaint existed before the filing of the original complaint. This is true. The facts, however, indicate that he was a proper party to the action, and that the new matter would have been appropriate to set up in an amended complaint. A pleading will not be measured by its title alone. The appropriate allegations which it contains will determine the nature of the document. There was no error in permitting the filing of this pleading. Stark v. Hoeft (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 1105, 1107.

[18-21] The defendant Kitts may not complain because the receiver was not made a party to the action. A receiver merely holds the custody of the property involved in litigation in behalf of the court for the real owners thereof, and the court may direct the delivery to the receiver of specific property which is involved in the litigation. 22 Cal Jur. 493, § 79. An objection on the ground of nonjoinder of parties plaintiff or defendant must be presented by demurrer or answer in the manner provided by statute, or it will be deemed to have been waived. 20 Cal. Jur. 573, § 56; Stackpole v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 181 Cal. 700, 186 P. 354; Breitenbucher v. Oppenheim, 160 Cal. 98, 116 P. 55. The objection on the part of the defendant Kitts to the nonjoinder of the receiver as a party defendant comes too late when it is urged on appeal for the first time, and is therefore without merit.

The records in these consolidated cases seem to be free from prejudicial error. The order of January 13, 1927, vacating the findings and judgment dated November 30, 1926, and which order authorized the amendment and modification of the conclusions of law so as to conform to the findings of fact theretofore adopted, and permitting the entry of an amended judgment, is affirmed. The subsequent judgment dated and filed February 3, 1927, from which the several appeals are herein prosecuted, is also affirmed.

FLINN v. POTTER. (Civ. 3777.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 22, 1929.

Deeds ⚷66—Evidence held not insufficient, as matter of law, to support finding that deed from wife to husband was delivered.

Evidence held not insufficient, as matter of law, to support finding that deed from wife to husband was delivered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Flinn against Robert J. Potter, sometimes known as Robert F. Potter. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Coleman E. Stewart, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

S. J. Bingham, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. August 5, 1922, Emma D. Potter, plaintiff's mother, signed and acknowledged two deeds, purporting to convey real property to her husband, the defendant herein, who is the stepfather of the plaintiff. The first amended complaint contains three counts. The first and third counts allege mental weakness on the part of Mrs. Potter and undue influence on the part of the defendant. The second alleges that the deeds mentioned were never delivered. At the trial, "the attorney for plaintiff in open court withdrew the first and third causes of action stated in plaintiff's first amended complaint and stipulated that plaintiff would go to trial on his allegations of the second cause of action, that said deeds were never delivered during the lifetime of the grantor." Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The defendant testified that, without any request or solicitation on his part, his wife said "she wanted me to have it all what there was without any trouble"; that, at her request, he went with her to the office of a lawyer, where the deeds were signed and acknowledged; that immediately after leaving the office she handed him the deeds, and said, "I hand you these deeds so there won't be any trouble"; or she said, "Take them"; that he took the deeds home and placed them in his wife's "community trunk," in which he kept his best clothes. The trunk was kept in the bedroom occupied by the defendant and his wife. Another witness testified that about a week before Mrs. Potter's death he saw some of the defendant's clothing in the trunk. The foregoing summary contains the substance of all the material evidence given at the trial.

By abandoning his first and third causes of action, the plaintiff eliminated the issues of mental weakness and undue influence, leaving nothing to be tried except the question of delivery. Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to show a delivery of the deeds with intent to pass title. No citation of authorities is deemed necessary to show that it cannot be held, as a matter of law, that such evidence, standing uncontradicted, is insufficient to support the findings and judgment.

PEOPLE v. McGEE. (Cr. 1780.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 28, 1929.

1. Criminal law ⚷1159(2)—Finding of jury where circumstances reasonably justify inference of guilt is conclusive on appellate court.

Where circumstances are such as to justify inference of guilt, finding of jury is conclusive on appellate court though an inference of innocence might also have reasonably been drawn.

2. Criminal law ⚷1134(3)—Question of law is presented where inference of guilt is wholly unwarranted.

Where inference of guilt is wholly unwarranted, or evidence is such that court is authorized to conclude that there is no evidence to support the verdict, a question of law is presented.

3. Criminal law ⚷752½—Motion to dismiss in manslaughter prosecution, on ground of corpus delicti was not proven, raised no question other than sufficiency of evidence.

Motion to dismiss in prosecution for manslaughter at conclusion of state's case predicated, on ground that corpus delicti was not proven, did not raise any question except sufficiency of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

George W. McGee was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Buel R. Wood, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and L. G. Campbell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

YORK, J. The defendant was charged with the crime of manslaughter on an indictment found by the grand jury of Los Angeles county, and when brought to trial thereon, he waived a jury trial and consented that the trial be had before the court without a jury. He was found guilty of manslaughter and sentenced accordingly.

[1, 2] There was sufficient evidence to justify the trial court in finding the defendant guilty as charged. The most that can be said in favor of appellant's argument is that the evidence, in relation to some of the probative facts, was conflicting.

As is said in 8 California Jurisprudence, § 584, at page 593: "If the circumstances are such as reasonably to justify the inference of guilt, the finding of the jury is conclusive upon the appellate court, although an inference of innocence might also reasonably have been drawn. But if the inference of guilt is wholly unwarranted, that is to say, if the evidence is such that the court is authorized to conclude that there is no evidence to support the verdict, a question of law is presented."

[3] The appellant also contends that the trial court erred in denying his motion to dismiss said cause at the conclusion of the state's case. It is disclosed by the transcript that this motion was predicated upon the ground that the corpus delicti was not proven. He argued that he was charged with an unlawful and malicious killing, and that there was no evidence thereof. The court called counsel's attention to the fact that manslaughter does not involve malice, and then properly denied the motion. This motion would not raise any other question except the sufficiency of the evidence, which has heretofore been passed upon herein.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SORIA v. COWELL PORTLAND CEMENT CO. (Civ. 6658.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 23, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 19, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 22, 1929.

1. Master and servant 🔑412—Finding of negligence of employer, not insured, will not be disturbed, where evidence is not in conflict with statutory presumption (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 29(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 495).

In an action under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), § 29(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 495, against employer failing to insure, where there is no conflict between the statutory presumption that injury to employee was result of employer's negligence, and the evidence, jury's finding of negligence cannot be disturbed.

2. Master and servant 🔑356—Defense of contributory negligence is expressly denied in action against employer failing to insure (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 29(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 495).

In action against employer failing to insure, under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), § 29(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 495, the defense of contributory negligence is expressly denied to defendant.

3. Master and servant 🔑404—That employer endeavored to take out insurance, or applied for permission for self-insurance, is inadmissible in action against noninsured employer for injuries (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 29(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 495).

In action against employer failing to insure under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), § 29(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 495, there was no error in refusing to permit employer to show application for permission for self-insurance, the fact that employer intended or endeavored to take out insurance having no bearing on fact that he was not insured at time of injury.

4. Master and servant 🔑404—That noninsured employer had been acquitted of violation of penal provisions of statute was properly excluded in employee's injury action (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 29(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 495).

In action against noninsured employer for injuries to employee under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), § 29(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 495, there was no error in refusing to permit employer to show that it had been proceeded against under penal provisions of statute and had been acquitted, such fact, if true, not affecting employer's liability for damages.

5. Appeal and error 🔑761—Mere suggestion of unconstitutionality of statute regulating liability of uninsured employers for injuries to employees does not require court to search authorities (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 29(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 495).

Mere suggestion in appellant's brief that Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended) § 29(b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 495, relating to liability of uninsured employer for injuries to employee, is unconstitutional as imposing cruel and unusual punishment on employer, does not require court to search authorities to support appellant's contention.

6. Appeal and error 🔑758(3)—Bare statement in brief that certain copied instructions were erroneous held insufficient.

Appellant's brief, containing copies of certain instructions with bare statement that they were erroneous because covering grounds not specifically alleged in complaint, held insufficient to require court to analyze each instruction to ascertain if error might have occurred.

7. Trial 🔑296(3)—That certain instructions on negligence omitted element of proximate cause fully covered in other instructions was not error.

That some instructions on issue of negligence omitted element of proximate cause was not error, where trial judge fully instructed on this element, it not being necessary that every element should be repeated in every instruction given.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Treadwell, Van Fleet & Laughlin, of San Francisco, and Rodgers & Bray, of Martinez, for appellant.

Jesse G. Benson, of Oakland, and Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injuries occurring in the course of his employment in the cement plant of the defendant. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $11,500, to which the trial judge added $500 attorneys' fees, the action being prosecuted under the special provisions of section 29(b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), as amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 495). The defendant has appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

The plaintiff plants his case upon the failure of the defendant to insure against liability to pay compensation to its employees under the act, and upon the alleged negligence of the defendant in assigning plaintiff to work upon a cement conveyor in the defendant's plant without having provided any guard or rail to prevent workmen from becoming entangled in the machinery, and, generally, in failing to provide plaintiff a safe place to work.

The evidence of negligence offered by the plaintiff was that this conveyor was fitted with unfastened covers, which lifted off at any time that there was too much cement in the conveyor, leaving the revolving screw, obstructed from view by the loose cement, open and unguarded by a rail or other protection along the side of the conveyor. Plaintiff's duties were to replace these covers on the conveyor in case any of them came off or were forced off by the flow of the dry cement. It was also his duty to watch the tank into which the cement was dumped to ascertain whether the cement was flowing too rapidly or too slowly, and then to signal the operators in another part of the plant for either more or less cement. Along each side of the conveyor there was a runway leading to the top of the tank; at the lower end of the runway a platform and stairs were provided in case any one wished to pass over the conveyor from one runway to the other, and the employees were instructed not to cross over the conveyor except at this crossing.

On the day of the accident the plaintiff went below to give instructions to a new employee, who did not understand the signals. Upon his return along the right-hand runway he observed that one of the covers had been displaced by too great a flow of cement and one end rested on the left-hand runway. He climbed upon the conveyor box and attempted to lean down and over to the left side of the box to replace the cover. While in this position his leg came in contact with the unguarded revolving screw, resulting in the injury complained of.

On the issue of negligence the plaintiff relies upon the presumption of negligence specified in the act and upon the admitted fact that the revolving screw was left unguarded, while the defendant urges that the protected stairway and the instructions given its employees to use this stairway in crossing casts the entire fault upon the plaintiff. On the issue of insurance, the fact that defendant did not carry any is admitted, but the defendant excuses its failure to insure upon the ground that it had applied to the Industrial Accident Commission for "self-insurance," but that, through the neglect of the Commission, permission had not been granted at the time of the accident.

[1, 2] On the issue of negligence the evidence was all in support of the presumption found in the act that "the injury to the employee was a direct result and grew out of the negligence of the employer." This differentiates the case from those cited by appellant to the rule that against a proved fact, or a fact admitted, contrary to a presumption, the presumption has no weight, and there is no conflict. There was no conflict in the evidence as to the conditions under which the machinery was operated, and the jury's finding that these conditions did not constitute a safe place of employment cannot be disturbed. On the issue of contributory negligence of the employee this defense is expressly denied to the employer by the statute.

[3] Appellant complains of the ruling of the trial court refusing to permit it to show that it endeavored to obtain permission for "self-insurance" but was delayed through the fault of the state commission. The evidence was not material to the issues. The statute covers all cases in which the employer is not insured. The fact that an employer intended, or endeavored, to take out insurance has no bearing on the fact that he was not insured at the time of the injury.

[4] Criticism is also made of the ruling denying appellant the opportunity of showing that it had been proceeded against under the penal provisions of the statute and had been acquitted. There was no error in the ruling. If the state were seeking a penalty or forfeiture under the act its previous unsuccessful prosecution under the penal provisions of the act might be a bar, but here the employee is merely acting under the terms of the act which preserve his common-law right of an action for damages for personal injuries in lieu of compensation under the act when the employer, by his failure to insure, has not accepted the compensation features of the act. Certainly, if the state had no Compensation Act, but merely a penal statute making it a misdemeanor for an employer to fail to provide a safe place of employment, such statute, or a prosecution under it, could not affect the right of the employee to sue for damages for injuries resulting from the employer's negligence.

[5] The appellant attacks the provisions of the act as unconstitutional. The only cases cited to the point sustain acts containing somewhat similar provisions. Appellant's point is that to subject an employer to the penal provisions of the act and to require him to respond in damages to the employee would result in cruel and unusual punishment of the employer. We would need more than the mere suggestion of the point to hold an act of this character unconstitutional, and we do not feel that it is incumbent upon the court to search the authorities to support this attack upon the act.

[6, 7] In the same spirit the appellant has copied into the brief certain instructions with the bare statement that they were erroneous because covering grounds not specifically alleged in the complaint. The issues were fairly before the jury and we should not be required to analyze each instruction to ascertain if some error might have occurred. Complaint is also made that in some of the other instructions given on the issue of negligence the element of proximate cause was omitted, but the trial judge fully instructed the jury on this element and emphasized the necessity of finding that the negligence was the proximate cause of the injury before it could find for the respondent. It is not necessary that every element should be repeated in every instruction given.

Other points raised do not require consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

LARSON v. O'BRIEN. (Civ. 3698.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District. California. May 28, 1929.

Logs and logging 🔑3(13)—Agreement to sell and convey timber containing provision for forfeiture on default held not sale of timber precluding forfeiture for breach.

Agreement to sell and convey timber, providing that on noncompliance with terms seller shall be released from obligation to convey and purchaser shall forfeit payments made as liquidated damages, held not sale of timber, but agreement to sell, and time being made of essence of contract, trustee in bankruptcy of purchasers cannot avoid forfeiture after breach of such contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by Louis Larson against P. J. O'Brien, as trustee of the estates of Henry and Albert Christenson, bankrupts. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene S. Selvage, of Eureka, for appellant.

Denver Sevier and Kenneth D. Sevier, both of Eureka, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment quieting his title to 160 acres of land and "all the trees, timber and wood now growing or lying upon said property." The defendant has appealed from the judgment.

January 18, 1923, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with Henry and Albert Christenson, by the terms of which he agreed to sell and they to buy all the timber on the land mentioned, except certain parts thereof reserved by the plaintiff, for $8,500, of which sum $2,000 was paid on the execution of the agreement and the remainder was to be paid in installments of not less than $500 each, payable every six months thereafter. The Christensons were "to clear the timber off of" 80 acres of the land "on or before August 1, 1926, and the balance of the timber mentioned to be taken off on or before August 1, 1933." The agreement contained the following:

"In the event of a failure to comply with the terms hereof by the parties of the second part, the party of the first part shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey said property, and the parties of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto and all moneys theretofore paid hereunder shall be treated as liquidated damages for the nonfulfillment of this contract.

"And the party of the first part, on receiving such payment, at the times and in the manner above mentioned, agrees to execute and deliver to the parties of the second part, or to their assigns, a good and sufficient title conveying said property free and clear of all liens and incumbrances made, done or suffered by the party of the first part.

"And it is understood that the stipulations aforesaid are to apply to and bind the heirs, executors, administrators and assigns of the respective parties, and that time is of the essence of this agreement."

The Christensons proceeded under the agreement to cut and remove timber from the land and they made prompt payment of all installments as they fell due up to and including January 18, 1928, but no subsequent payments have been made. July 6, 1928, Albert Christenson was adjudged a bankrupt and on the 17th of the same month Henry Christenson also was adjudged a bankrupt. At the commencement of this action, August 21, 1928, the defendant, O'Brien, was the trustee in bankruptcy of the estates of both bankrupts.

Appellant argues the case on the assumption that the agreement constitutes a sale of the timber in question, but by its terms it is only an agreement to sell, and title was to be conveyed to the Christensons only on payment by them of the amount agreed upon, "at the times and in the manner above mentioned," and in the event of their default, the plaintiff was to be released from all obligation to convey the property, and the Christensons were to forfeit all right thereto and all moneys theretofore paid by them. The contract provides that "time is of the essence of this agreement." In the respects mentioned, the contract is unlike the one considered in Peterson v. Gibbs, 147 Cal. 1, 81 P. 121, 109 Am. St. Rep. 107, cited by appellant. That contract purported to "grant, bargain, sell and convey all the timber now standing, lying or being" on certain lands. The court said: "The terms of the instrument literally signify an absolute conveyance of the timber, and there is nothing in the provisions relied upon by plaintiff to impair the force of the plain words of present grant." In another part of the opinion it is said: "The question in each case is as to what is the contract between the parties." The contract herein, in which time is made of its essence, is only an agreement to sell and convey. It expressly provides for a forfeiture upon the default of the Christensons, and there is nothing to distinguish the case from numerous others in which forfeitures have been unheld. 25 Cal. Jur. 621; Pedrotti v. American Nat. Fire Ins. Co. (Cal. App.) 266 P. 376, and cases therein cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

COOK et al. v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6932.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. May 28, 1929.

Mandamus ⚷116—Writ lies to require board of supervisors of city and county of San Francisco to levy tax to pay judgment (St. 1901, p. 794).

Mandamus will lie to require board of supervisors of city and county of San Francisco to include, in tax levy, rate or sum sufficient to pay judgment either in whole or in annual aliquot parts, where judgment creditor has complied with St. 1901, p. 794. and there is no fund on hand from which such judgment may be paid.

Mandamus by William H. Cook and others against the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco and others to compel the appropriation of money to pay certain judgments against said City and County of San Francisco. Writ granted.

Peter A. Breen and Percy E. Towne, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Edmond P. Bergerot, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Proceeding in mandamus. It appears that the petitioners are owners of final judgments obtained respectively by them against the respondent city and county of San Francisco for the recovery of certain unlawful and void taxes paid by said petitioners under protest to said respondent. It further appears that heretofore on August 22, 1928, in compliance with the provisions of an act of the Legislature entitled "An Act to provide for the payment of judgments against counties, cities, cities and counties, and towns" (approved March 23, 1901 [St. 1901, p. 794]), the county clerk of said city and county of San Francisco duly filed with the auditor of said city and county and furnished to the board of supervisors thereof a complete list of all the then existing final judgments against said city and county of San Francisco of record in his office; that the auditor of said city and county thereupon duly examined and audited said final judgments and duly certified the amount thereof to the treasurer of said city and county, and that included in the said list of final judgments were the judgments above mentioned owned and held by the respective petitioners.

It is admitted that the petitioners have complied with all the provisions of said "Act to provide for the payments of judgments, etc.," but that said board of supervisors has failed, refused, and neglected to approve the demands of petitioners that said judgments be paid, and has refused to authorize the payment of said several judgments, and has refused to include in the tax levy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930 (being the next fiscal year after the filing and furnishing of the aforesaid list of judgments), a rate or sum sufficient to pay said final judgments, or to pay an aliquot part or fraction of the amount of said judgments not less than one-tenth of the whole.

It further appears from the petition that there is not at this time and will not be at any time during the current fiscal year any money in the surplus fund of said city and county, or in the treasury of said city and county, to the credit of said surplus fund, and no money has heretofore been appropriated or apportioned for the payment of said judgments, and there is no money in said treasury applicable to the payment of said judgments.

These averments of the petition being admitted by the respondents, it follows that the petitioners are entitled to the writ of mandate prayed for, commanding the respondent board of supervisors to include in the tax levy hereafter to be made for city and county purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, a rate or sum sufficient to pay said respective final judgments, or to include in said levy a sum sufficient to pay an aliquot part or fraction of each of said judgments (in no case less than one-tenth of the amount thereof); and commanding said respondent, in case it shall include in said levy a sum sufficient to pay only an aliquot part or fraction of each of said judgments, to thereafter levy in each successive year an aliquot part or fraction of said judgments (in no case less than one-tenth thereof) until the whole of said final judgments shall have been fully paid.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

SCHLECHT v. SCHLECHT. (Civ. 6707.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 28, 1929.

1. Divorce 🔑27(18)—Wife's refusal, without stating reason, to sign note for husband or deed or contract for sale, did not warrant divorce.

Wife's refusal to sign note to enable husband to borrow money, without stating reason for the refusal, causing derogatory comment among defendant's relatives and friends and injuring his credit and resulting in mental suffering, together with similar refusals to sign deeds to husband's separate property or to join in contract for sale, held not to warrant divorce on ground of extreme cruelty, since wife merely stood by her strict legal rights.

2. Divorce 🔑27(18)—Wife's passive indifference or lack of feeling on insisting upon her legal rights does not warrant divorce.

Mere passive indifference or lack of feeling upon part of wife in insisting upon her strict legal rights is not sufficient to support husband's charge of extreme cruelty in suit for divorce.

3. Divorce 🔑37(21)—Husband has right superior to wife to select matrimonial domicile.

Husband has right superior to wife to choose matrimonial domicile, and may sue wife for divorce on ground of desertion if she refuses to live in home which husband has furnished suitable to their station in life.

4. Divorce 🔑27(18)—Wife's refusal to permit husband to build new home, and sale of old home compelling husband to go with her to home of daughter, did not entitle husband to divorce.

Conduct of wife in refusing to permit husband to build a new home and in finally selling home in which they had been living, practically compelling husband to go with her and live at the home of their daughter and son-in-law, though it caused mental suffering, held not to constitute extreme cruelty warranting divorce at instance of husband.

5. Divorce 🔑49(2)—Husband continuing to live with wife six years after wife's concealment of his Liberty bonds condoned offense, barring divorce.

Conduct of wife in taking and concealing husband's Liberty bonds for purpose of annoying him and with a desire to keep the bonds, if constituting ground for divorce, was condoned by husband by continuing to live with wife for six years thereafter.

6. Husband and wife 🔑4—Husband having sufficient means of his own was not entitled to have wife support him, though he conveyed property to her.

Fact that husband had conveyed property to wife by way of property settlement sufficient to support her did not entitle him to be supported by his wife so long as he had sufficient means of his own.

7. Divorce 🔑27(18)—Wife's commencement of action against husband for separate maintenance, alleging that husband was consuming her resources, held not extreme cruelty warranting divorce for husband.

Wife's commencement of action for separate maintenance on ground that husband had refused to pay any sum towards her maintenance and was consuming plaintiff's private resources held not to constitute extreme cruelty such as to warrant decree for divorce in husband's favor.

8. Divorce 🔑27(18)—That wife gave husband cool reception and refused his offer of money as inadequate did not warrant divorce for extreme cruelty.

That defendant, on returning home from extended visit, met with very cool reception from wife, and that wife refused husband's offer of money for his living expenses as inadequate, held not ground for divorce as extreme cruelty.

9. Pleading 🔑225(2)—Sustaining demurrer without leave to amend to amended cross-complaint, filed after judgment dismissing original cross-complaint was set aside, was not abuse of discretion, and pleading could not be aided by facts not alleged.

Where demurrer was sustained to original cross-complaint without leave to amend, and judgment of dismissal subsequently entered was set aside, it was not an abuse of discretion to sustain a demurrer to the amended cross-complaint without leave to amend, and defendant was required to stand upon the allegations thereof without aid from other facts appearing in record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge.

Action by Ada J. Schlecht against Frank W. Schlecht for separate maintenance, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint for divorce. From a judgment dismissing the cross-complaint, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leo D. Daze, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. R. Young, Harlow Hurley, and Foster C. Bumpus, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. Appellant and respondent are husband and wife. In an action by respondent for separate maintenance appellant filed a cross-complaint for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. To appellant's first amended cross-complaint the court sustained a general demurrer without leave to amend, and from a judgment of dismissal following such order appellant has prosecuted this appeal.

[1, 2] The alleged acts of cruelty were separately set out in eight paragraphs. Paragraphs numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, and 6 all have to do with the failure of the respondent wife to join with appellant in signing certain legal documents. They may be considered conveniently together. Typical of these incidents is that alleged in paragraph 1. It is alleged in this paragraph that in 1895, approximately three years after the date of their marriage appellant was hard pressed for money and sought to borrow $800 from a relative. The relative insisted upon the respondent wife joining with appellant in signing this note. Respondent "refused to sign the said note and would give no reason for not signing said note, and refused to discuss the matter" with appellant. This refusal continued for about two weeks and caused discussion and comment derogatory to appellant among his relatives and friends, injured his credit, and humiliated and embarrassed him and caused him grievous mental suffering for many years. It is likewise alleged that respondent was indifferent to and unaffected by appellant's mental suffering, and that this in turn caused appellant additional mental suffering. Paragraphs 2, 5, and 6 have to do with similar refusals to sign deeds to parcels of appellant's separate property in 1901, 1922, and 1923, respectively, and paragraph 3 concerns a refusal to join appellant in signing a contract to sell certain real property in 1917. The allegations are not dissimilar in each instance.

Concerning these particular paragraphs counsel for appellant says in his opening brief: "While it is true that a wife has a right to refuse to sign any contract, deed, note or other instrument, yet in the exercise of that right she has no right to inflict the cruelty complained of in the first amended cross-complaint."

This concession would seem to dispose of these particular allegations. The wife in these transactions stood upon her strict legal rights. In so doing she may have proved unsympathetic, she may have refused to discuss the matters, as she also had a legal right to do, she may have been grasping and acquisitive, and she may have been indifferent to and unaffected by her husband's mental suffering; but while a husband may be unfortunate not to secure from his wife that whole-hearted sympathy and affection and co-operation which is the glory of the married state when it exists in full measure, the want of it, standing alone, has never been held in this state to constitute grounds for divorce, no matter how much suffering the husband may be subjected to thereby. So long as incompatibility of temperament is not recognized as a ground for divorce, we cannot hold that mere passive indifference or lack of feeling upon the part of a wife in insisting upon her strict legal rights is sufficient to support a charge of extreme cruelty.

[3, 4] Paragraph 7 recites that appellant, in 1913, purchased in the name of respondent a home for himself and respondent, and that thereafter on several occasions he requested respondent to permit him to build a new and better home for himself and respondent, but respondent in every case refused, and finally, in 1921, sold the home in which they had been living and "practically compelled" appellant to go with her and live at the home of their daughter and son-in-law, all of which caused appellant great and grievous mental suffering. Husbands, even in this day, have a few legal rights superior to their wives, one of which is the right to choose the matrimonial domicile, and if appellant had furnished a home suitable to their state of life and respondent had refused to live in it for the statutory period of one year, appellant might then have brought suit for divorce on the ground of desertion. But the mere success of the wife, in the give and take of the marriage relation, in imposing her will upon the husband in the matter of the choice of a home, cannot, in our judgment, constitute the extreme cruelty contemplated by the statute. If it should be held to do so, we have no doubt that there are thousands of husbands who, without now realizing it, would find themselves with good cause of action against their wives for divorce.

[5] Paragraph 4 is more serious in its nature. It charges that in 1921, at a time when appellant was sorely in need of money, respondent took and concealed Liberty bonds of value of $1,500, the separate property of appellant, and refused for a long time to admit that she had taken them, and that this was done to vex and annoy appellant and out of a mercenary desire to keep and own said bonds, and that this did annoy and worry appellant and cause him grievous mental suffering. We may concede that respondent in this respect acted in violation of appellant's legal rights, and that if this conduct did in fact cause appellant grievous mental suffering, as alleged, it might justify a court in granting him a divorce. But by continuing to live with respondent from 1921 to 1927 this conduct was condoned, unless the acts alleged in the last paragraph now to be discussed were sufficient to revive the right of action.

The last paragraph sets up: "That in December, 1925, appellant returned to California from an extended visit in South Dakota, suffering from diabetes, and went to the home of respondent, which she had received from appellant in 1922 as her separate property by reason of a property settlement between appellant and respondent effected at that time. That appellant "met with a very cool reception" from respondent, "who made it very clear" that appellant was not welcome, so that appellant went to a hotel to stay. That a few days later appellant obtained permission from respondent to live in a house belonging to respondent at Tujunga, and remained there about three weeks, when respondent came and told appellant that their daughter was worrying because appellant was old and sick and needed care, "and for her daughter's sake" appellant should come and live at respondent's residence. That it was arranged that appellant pay respondent $50 per month for his living expenses, which he continued to do until respondent left for a trip to South Dakota, during which time he paid $20 per month, to respondent and $30 per month to their daughter, with whom he was then living. That upon respondent's return from South Dakota, in October, 1926, appellant offered her $50, which she refused, saying: "I would take nothing before I would take that." That thereafter, on January 12, 1927, respondent caused to be served on appellant her verified complaint for separate maintenance, in which she alleged "that during the last four months plaintiff has demanded of defendant that he support and maintain the plaintiff; that the defendant has refused to pay any sum whatsoever, and now refuses to pay any sum towards the maintenance of the plaintiff, or plaintiff's and defendant's home, * * * still lives at the plaintiff's and defendant's home, and is fast consuming the plaintiff's private resources * * * and has stated that he will not support or maintain the plaintiff." That these allegations were untrue and known to be so by respondent, in that appellant had offered to pay respondent $50 per month, which she had refused, and respondent then owed appellant $555, as she afterwards admitted in court, and that, furthermore, in 1922 appellant had amply provided for respondent's support by a certain property settlement agreement. It is further alleged that all of these facts caused appellant grievous mental suffering.

[6, 7] It is evident, of course, that the suit for separate maintenance was the outcome of a difference of opinion between the spouses as to the amount which should be contributed by the husband to their common support. Conceding that appellant had by way of property settlement conveyed to respondent property amply sufficient to support her, that did not entitle him, so long as he had sufficient means of his own, to be supported by his wife. When she insisted on more than $50 per month, he refused to pay it. It is futile for us to attempt to say who was right in this dispute, but there was a dispute which the wife decided to settle by resort to law. She may have chosen the wrong remedy, and she may, willfully or otherwise, have included in her complaint allegations that exceeded the truth. If she did, the appellant would have his day in court and ample opportunity to defend. The mere bringing of the action in an attempt to settle their respective rights could not be construed as extreme cruelty, and while the courts have held that charges of adultery or gross immorality falsely made in a complaint may constitute extreme cruelty, no case can be found where allegations of the sort herein made by respondent have been held sufficient to do so. The allegations of the complaint for separate maintenance above set out fall so far short of any allegations which have been held to constitute cruelty that we are satisfied the trial court properly held that they did not do so.

[8] The "coolness" of the wife in 1925 and the subsequent bickerings are also clearly insufficient and were apparently condoned.

We have given this appeal a fuller consideration than its importance, and the facts involved would seem to justify because of the apparent earnestness of counsel for appellant in presenting his case on appeal. We have examined all of the cases cited by appellant: Avery v. Avery, 148 Cal. 239, 82 P. 967; Carpenter v. Carpenter, 30 Kan. 744, 2 P. 122, 46 Am. Rep. 108; Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 P. 298, 16 L. R. A. 660; Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 184, 52 P. 298; Curl v. Curl, 130 Cal. 638, 63 P. 65; MacDonald v. MacDonald, 155 Cal. 665, 102 P. 927, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 45; Brandt v. Brandt, 178 Cal. 548, 174 P. 55; McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 176, 190 P. 460; Davis v. Davis, 58 Cal. App. 100, 207 P. 923. In none of them do we find a set of facts at all similar to those set out in the amended cross-complaint or anything which leads us to believe that the allegations of the amended cross-complaint are sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

[9] Appellant seeks to bolster the allegations of the amended cross-complaint by certain facts appearing in the record, but not set out or referred to in his pleading. In view of the fact that a demurrer was sustained to the original cross-complaint without leave to amend and a judgment of dismissal entered thereon, and that this judgment was set aside on motion of appellant to permit the filing of his amended cross-complaint, the trial court was entitled to assume that the amended cross-complaint fully set out the facts. It was not an abuse of discretion to sustain the demurrer to the amended cross-complaint without leave to amend under such circumstances, and appellant must stand upon the allegations which he has seen fit to make.

Judgment affirmed.

In re BRYAN'S ESTATE.★

BON v. CRANE.

(Civ. 6804.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 23, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 19, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 22, 1929.

1. Executors and administrators 🔑380(2)—Devisee of remainder held barred 34 years after probate sale of property from maintaining suit for recovery thereof, though executrix who sold property was life tenant (Code Civ. Proc. § 1573).

Person designated in will as remainderman held barred, after lapse of 34 years from sale of property by executrix, from maintaining suit for recovery thereof as against person claiming under the probate sale under Code Civ. Proc. § 1573, though executrix of testator's estate was also life tenant in the property sold, where she never acquired possession of property as life tenant, and acted relative thereto merely in representative capacity.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑75—Executor represents heirs and devisees as trustee.

Executor is agent of heirs and devisees, representing them as trustee.

3. Executors and administrators 🔑380(2)—Statute limiting actions for property sold by representative to 3 years after settlement of final account runs after lapse of reasonable time for settlement, where no account is filed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1573).

Where personal representative fails to file final account, Code Civ. Proc, § 1573, limiting actions for recovery of property sold by executor or administrator to period of 3 years after settlement of final account, commences to run after lapse of reasonable time in which to obtain such settlement.

4. Executors and administrators 🔑380(2)—What constituted reasonable time for settlement of final account as regards limitation against action to recover property sold by executrix held question for trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 1573).

In suit by person given property as remainderman under will, for recovery of property against defendant claiming under sale thereof by personal representative, what constituted reasonable time for settlement of final account of executrix, for purpose of determining when limitation period, in absence of actual settlement of final account, would run under Code Civ. Proc. § 1573, held one for trial court, to be determined under all the circumstances of the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by Mary Jane Bryan Bon against Richard L. Crane to terminate the life estate of Elizabeth Bryan, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Schooler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Gale & Gale, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued under section 1723 of the Code of Civil Procedure to terminate the life estate of Elizabeth Bryan in real property situated in Sonoma county. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff has appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

Thomas J. Bryan died testate on April 19, 1882. His wife, Elizabeth Bryan, was named as executrix in the will, and to her he left, during her lifetime, all his estate, both real and personal, and upon her death he devised to all his children then living all this estate, to be divided equally between them. Six children of the union survived the mother, whose death occurred July 9, 1924; they are now the sole heirs at law claiming under this will, and the plaintiff, who is one of these surviving children, sues on behalf of herself and the other five.

During the course of the administration of the estate of Thomas J. Bryan, Elizabeth Bryan, as executrix thereof, petitioned the probate court for leave to sell the property now in dispute. In conformity with an order of sale therefor, the property was sold to one J. L. Winans on August 21, 1891. The purchaser thereupon entered into possession and executed a mortgage thereon. In pursuance of foreclosure proceedings of this mortgage the property was sold to one Nancy Crane on September 14, 1896, and in February, 1919, she deeded it to her son, Richard L. Crane, the defendant and respondent herein, who has since been in exclusive possession.

As a special defense to the action, the defendant pleaded section 1573 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that: "No action for the recovery of any estate sold by an executor or administrator, under the provisions of this chapter, can be maintained by an heir or other person claiming under the decedent, unless it be commenced within three years next after the settlement of the final account of the executor or administrator." The trial court found that plaintiff's action was barred by the provisions of this section, and the correctness of this finding presents the only question on this appeal.

Appellant contends that the petition for the order of sale of the real estate was defective because it did not comply with the terms of the Code; that the sale was therefore void; and that no title passed thereunder. She then argues that, because she and her five brothers were remaindermen under the will of Thomas J. Bryan, deceased, and succeeded as such to the title of his property upon the death of the life tenant, no claim of adverse possession would begin to run against them until July 9, 1924, the date of the death of Elizabeth Bryan.

[1, 2] Respondent, for the sake of the argument, concedes the invalidity of the original sale made in 1891, but contends that the appellant is barred from attacking the transfer by the provisions of section 1573. In this connection it is pointed out that the sale was not made by the life tenant, but it was made by the executrix of the estate. No distribution of the property in suit had been made and no decree had been entered adjudging that Mrs. Bryan was entitled to a life estate or that she took the property as a life tenant. Appellant argues for the application of the rule that a life tenant cannot, by his dealings with the life estate, make his grantee's possession adverse to a remainderman during the term of the life estate. He cites Pryor v. Winter, 147 Cal. 554, 559, 82 P. 202, 109 Am. St. Rep. 162; Akley v. Bassett, 189 Cal. 625, 643, 209 P. 576; Newport v. Hatton, 195 Cal. 132, 144, 231 P. 987; Thompson v. Pacific Electric Railway Co. (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 220; and other cases to the same point. There is no quarrel with the cases cited, but the rule is not applicable to the case at hand. Here the fact is that the property was sold by the estate, and that it was not sold by the life tenant. In fact, the life tenant never acquired possession of the property as such, and did not do anything as a life tenant to defeat or prejudice the interest of the remaindermen. All her acts relating to the administration and sale of the property were done as executrix of the estate. As such she was the agent of the appellant and of the other heirs under the well-settled rule that the executrix represented the heirs, she as the trustee, they as the cestuis.

Returning to the Code section, it will be noted that it prohibits any action by any heir or other person claiming under the decedent for the recovery of any estate sold by an executor or an administrator, unless such suit be commenced within 3 years next after the settlement of the final account of the executor or administrator. Here it is conceded that the action was not commenced until 34 years after the probate sale. The case is therefore controlled by Dennis v. Bint, 122 Cal. 46, 54 P. 378, 68 Am. St. Rep. 17, and the authorities which have uniformly followed it adhere to the rule that this statute is intended for the protection of those who have remained in possession under color of title believed to be good, and that this protection was not intended to be withheld indefinitely at the option of those who did not assert some invalidity in the sale.

[3, 4] The question remains as to when the statute begins to run in a case of this character. The section fixes the time as of the settlement of the final account. Here it is conceded that, though the executrix remained as such from July 17, 1882, down to the time of her death, on July 9, 1924, she did not file a final account. The same question arose in Dennis v. Bint, supra, and it was held that the statute gave a reasonable time in which to obtain settlement of the final account, and that, failing in this, the statute began to run with the same effect. What is a reasonable time for such purpose is, of course, a question to be determined in each case upon all the facts and circumstances arising. It is a question which is to be determined by the trial court in the first instance. Here the trial court determined the question adversely to the appellant, and, as the appellant has not asserted error in this respect, such determination is final upon this appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SEITZ et al. (Cr. 1759.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 14, 1929.

1. Indictment and information 🔑71—Indictment need only name offense and inform defendant of particulars of charge (Pen. Code, § 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043).

Under Pen. Code, § 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, indictment need only name offense charged and inform defendant of particulars of charge, so that he may fully prepare defense; proviso that it shall never be necessary to present allegations of matter not essential to be proved not requiring allegations essential to be proved.

2. Insurance 🔑31—Indictment charging violation of statute defining offense of disposing of property to defraud insurer sufficiently specified offense (Pen. Code, § 548, and § 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043).

Indictment charging violation of Pen. Code, § 548, "a felony," sufficiently specified offense, as required by section 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043; inspection of former section furnishing sufficient information of nature of crime of destroying, abandoning, and disposing of insured property with intent to defraud insurer.

3. Insurance 🔑31—Indictment for destroying, abandoning, and disposing of property insured "against theft" held sufficient, though statute requires that property be insured "against loss or damage" by theft (Pen. Code, § 548, and § 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043).

Indictment charging that defendants, on or about certain date in named county, "did willfully, unlawfully and feloniously destroy, abandon and dispose of" personal property, particularly described, and alleged to have been insured "against theft," sufficiently informed defendant of particulars of charge, as required by Pen.

Code, § 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, though section 548 requires that property disposed of be insured "against loss or damage" by theft.

4. Insurance 🔑31—Intent to defraud insurer need not be alleged in indictment for destroying, abandoning, and disposing of insured property (Pen. Code, § 548, and § 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043).

Specific intent to defraud insurer, prescribed by Pen. Code, § 548, as assential element of crime of destroying, abandoning, and disposing of insured personalty, is not one of particulars of offense, which section 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, requires to be stated in indictment; such particulars being date when and county in which crime was committed and nature of personalty disposed of.

5. Indictment and information 🔑19—Court should so construe Code amendments respecting forms of indictments as to hasten administration of criminal law and destroy procedural pitfalls to fullest extent compatible with due protection of right to clear and informing statement of charges (Pen. Code, §§ 951, 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043).

Court should so construe amendments of Pen. Code, §§ 951, 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, respecting forms of indictments, as to speed up administration of criminal law and destroy its procedural pitfalls to fullest extent compatible with due protection of right of all persons to clear, explicit, and informing statement of criminal charges against them.

6. Criminal law 🔑1167(4)—Amendment of indictment for disposing of insured personalty to defraud insurer by striking allegations as to fraudulent statement and claim of loss, held harmless as merely eradicating duplicity (Pen. Code, §§ 548, 549).

Amendment of indictment for destroying, abandoning, and disposing of insured personalty and making sworn statement and claim of loss with intent to defraud insurer by striking allegations as to such statement and claim held harmless to defendant as merely eradicating duplicitous character of indictment, which charged crime under Pen. Code, § 549, as well as section 548.

7. Criminal law 🔑427(4)—Testimony as to defendant's statement concerning arrangement with codefendant for latter's robbery by witness, preliminary to insurance collection, held hearsay, and incompetent to prove conspiracy (Pen. Code, § 548; Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 6).

In prosecution, under Pen. Code, § 548, for disposing of insured personalty with intent to defraud insurer by means of fake robbery, testimony of one perpetrating robbery as to conversation wherein defendant told witness of arrangement with codefendant and others to relieve them of their diamonds at a party, preliminary to insurance collection, held inadmissible as hearsay, and not competent to prove conspiracy, preliminary to introduction of conspirator's declaration against coconspirator under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 6.

8. Criminal law 🔑427(4)—Conspirator's declaration is inadmissible to prove conspiracy (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 6).

The declaration of an alleged conspirator cannot be admitted in evidence to prove the fact of conspiracy, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 6.

9. Criminal law 🔑427(4)—Evidence held not to show conspiracy to dispose of insured personalty with intent to defraud insurer by means of fake robbery (Pen. Code, § 548).

In trial under Pen. Code, § 548, for disposing of insured personalty with intent to defraud insurer by means of fake robbery, evidence held not to show organization of conspiracy between defendant and others for purpose of committing such crime.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wiliam T. Aggeler, Judge.

Evan B. Seitz and Ollie Lowe were indicted, and the latter convicted, for feloniously destroying, abandoning, and disposing of insured jewelry with intent to defraud the insurer, and defendant Lowe appeals. Reversed.

W. Joseph Ford, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and L. G. Campbell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

WORKS, P. J. Defendant was convicted of a violation of section 548 of the Penal Code. She appeals both from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying her motion for a new trial.

The prosecution of appellant was based upon an indictment, the charging portion of which, as appellant terms it, read as follows, the italics being ours:

"That the said Evan B. Seitz and Ollie Lowe, on or about the 12th day of April, 1927, at and in the County of Los Angeles, State of California, did wilfully, unlawfully, and feloniously destroy, abandon and dispose of certain diamonds and jewelry, towit: One diamond brooch of the value of Eighteen Hundred Dollars ($1,800.00) in gold coin of the United States; one gold and platinum earring of the value of Eight Hundred Dollars ($800.00), gold coin of the United States; one ring containing three diamonds of the value of Twenty-Four Hundred and Twenty-Five Dollars ($2,425.00) in gold coin of the United States; one black opal ring of the value of Five Hundred Dollars ($500.00) in gold coin of the United States; one white gold dinner ring of the value of Sixteen Hundred Dollars ($1,600.00), in gold coin of the United States, all of the aggregate value of Seven Thousand One Hundred Twenty-five Dollars ($7,125.00) lawful money of the United States, which said property was at the time of such destroying, secreting, abandoning and disposing of, insured against theft; that on the 16th day of June, 1927, the said defendants, Evan B. Seitz and Ollie Lowe, did wilfully, unlawfully, falsely, fraudulently and feloniously make a sworn statement and claim loss covering the said jewelry and diamonds, with the intent then and there and thereby to defraud and prejudice the insurer."

During the trial, the court ordered an amendment, of the indictment, which was made by striking out the italicized passage in the original as above copied and by inserting new matter. Upon the indictment as thus amended, the trial proceeded. The alleged charging portion of the amended pleading read, with the inserted new matter designated by italics, thus:

"That the said Evan B. Seitz and Ollie Lowe, on or about the 12th day of April, 1927, at and in the County of Los Angeles, State of California, did wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously destroy, abandon and dispose of certain diamonds and jewelry, towit: One diamond brooch of the value of Eighteen Hundred Dollars ($1,800.00) in gold coin of the United States; one gold and platinum earring of the value of Eight Hundred Dollars ($800.00), gold coin of the United States; one ring containing three diamonds of the value of Twenty-four Hundred and Twenty-five Dollars ($2,425.00) in gold coin of the United States; one black opal ring of the value of Five Hundred Dollars ($500.00) in gold coin of the United States; one white gold dinner ring of the value of Sixteen Hundred Dollars ($1,600.00), in gold coin of the United States, all of the aggregate value of Seven Thousand One Hundred Twenty-five Dollars ($7,125.00) lawful money of the United States, which said property was at the time of such destroying, secreting, abandoning and disposing of, insured against loss or damage by theft; and with the intent thereby to defraud and prejudice the insurer."

In addition, however, to the so-called charging matter, the indictment, both before and after amendment, contained the following preliminary statement:

"[T]he said Evan B. Seitz and Ollie Lowe are accused by the Grand Jury of the County of Los Angeles, State of California, by this indictment, of the crime of violation of section 548 of the Penal Code of the State of California, a felony, committed at and in the County of Los Angeles, State of California, and before the finding of this indictment as follows, towit." Then followed, in the original indictment and in the indictment as amended, respectively, the so-called charging portions which are above set forth.

Section 548 of the Penal Code is directed against any person who "wilfully burns, or in any other manner injures, destroys, secretes, abandons, or disposes of any property which at the time is insured against loss or damage by fire, or theft, or embezzlement, or any casualty with intent to defraud or prejudice the insurer," while section 549 of the same Code declares it a crime to present, or cause to be presented, "any false or fraudulent claim, or any proof in support of any such claim, upon any contract or policy of insurance or indemnity whatsoever," etc. It now becomes material to inquire whether the indictment, as it was couched when it left the grand jury, charged a violation of section 548, as appellant contends that it laid only an offense under section 549, this because the specific intent alleged in the pleading followed, and was in such close juxtaposition with, the allegation concerning an event of June 16, and was so far removed from the reference to the event which is of interest upon a charge under section 548, that of April 12.

[1-3] If we concede that the allegation as to specific intent contemplated the act of June 16 and not that of April 12, we are yet far from a determination that the indictment as originally framed did not charge a violation of section 548. It is clear that before the session of the Legislature which was held in 1927 it was necessary to allege in an indictment or information any specific intent which was an essential element of the crime charged by it. 14 Cal. Jur. 56. Whether such an allegation is now necessary—whether, we should say, it was necessary in the present instance—is a question to be examined here. Section 952 of the Penal Code, as amended in the year named, provides in part: "In charging an offense, each count shall contain, and shall be sufficient if it contains in substance, a statement that the accused has committed some public offense therein specified. Such statement may be made in ordinary and concise language without any technical averments or any allegations of matter not essential to be proved. It may be in the words of the enactment describing the offense or declaring the matter charged to be a public offense, or in any words sufficient to give the accused notice of the offense of which he is charged." St. 1927, p. 1043.

The striking features of this enactment are that every criminal charge shall contain "a statement that the accused has committed some public offense therein specified," and that it may be made "in any words sufficient to give the accused notice of the offense of [with] which he is charged." In addition to the statement of these two requisites of every such charge, the Legislature has also included in the section a sentence explanatory of the method in which they are to be supplied. The offense may be specified, and the accused may be given notice of the nature of it "in ordinary and concise language," without "technical averments," provided also that it shall never be necessary to present "allegations of matter not essential to be proved." It is to be observed, as most material to a construction of section 952, that the clause from which quotation is last above made is not susceptible of the interpretation that the charge must contain any allegations whatever which are "essential to be proved." In other words, the clause is negative and not affirmative. We conclude, then, that the only essentials of a criminal complaint are, first, that the offense charged be named; second, that the defendant be given notice of the offense, that is, that he be informed of the particulars of the charge to the end that he may prepare fully the defense contemplated by law. In the present instance the first of these requisites is furnished by the preliminary statement in the indictment to the effect that appellant was charged with "the crime of violation of section 548 of the Penal Code" of the state, "a felony." This specification of the offense could not have been made more plain. It was as specific and direct as the charge that one has murdered or has manslaughtered another—a form of allegation which is sufficient (Pen. Code, § 951, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043; People v. Berg [Cal. App.] 274 P. 433)—for an inspection of section 548 furnishes as full information of the nature of the crime charged as do the words "murdered" or "manslaughtered," as the meaning of those words can be ascertained only by an examination of the statute. Under the present indictment as originally framed, the second requisite prescribed by section 952 of the Code is complied with, in that the pleading states the date and venue of the offense charged, and alleges that the defendants "did wilfully, unlawfully, and feloniously destroy, abandon and dispose of" personal property which is described with particularity, and which is alleged to have been insured "against theft." As to this latter matter we note, of course, that section 548 provides that, to constitute the crime there denounced, the personal property disposed of must be insured "against loss or damage" by theft, etc. We think the allegation here appearing showed a sufficient compliance with the statute.

[4, 5] Having come to the conclusion expressed in the last preceding paragraph, after a somewhat general consideration, it is proper before leaving the subject to notice further one of the specific points involved in it. Viewing the indictment as it left the grand jury as an attempt to allege a violation of section 548, why was it unnecessary to allege the specific intent prescribed by the section as an essential element of the offense defined by it? We have said above that section 952 prescribes two requisites of a criminal charge; that the crime be named and that its particulars be stated. We think that the specific intent mentioned in section 548 is not one of the particulars of an offense charged under it. Those particulars are the date upon which and the county within which the crime was committed, and the nature of the personal property alleged to have been "disposed of," etc., this latter to be shown by a specific description of the article or articles of which disposition has been made. The intent named in the section is an element of the crime defined by it—of all of the crimes charged under it—and the intent is specified when the crime is named in the indictment or information, as it was here by the allegation that the defendants were charged with a violation of section 548. If this conclusion be too strong for the stomach of the adept in the science of criminal pleading, let him remember that it was the evident intention of the Legislature, in amending sections 951 and 952, to throw mere form to the winds, a thing which might well have been done long ago. The Legislature having declared itself against the subtler intricacies of criminal pleading, it is our duty to embrace and to enforce the policy to the extreme of reason, and we mean to say by the expression thus employed that we should so construe the amendments to the Code as to speed up the administration of the criminal law and to destroy its pitfalls on the procedural side to the fullest extent that is compatible with a due protection of the right of all persons to a clear, explicit, and informing statement of criminal charges preferred against them. In the present instance we think the defendants were informed by the indictment as originally drawn, considering it as charging an offense under section 548, of everything it was necessary for them to know in preparing for their defense. If that is true, they can ask no more.

[6] It was therefore unnecessary to amend the indictment except for a reason which has not yet been mentioned. We are satisfied that the pleading charged a crime under section 549 as well as under section 548, and that the sole beneficial effect of the amendment ordered by the trial court was to eradicate this duplicitous character of the indictment. It is plain that appellant was not harmed by the amendment.

[7] The prosecution of appellant proceeded upon the theory that she had conspired with others to take her jewelry from her by means of a "fake" robbery to which she was to be subjected, and that the conspiracy was carried out. And it is plain that the consummation of the crime must have been preceded by the formation of a conspiracy, for it is obvious that appellant could not have robbed herself. Before we go to the consideration of the question whether the evidence was sufficient to prove the conspiracy, we shall set down the undisputed story of the robbery, for one actually occurred, whether it was "faked" or real. Mrs. Lowe and a Mrs. Brown went visiting one afternoon at the home of a Mrs. Cummins. Some other women also came in a little later. As the ladies were about to partake of some gin fizzes made from a small bottle of liquor which had been brought to the place by Mrs. Lowe, the doorbell rang. Two men were admitted, upon the statement of one of them that they were federal officers and had reason to believe that liquor was on the premises. This spokesman was one Schaeffer, who was shown at the trial to be a man of many aliases and the possessor of a long criminal record. Among his associates, as he testified himself, he revelled in the impressive title, the Iron Duke. When he and his companion had procured access to the house, the Iron Duke took three of the women, one by one, into a room other than that in which the assembled company was now gathered, and despoiled them of their jewelry. Specifically, he took from Mrs. Lowe the articles described in the indictment. Upon this consummation of their business the two robbers departed with their loot, actual or pretended. Be it understood here that the Iron Duke had never seen Mrs. Lowe before he and his companion made their entry into the house of Mrs. Cummins.

When the trial of appellant commenced, the Iron Duke was the first witness called to the stand. The prosecution at once embarked upon an endeavor to prove by him the alleged conspiracy to enact a pretended robbery, but objections to the testimony were sustained for the time being. Evidence was then introduced showing the events surrounding the robbery; Mrs. Cummins and other women who were present on the occasion being called for the purpose. Toward the close of the prosecution's case, the Iron Duke again took the witness stand. He related conversations with appellant's codefendant, Evan B. Seitz, over objections, during which Seitz told him that he had an arrangement with "a few" women whereby they were to be "relieved of their diamonds" while at a party, and that it was an "insurance collection." Seitz asked the witness to "do the job and relieve them of their stones," this for the reason that, as Seitz said, he was known by some of the uninitiated who were to be at the party. The Iron Duke said that Seitz drove him to the Cummins house and pointed it out as the place where the party was to occur, and the witness went to the place once alone to look the situation over. Other details of the alleged plan were related by him. Seitz himself was not a witness at the trial.

There was no evidence of the alleged conspiracy, we think, unless it be found in the testimony of the Iron Duke. Certain other evidence in the case is looked to by the Attorney General as laying a foundation for the testimony of that individual, but this latter evidence could, we believe, serve no higher purpose than to corroborate the testimony of the Iron Duke, who was an accomplice, if anything, if it were first determined that his testimony was admissible. Respondent, in other words, attempts to render certain evidence which might furnish a corroboration of the story of the formation of the conspiracy into a sufficient introduction to a recital of that story. There is thus furnished a typical instance of the placing of the cart before the horse, and we do not here refer to the order of proof. In order to justify this remark, we must be more specific. Respondent says, in reply to appellant's opening brief: "Appellant first urges the point that the testimony of Schaeffer as to the existence of a conspiracy to commit the crime, in which the defendant was one of the conspirators, and acts in carrying out such conspiracy must fall for want of proof of the conspiracy aliunde." In the first place, this is not a proper reflection of the attitude taken by appellant. The first point made by her is, as indicated by a heading in her brief: "The fact of a conspiracy cannot be proved by evidence of declarations of a co-conspirator." In this division of the brief no reference is made to what respondent several times refers to as "the aliunde rule." The second portion of appellant's brief is headed: "The acts, conduct and relations between Seitz and Schaeffer outside the presence and hearing, and without the knowledge, of Mrs. Lowe were improperly introduced in evidence by the prosecution." And under this head appellant thus refers to "the aliunde rule," by respondent so called: "It is hardly necessary to quote authorities to the effect that neither the acts of the witness Schaeffer, alias the Iron Duke (whether testified to by himself or others), or the acts of Seitz, outside the presence and hearing of Mrs. Lowe, are admissible until it has first been established by proof aliunde that Mrs. Lowe had entered into a conspiracy with them, and then such conspiracy having been established, any acts, conduct or conversations done or made in pursuance of the conspiracy, and during the pendency of the conspiracy, would, of course, be admissible." It will thus be seen that appellant distinctly makes the point that testimony of the Iron Duke concerning anything happening out of the presence or without the knowledge of appellant could be admissible only after due proof of a conspiracy, and then only for the purpose of proving acts done pursuant to the illicit concord. Respondent fails to meet this point. The Attorney General makes no contention that a conspiracy had been proved up to the time when the Iron Duke took the witness stand and was permitted to recite the declarations of Seitz, or that one was proved at any stage of the case by any other witness. This extract from respondent's brief will serve to show the ground upon which an affirmance of the judgment is asked: "There is no doubt about the law being that a conviction cannot be had upon testimony of a conspirator or conspirators without corroboration by testimony outside of and beyond that given by the conspirator himself, but in this case we say that the proposition so advanced by counsel for appellant is met with our earnest contention that the record shows proof, outside of that of the conspirator, that fully satisfies the requirements of the law in that regard."

Following this statement, there is set down a list of the items of the evidence which, in the opinion of the writer of the brief, satisfies what he terms "the aliunde rule." These items may be listed thus:

(1) When the Iron Duke and his companion rang the doorbell at the house of Mrs. Cummins, appellant and a maid employed by the hostess were engaged together in mixing drinks for the party. The maid testified that Mrs. Lowe offered to answer the bell, but that the maid did so herself. The girl also testified that Mrs. Lowe remarked, when the men said they were officers, "Let them in, let them in."

(2) There was testimony that, while the robbers were in the house, appellant was calm, the other ladies being excited.

(3) Appellant took a small bottle of gin to the party.

(4) Before taking Mrs. Brown to the house of Mrs. Cummins, appellant telephoned the latter that they were coming. Mrs. Cummins answered that she had something else to do that day, but appellant persuaded her to put it off until the next day.

(5) Appellant, who had known her codefendant Seitz some considerable time before the robbery, as a lodger in one of the hotels or rooming houses owned by her, made application for a bond for his release on bail after he was arrested.

(6) After the robbery, appellant presented to an insurance company a claim of loss upon the diamonds which had been taken from her, and she later telephoned an insurance adjuster that she would be willing to withdraw the claim in order to procure the release of some man who was in jail.

(7) After the robbery, appellant inspected a "line-up" of prisoners at the jail, among whom was the Iron Duke, and said there was no one in the line whom she recognized.

(8) When appellant and Mrs. Brown were "about to leave" the house of Mrs. Cummins, the robbery not yet having occurred, some other ladies telephoned that they were coming to the place, whereupon appellant asked Mrs. Brown to remain longer, saying that she knew some of those who had telephoned and wanted to see them, and Mrs. Brown assented.

We think it would be a perversion of the law of conspiracy to say that the story of the Iron Duke, reciting the conversation between him and Seitz, was proper evidence. Giving the narrative its full strength, it amounted to no more than a repetition to the jury of a declaration of Seitz that he and appellant had joined in an unlawful concord to defraud the insurers of appellant's diamonds against loss or damage by theft. We think, therefore, that the testimony was plain hearsay. Nor was it admissible under any exception to the hearsay rule. Certainly it was not proper under any of the peculiarities of the law of conspiracy. After proof of a conspiracy, the act or declaration of a conspirator relating to the conspiracy may be received in evidence against his coconspirator (Code Civ. Proc., § 1870, subd. 6), and the Supreme Court has shown in a late case that such a declaration may not be received for the purpose of proving the conspiracy. There the court said, concerning certain books of account: "But it is asserted that these books were admissible as a declaration of Cox, a coconspirator, made during the period of the conspiracy, and in furtherance thereof. If the books were in fact the acts or declarations of Cox, and the record otherwise showed evidence warranting the finding that a conspiracy existed between the appellant and Cox, this position would be sound, provided always that the jury was told that the acts and declarations of a coconspirator were not binding, unless and until, independent of such declarations and acts, a conspiracy had been shown beyond a reasonable doubt to exist, and in no case should such declarations be received as proof of the conspiracy." People v. Doble, 265 P. 184.

[8] As we have already observed, the crime with which appellant and Seitz were charged, considering the theory of the prosecution, could not have been perpetrated without a precedent arrangement whereby some person was to "rob" appellant, in other words, without the formation of a conspiracy. These circumstances render the language of the Supreme Court in another case peculiarly apposite, the italics being those of the opinion itself: "The existence of a conspiracy was a fact to be proven in the case. Without such proof the defendant could not be convicted, as it is not claimed that he was present at the killing, or knew of it until some hours after it occurred. Now, the declaration of Prewett, Fowles, or of any other alleged conspirator, could not be admitted to prove the fact of conspiracy. Such declaration would be rejected, 'lest,' as Greenleaf says, 'The jury should be misled to infer the fact itself of a conspiracy from the declaration of strangers.' (1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 111.) 'After proof of conspiracy, the act or declaration of a conspirator against his coconspirator, and relating to the conspiracy,' is the restriction which is placed upon the evidence of coconspirators by our Code of Civil Procedure, section 1870, lest the jury take the declaration of one not proven by other evidence to be a conspirator, as proof of the conspiracy itself, and then, 'after proof of conspiracy,' by such declarations, use the same evidence to establish the guilt of the defendant." People v. Irwin, 77 Cal. 494, 20 P. 56.

[9] It is clear to us that the eight items of evidence above listed, and relied upon by respondent as showing a compliance with what is termed "the aliunde rule," show not the slightest indication of the organization of a conspiracy between appellant and any one for the purpose of committing the crime denounced by section 548 of the Penal Code. If they show anything whatever under the law of conspiracy, they are as well susceptible of the interpretation that there was a concord between appellant and the Iron Duke, under which the latter was actually to rob the women other than appellant who were present at the party, and pretendedly to rob appellant, as that the purpose was to violate section 548. But we think the items made no proof whatever of the formation of a conspiracy. Such a character of evidence might, under imaginable circumstances, satisfy the rule of law requiring a corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, but it is a far cry from that to the kind or degree of evidence which will prove a conspiracy.

The conclusion we reach on this question has nothing to do with the order of proof. That, of course, the court had the right to direct. The eight items of evidence were simply insufficient to bear the burden which respondent seeks to impose upon them, whatever the stage of the trial at which they were developed.

From the foregoing, we conclude that the trial court erred in receiving the Iron Duke's recital of his conversation with Seitz, that there was no proof of a conspiracy, and that the corpus delicti was not established.

We think it unnecessary to consider other points made by appellant.

Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: CRAIG, J.; IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

BRYAN v. BANKS et al. (Civ. 6738.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 15, 1929.

Rehearing Denied June 14, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 11, 1929.

1. Corporations ⚷30(6)—Corporation having received partnership assets, and having acknowledged obligation to pay partnership note, held liable thereon.

Where corporation to which partnership transferred its assets, and all of whose stock was owned by the two former partners, agreed to assume, obligation of partnership note given for such assets, held that corporation, having received benefits of partnership assets with consent of owners of all its stock, and having ratified and acknowledged debt, could not escape liability on such agreement by plea that contract was made without observing formal requisites prescribed by its charter or by-laws with respect to making of contracts or because of the interest of directors who owned all its stock in subject-matter of contract.

2. Corporations ⚷1—Both law and equity will, to prevent fraud and accomplish justice, treat stockholders and corporation as identical.

Though it is general rule that a corporation is an entity separate and distinct from its stockholders, both law and equity will, when necessary to circumvent fraud, protect rights of third persons and accomplish justice, disregard this distinct existence, and treat them as identical.

3. Corporations ⚷30(6)—Corporation having received benefit of property conveyed to partnership for latter's note, received consideration for its contract to indemnify partners for their liability on note.

Where corporation to which partnership transferred its assets, and all of whose stock was owned by former two partners, agreed to assume, for benefits derived from partnership, obligation of partnership note given for such assets and to hold former partners harmless from liability on note, there was no merit in contention that corporation received no consideration for its contract of indemnity.

4. Indemnity ⚷15(6)—Defense of lack of consideration for indemnity contract was unavailable, where contract was written and lack of consideration was not pleaded (Civ. Code, § 1614).

Under Civ. Code, § 1614, lack of consideration for contract of indemnity was not available as defense, where said contract was in writing and lack of consideration was not pleaded.

5. Licenses ⚷39—Presumption is that transfer of stock under purchaser's agreement to indemnify stockholder for liability on note was made under permit of commissioner of corporations.

Where defendant agreed to hold stockholder from whom he purchased stock harmless of all liability on note given for assets transferred to partnership, and subsequently transferred by partnership to corporation, held that, in absence of proof that transfer was made before permit to transfer stock was received under Corporate Securities Act, presumption is that transfer was made under permit of commissioner of corporations, and was legal and valid, in view of presumption of innocence of crime or wrongdoing and in support of findings and judgment.

6. Licenses ⚷39—Burden of establishing defense that contract of indemnity violated Corporate Securities Act was on defendants asserting it (St. 1917, p. 673).

Burden of proving that contract of indemnity violated Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) was on parties asserting such defense.

7. Corporations ⚷30(6)—Payee of note not participating in indemnity agreement alleged to be in violation of Corporate Securities Act was not in pari delicto with parties to agreement (St. 1917, p. 673).

Payee of partnership note given for assets received by partnership, and subsequently transferred to corporation organized by partners, and which corporation assumed partners' liability thereon, not having participated in agreement by purchaser of stock from former partner to indemnify partner for liability on note, was not in pari delicto with them, even if transfer of stock under indemnity agreement violated Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673).

8. Corporations 🔑30(6)—Corporation taking over partnership business and purchaser of stock held indemnifiers of partners on partnership note, which liability a payee was entitled to enforce (Civ. Code, §§ 1559, 2777).

Where corporation taking over partnership business and obligations by resolution acknowledged that partnership note given for assets received was its own obligation, and expressly agreed to pay it and hold partners free of liability thereon, and purchaser of stock of one of the two stockholders assumed obligations of such stockholder under written agreement mentioning note, corporation and said purchaser became indemnifiers of former partners, and payee of note as person for whose benefit indemnity contract was made, under Civ. Code, §§ 1559, 2777, was entitled to enforce indemnifiers' liability.

9. Common law 🔑11—Common law obtains in California, except where expressly modified by statute.

The common law is still the law of this state, except where expressly modified by statute.

10. Corporations 🔑117—Attempted rescission of sale of stock to one assuming stockholder's liability on note on which action was brought before notice of rescission was given payee held ineffective as to payee (Civ. Code, §§ 1559, 2777, 2854).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1559, 2777, 2854, stockholder's attempted rescission of sale of his stock to purchaser who assumed stockholder's liability on note given for assets transferred to corporation held ineffective as to payee of note, where no notice of rescission was given to payee before action on note was commenced by her indorsee.

11. Corporations 🔑273—Judgment against stock purchaser for installment of corporate note for half of which he agreed to be liable held not erroneous.

Where purchaser of stock agreed to be liable for not more than one-half of amount of note given for assets transferred to corporation, and installment due on note for which action was brought did not equal half of amount of note, judgment against said purchaser for full amount sued for was not erroneous as against contention that only half of amount of judgment should have been directed against said purchaser.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Irene Bryan against A. B. Banks and Carrere & Hawley, Inc., and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Janeway, Beach & Pratt and S. T. Hankey, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

S. Laz Lansburgh and Alfred C. Skaife, both of San Francisco (S. Joseph Theisen, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action on a promissory note of defendants Carrere and Hawley in the sum of $14,400, payable in installments, with attorneys' fees in case of suit, payment thereof being assumed by appellant Carrere & Hawley, Inc., a corporation, and payment of one-half thereof being assumed by appellant Banks; the stock of Carrere & Hawley, Inc., with the exception of one share, issued for the purpose of incorporating, was owned wholly by Carrere and Hawley. On this note $2,400 had been paid, leaving $12,000 unpaid, but only $4,800 thereof was due at the time of the filing of the amended complaint, and for this amount, and not for the full amount of the note, the court rendered judgment against all the defendants, with interest, attorneys' fees and costs. From this judgment defendants Banks and Carrere & Hawley, Inc., have appealed.

The record discloses the following facts: About December 20, 1924, defendants C. F. Carrere and C. O. Hawley acquired from R. W. and Edythe T. Sloan all the shares of the capital stock of the Agency Company of California, an insurance general agency, in consideration whereof they executed and delivered to the Sloans their note for $18,000. Shortly thereafter Carrere and Hawley, thus owning all the shares of stock of that company, caused the company to transfer to them individually all its assets, consisting of its going business, the furniture and fixtures in its San Francisco and Los Angeles offices and its general agency contract with the Home Insurance Company, in consideration of which they assumed the payment of the Agency Company's debts. Disputes having thereafter arisen between them and the Sloans, a compromise was effected about March 11, 1925, by which the Sloans surrendered their note for $18,000 and a prior note for $8,000, and Carrere and Hawley executed the $14,400 note in suit to Mrs. Sloan. Meanwhile Carrere and Hawley formed the Carrere & Hawley, Inc., corporation, issuing to themselves all of its 100 shares of stock, excepting one share issued to one Miller as a qualifying share for the purpose of incorporating, 97 shares thereof being deposited in escrow pursuant to the order of the commissioner of corporations, and on May 4, 1925, after having meanwhile carried on the acquired business as partners, they transferred to the new corporation all of the assets which they had through the Sloans acquired from the Agency Company, the furniture and fixtures valued at $25,000, and the agency contract with the Home Insurance Company. On October 14, 1925, the board of directors of appellant corporation adopted a resolution reciting that Carrere and Hawley "entered into an agreement with R. W. Sloan and Edythe T. Sloan for the payment to them of the sum of fifteen thousand dollars in instalments of $300 per month (note in suit) for and in consideration of all their right, title and interest in and to certain property and assets belonging to and forming a part of the property and assets of Carrere & Hawley, Inc., and whereas this corporation has received the benefit of said contract and is in possession and use of the property aforesaid, and the said obligation is therefore properly the obligation of this corporation and not of Charles F. Carrere and C. O. Hawley as individuals," and resolved that "this corporation does hereby assume and agree to pay the said contract aforesaid (note in question) and to hold harmless the said Charles F. Carrere and C. O. Hawley from the payment of the balance due thereon, and does hereby ratify, confirm and approve any and all payments heretofore made on account of said contract from and out of the funds of this corporation." In pursuance of this resolution appellant corporation executed its formal instrument under its seal by which it "for and in consideration of the sum of $1.00 and other valuable considerations (the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged) has assumed and agreed to pay the balance due" on the Sloan note. Eight payments of $300 each made on the note were paid by appellant corporation. Further payments thereon were discontinued when a garnishment against R. W. Sloan was levied upon the corporation; the corporation promising to resume payments as soon as the garnishment should be released. During all this time Carrere and Hawley owned all of the capital stock of the corporation, and they continued to own it until appellant Banks, by agreement dated October 4, 1925, purchased from Hawley all the latter's shares in the corporation. By this agreement Banks obligated himself to hold Hawley harmless from "all obligations and liability" growing out of and represented by the Sloan note; the agreement further providing "it being understood and agreed that the obligation assumed * * * extends only to one-half the amount of said note.' At the time this agreement was signed—October 28, 1925—Hawley had applied to the commissioner of corporations for a permit to transfer the stock and the permit was granted on November 27, 1925. Hawley performed his part of the agreement, and Banks kept the stock. True, Hawley testified that at the time of signing the agreement he had not "personally" secured the permit and had no permit. This testimony, however, is not inconsistent with the fact that the permit may have been procured for him by some one else, and in support of the findings, in the absence of other evidence, and in support of the presumption of innocence of wrongdoing, it will be presumed that the agreement was not delivered or the stock sold until after the permit had been obtained. On May 25, 1926, Hawley served upon Banks, but not upon Mrs. Sloan, his "notice of election to rescind and notice of re-entry," in which he notified Banks, "that I elect to rescind said contract and hereby make demand upon you for the delivery to me of the possession of the premises constituting the Los Angeles branch office of Carrere & Hawley, Inc." Appellant Banks never complied with this demand, nor did he transfer the shares to Hawley. On June 10, 1926, Mrs. Sloan indorsed and assigned the note and all her claims against defendants to the plaintiff Irene Bryan, and on June 12, 1926, this action was commenced.

Appellants urge that the judgment is erroneous, for the following reasons: (1) That the indemnity contracts of October 15, 1925, and October 28, 1925, are not contracts made expressly for the benefit of a third person and that therefore the plaintiff's assignor, Edythe T. Sloan, had no right of action against the appellants; (2) that the corporation received no consideration for its contract of indemnity of October 15, 1925, in favor of Carrere and Hawley individually, and therefore the contract is not binding on the corporation; (3) that the resolution of October 14, 1925, is void, two out of three of the directors being disqualified from voting by reason of interest, and the contract of indemnity of October 15, 1925, executed in pursuance of such resolution, is also therefore void; (4) that the contract of indemnity of October 28, 1925, between Hawley and Banks, is void, being in violation of the commissioner's permit of April 6, 1925, and it is therefore unenforceable; (5) that the said contract of indemnity of October 28, 1925, was rescinded by the notice of rescission of May 25, 1926, previously to the commencement of this action; (6) that in any event the decision of the trial court is erroneous, in that it gives judgment against the appellant Banks for the full amount owing under the note and suit, whereas the contract of October 28, 1925, which is the basis of the alleged liability, only obligates him to pay one-half thereof.

[1, 2] As has been said, Carrere and Hawley owned all of the stock of Carrere & Hawley, Inc., from the time of its organization until Hawley's transfer to Banks, including the one qualifying share placed in the name of Miller. They were the only persons interested in the company. They were conducting the business they had acquired from the Sloans, and, upon the organization of the corporation, they transferred this business with its assets to their own corporation. They took over in the form of a corporation the business and assets which they had previously conducted as a partnership, together with its obligations. The corporation was simply the partnership of Carrere and Hawley in another form. The corporation having received the benefits with the consent of the owners of all of the stock, and having ratified and acknowledged the debt, the corporation will not be permitted to dodge or escape liability for the obligations arising upon such agreement by the plea that the contract was made without observance of the formal requisites or prerequisites prescribed by its charter or by-laws with respect to the making of contracts, or because of the interest of the directors, Carrere and Hawley—the owners of the entire stock—in the subject-matter of the contract. Commercial S. Co. v. Modesto Drug Co., 43 Cal. App. 162, 184 P. 964. See, also, Hygienic H. F. Co. v. Grant, 187 Cal. 431, 202 P. 653; Chambers v. Security, etc., Bank, 51 Cal. App. 212, 196 P. 488; San Ramon Valley Bank v. Walden Co., 53 Cal. App. 534, 200 P. 662. While it is the general rule that a corporation is an entity separate and distinct from its stockholders, it is equally well settled that both law and equity will, when necessary to circumvent fraud, protect the rights of third persons, and accomplish justice, disregard this distinct existence and treat them as identical. Erkenbrecher v. Grant, 187 Cal. 7, 200 P. 641. Deming v. Maas, 18 Cal. App. 330, 123 P. 204. Equity will look through form to substance where corporations are but the mere instrumentalities through which the associates acted. Wise Realty Co. v. Stewart, 169 Cal. 176, 146 P. 534; Conover v. Smith, 83 Cal. App. 227, 256 P. 835.

[3, 4] There is no merit in appellants' contention that the corporation received no consideration for its contract of indemnity. Its resolution authorizing the assumption of the note recites that the corporation "has received the benefit" of the note "and is in possession and use of the property (conveyed in consideration of the note) and the said obligation is therefore properly the obligation of this corporation." The agreement was simply a renewal in another form by Carrere and Hawley of their pre-existing obligation, and, the agreement "being in writing, the presumption is that there was a sufficient consideration (section 1614, Civ. Code), and to overcome this presumption it was incumbent upon appellant to allege and prove the contrary." Flint v. Giguiere, 50 Cal. App. 314, 318, 195 P. 85, 88. Furthermore, want of consideration of a promissory note or other written instrument is new matter, and must be specially pleaded (Rivera v. Cappa, 29 Cal. App. 496, 156 P. 1016, 1017), which was not done.

[5-7] As to the claim that the contract of indemnity between Hawley and Banks is in violation of the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), it may be said that violation of the corporation commissioner's permit is neither pleaded nor proven. The burden of proving such defense rested upon appellants. The evidence shows that a permit for this transfer was obtained, and, if we concede that there is some uncertainty as to just when the transfer was made, it is obvious that, in accordance with the presumption of innocence of crime or wrongdoing, and in support of the findings and judgment, it must be presumed that the transfer was made under permit of the commissioner of corporations, and is legal and valid. It must further be remembered that Mrs. Sloan did not participate in the making of the agreement, and was not therefore in pari delicto with Hawley and Banks.

[8, 9] As has been said, Carrere and Hawley constituted the "close corporation," and, when Banks purchased Hawley's shares and assumed his obligations under the note, he stepped into Hawley's shoes, thus becoming a part of this "close corporation." Carrere & Hawley, Inc., by its resolution acknowledged that the note was properly its own obligation, and expressly agreed to pay it, and Banks in turn assumed Hawley's obligations thereunder by a written agreement specially mentioning this note. As counsel for appellants state, "both contracts are in similar terms, the promisor agreeing to pay the debt owing by the promisee to a third person." Each purchased property subject to pre-existing indebtedness incurred as a part of the purchase price thereof, and each assumed such indebtedness, and in each agreement the note is specially mentioned. It is difficult to see how these agreements could have been more expressly made for Mrs. Sloan's benefit. The common law is still the law of this state except where expressly modified by statute. The provision of section 1559 of the Civil Code that "a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person, may be enforced by him" is but a restatement of the common law, which, however, goes further. This provision is affirmative only. It is not equivalent to providing that a contract not expressly made for the benefit of a third person cannot be enforced by him. The decisions generally do not limit the remedy of the third party by the word "expressly." As was said in Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 525, 15 P. 100, 102, "it is not necessary that the parties for whose benefit the contract has been made should be named in the contract." In Allen v. Freear, 50 Cal. App. 645, 647, 195 P. 748, 749, the court says: "Where property is held under the consideration, as here, that the purchaser is to pay off the indebtedness of the seller, the creditors, although not mentioned, have a right to come in as being those of a class for whose benefit such contract was made (Sherwood v. Gill, 36 Cal. App. 707 [173 P. 171])," and section 2777 of the Civil Code provides:

"One who indemnifies another against an act to be done by the latter, is liable jointly with the person indemnified, and separately, to every person injured by such act."

Carrere & Hawley, Inc., and A. B. Banks were the indemnifiers, Carrere and Hawley the persons indemnified. Mrs. Sloan was the person for whose benefit the contract was made—the person injured, and the subsequent default or nonpayment was the future act indemnified against and by which she suffered injury. Therefore appellants became jointly liable with Carrere and Hawley to Mrs. Sloan. The status of an indemnifier has been stated thus: "The action is in substance against the indemnifier—the real party in interest." Dutil v. Pacheco, 21 Cal. 438, 442 (82 Am. Dec. 749). "The indemnifiers are the real parties defendant." Moore v. McSleeper, 102 Cal. 277, 282, 36 P. 593, 595. In Moore v. Los Angeles I. & S. Co. (Circuit Court, S. D. Cal.) 89 F. 73, wherein the liability of an indemnitor was enforced in favor of an injured third person, the court uses this language: "While said section [Cal. Civ. Code, sec. 2777] unquestionably embraces the class mentioned by defendants, it likewise includes, I think, all cases of indemnity against future contingencies. In other words, it broadens and makes applicable to all such cases the rule previously applied by the courts to that class of indemnity contracts where the indemnitor was held to be a joint trespasser or tort feasor with the indemnitee. Thus, the section does in the case at bar what the garnishment did in Anoka Lumber Co. v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. [63 Minn. 286, 65 Minn. 353, 30 L. R. A. 689] supra—makes the policy of assurance inure directly to the benefit of the injured person, and, in addition thereto, allows such person to proceed against the indemnitor separately, or jointly with the indemnitee."

The case of Treloar v. Keil & Hannon, 36 Cal. App. 159, 171 P. 823, cited by appellants, is not analogous to the facts here presented. In that case no obligation was assumed, nor was there any indemnity against obligation and liability, and this distinction is pointed out by the court in that case. The policy provided that no action should lie except for loss actually sustained and paid. The court bases its decision upon subdivision 2 of section 2778 of the Civil Code providing that, upon an indemnity against "claims or demands," no recovery can be had "without payment thereof." The present case comes within subdivision 1 of that section, providing that, upon an indemnity against "liability," the person indemnified is entitled to recover "upon becoming liable." In the recent case of Wurdeman v. Waller (Cal. App.) 263 P. 558, it is held that the promise of a purchaser of a business, made in consideration of the transfer, to assume and discharge an indebtedness of the seller to a third person, is obligatory on him.

We have examined the authorities cited by appellants, and find nothing in any of them at variance with the rule announced in these cases.

[10] Appellants urge that the Hawley-Banks contract was rescinded, citing section 1559 of the Civil Code: "A contract, made expressly for the benefit of a third person, may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it," and "where nothing is received to be restored, an offer to restore is impossible." McNeese v. McNeese, 190 Cal. 402, 405, 213 P. 36, 38. The "notice of election to rescind and notice of re-entry" do not constitute a present rescission, and are ineffective as to Mrs. Sloan, no notice of rescission being served upon her. The notice states that Hawley "will by the proper legal means and procedure establish the status quo existing prior to the execution of said contract." The actual rescission, such as it was, took place later, after the commencement of the action, when it was a release or rescission in part only, and could not affect Mrs. Sloan or her assignee, the plaintiff. No right of rescission so as to affect the rights of a third party is conferred by either section 2777 or 2854 of the Civil Code. The rights of a third party under each of these sections are vested at the time of the execution of the indemnity agreement in the one case and the receipt of security by the surety in the other, and these rights cannot be divested without the consent of such third party.

The release of July 30, 1926, recites that, by the agreement of October 28, 1925, Hawley had "transferred and assigned" certain shares of capital stock of Carrere & Hawley, Inc., referring to it as a past and completed transaction. Banks retained these shares and other personal property which he had acquired from Hawley under the former contract, thereby ratifying and confirming it, and it was continued in force as to certain of its provisions, including all liability accrued or hereafter to accrue, to the Home Accident Insurance Company and the Home Fire Insurance Company, but not as to the assumption of the note, which they endeavored to release by a release executed after the commencement of the action, which constituted both an acceptance and an enforcement by plaintiff of the contract of assumption (More v. Hutchinson, 187 Cal. 625, 203 P. 97), and it is therefore ineffective as to the plaintiff. As is said in Beckwith v. Sheldon, 165 Cal. 319, 324, 131 P. 1049, 1051, "It is of course, fundamental that where the rights of others have intervened and circumstances have so far changed that rescission may not be decreed without injury to those parties and their rights, rescission will be denied and the complaining party left to his other remedies (Meyers v. Merillion, 118 Cal. 352 [50 P. 662])."

[11] As to the contention that the decision is erroneous as to defendant Banks, in that it gives judgment for the full amount sued for, whereas he only obligated himself to pay one-half, it may be said that the note is in the principal sum of $14,400, "one-half of the amount of the note" is therefore $7,200. The judgment, being for $4,800, besides attorneys' fees, interest and costs, is considerably less than one-half of the amount of the note.

There is no warrant for appellant Banks' contention that his liability extends to only one-half of the amount due on the note. This construction can only be reached by interpolating the words "due on" in the agreement, which are not there.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PERRY. (Cr. 1527.)

District Court of Appeal, First District. Division 1. California. May 22, 1929.

1. Criminal law 🔑200(1)—Defendant is subject to indictment, conviction, and punishment for carrying concealed weapon, separate from that for robbery committed at same time (St. 1923, p. 695).

The crimes of robbery and of carrying concealed weapon, in violation of Firearms Act (St. 1923, p. 695), being separate and distinct crimes, defendant was subject to separate indictment, conviction, and punishment for carrying concealed weapon, irrespective of result of prosecution for robbery, and notwithstanding both crimes may have grown out of same continuous transaction and been committed at same time.

2. Criminal law 🔑286—Defendant entering pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity and withdrawing latter plea at conclusion of trial on general issue held conclusively presumed to be sane at time crime was committed (Pen. Code, § 1016, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1148, § 1, and § 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, § 4).

Under Pen. Code, § 1016, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1148, § 1, and section 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, § 4, where defendant in prosecution for carrying concealed weapon, in violation of Firearms Act (St. 1923, p. 695), entered pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity, and at conclusion of trial on general issue withdrew plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, held that he was conclusively presumed to be sane at time crime was committed.

3. Criminal law 🔑186—Verdict declaring accused to be insane at time of commission of crime does not operate as acquittal.

Verdict declaring accused to be insane at time of commission of acts constituting crime does not operate as acquittal of charge, but serves only as reason why penalty of law prescribed as punishment for commission of acts constituting crime should not be visited on accused.

4. Criminal law 🔑186—Verdict of insanity in robbery prosecution was not decisive of question of insanity at time of carrying concealed weapon committed at same time (St. 1923, p. 695).

Verdict of insanity in prosecution for robbery was not decisive of question of defendant's sanity at time of commission of crime of carrying concealed weapon, in violation of Firearms Act (St. 1923, p. 695), even though latter crime was committed at same time, and hence could not be made basis of pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy.

5. Criminal law 🔑624—Trial of prosecution for carrying concealed weapon held properly proceeded with before final determination of defendant's sanity in prior robbery prosecution arising out of same transaction (St. 1923, p. 695; Pen. Code, § 1368, and § 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, § 4).

Where crimes of robbery and carrying concealed weapon in violation of Firearms Act (St. 1923, p. 695) arose out of same transaction and were committed at same time, and in robbery prosecution on plea of insanity, order was entered remanding defendant until his present sanity could be determined, at which time defendant sought immediate release without complying with Pen. Code, § 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, § 4, held that, in prosecution for carrying concealed weapon, in which defendant made no suggestion that he was then insane, court properly proceeded with trial without being required, under Pen. Code, § 1368, to wait final determination of proceedings in robbery prosecution as to present sanity.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; C. J. Goodell, Judge.

Robert E. Perry was convicted of a violation of the Firearms Act, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. S. Whitthorne, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. Appellant was accused by indictment of violating the provisions of chapter 339 of the Statutes of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 695); it being charged that, having been previously convicted of and served a term in the state prison for the crime of grand larceny, he did, on March 3, 1928, in the city and county of San Francisco, feloniously possess and carry concealed upon his person a loaded revolver. Upon trial he was found guilty by a jury, and this appeal is taken from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial. The grounds urged for reversal relate to the trial court's rulings upon matters connected with appellant's pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy.

The record discloses the following facts: Between 7:30 and 8 o'clock on the night of March 3, 1928, appellant and a companion named Risbin, both armed with pistols, entered an apartment on upper Market street, San Francisco, occupied by a man named Brenner, and, after robbing Brenner, fled. An alarm was given, and two motor officers took up the pursuit and within a few minutes captured the robbers in the basement of a building several blocks distant from the scene of the robbery. Appellant was immediately searched, and the loaded pistol used by him in perpetrating the robbery was found concealed upon his person, and, when questioned, he admitted having served a term in the penitentiary for grand larceny. He was first charged by information with robbery and with prior conviction of grand larceny. When arraigned on that information, he denied the prior conviction and entered pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity to the charge of robbery. He was tried first upon the general issue and found guilty of robbery in the first degree, and the jury found also that the alleged prior conviction was true. He was then tried before the same jury upon the issue of insanity, and the verdict was that he "was insane at the precise time the offense was committed on March 3, 1928, as alleged in the information." Thereupon the trial court ordered that he be sent to the detention hospital for observation by the board of insanity commissioners. About a week later said board returned its findings, declaring him to be sane. The trial court then made an order pursuant to the provisions of section 1026 of the Penal Code (as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, § 4) to the effect that, having observed the defendant in court during the two trials and having heard the testimony given thereat, "and never at any time having any doubt as to the sanity of the defendant," and having been advised by the board of insanity commissioners that appellant was then sane, it was ordered that he be remanded to the custody of the sheriff "until his sanity shall have been finally determined in the manner prescribed by law." About a week later, however, and so far as the record shows, before the proceeding last mentioned was terminated, the indictment in the present case was returned. To this indictment appellant interposed four pleas: Not guilty; not guilty by reason of insanity; former acquittal; and once in jeopardy. At the trial he made no attempt to controvert the evidence introduced by the prosecution establishing the truth of the charge set forth in the indictment, but introduced in evidence the record of the robbery trial, including the proceedings of the trial on the issue of his sanity, and at the close of the evidence presented a motion for an instructed verdict upon the issues of former acquittal and once in jeopardy. The motion was denied, and as to those issues the jury was in effect instructed to find for the people. Such verdicts were returned, together with one finding appellant guilty as charged. A motion for a new trial was then made by appellant and by the court denied, following which appellant withdrew his plea of not guilty by reason of insanity and was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion that the rulings of the trial court relating to the pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy of which appellant complains were not erroneous. The crime charged in the indictment was, as appellant concedes, entirely separate and distinct from the crime of robbery for which he was first tried, and, that being so, he was subject to separate indictment, conviction, and punishment therefor, irrespective of the result of the robbery case, and notwithstanding that both crimes may have grown out of the same continuous transaction and been committed at the same time (People v. Snyder, 74 Cal. App. 138, 239 P. 705; People v. McKee, 80 Cal. App. 200, 251 P. 675; People v. Case, 77 Cal. App. 477, 246 P. 1083); consequently it was incumbent upon appellant to urge in this case all available defenses to the charge and also to bring forward any and all excuses he may have had to offer why the penalty of the law should not be imposed upon him for the commission of the acts constituting the crime here charged, if it was found that he committed such acts; otherwise he is deemed to have waived such defenses and excuses. As already stated, among the numerous pleas interposed by appellant to the present charge were those of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity, the effect of which was to deny having committed the acts charged and to assert that, if he did commit the same, he was insane at that time. The present criminal procedure requires that, where such pleas are entered, the accused must be tried first under the general issue of not guilty, during which trial he is conclusively presumed to have been sane at the time the offense is alleged to have been committed (Pen. Code, § 1016, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1148, c. 677, § 1, and section 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, c. 677, § 4), all evidence relating to the question of sanity of the accused being excluded (People v. Troche [Cal. Sup.] 273 P. 767); and, at the conclusion of such trial, he shall be tried upon the issue of insanity, or, if he enters a plea of not guilty and fails to urge the plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, he is likewise conclusively presumed to have been sane at the time the crime is alleged to have been committed (Pen. Code, § 1016, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1148, c. 677, § 1). Accordingly, in the case at bar, during the trial under the general issue appellant was conclusively presumed to be sane, and any evidence bearing upon the question of his sanity was not relevant to that issue. That trial having resulted in a verdict of guilty, appellant was then entitled under his plea of not guilty by reason of insanity to a trial upon that issue and to introduce any legal evidence tending to establish such plea; but, as stated, at the conclusion of the trial on the general issue he withdrew his plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, thereby eliminating from the case all question as to his sanity, so far as the crime charged in the present case is concerned. In other words, having withdrawn the plea which raised the issue of his sanity as to the present charge, he was conclusively presumed to be sane, and the trial court was justified in pronouncing judgment accordingly.

[3, 4] Appellant's argument in support of his pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy is based mainly upon the theory that the verdict in the robbery case finding him to be insane at the time of the commission of that crime operated as an acquittal of that charge, and that, since it was not shown that he had the loaded revolver upon his person at any time other than during the commission of the robbery and the few minutes following, said verdict operated also as an acquittal of any other offense he may have committed at the same time. The contention is without merit, for the reason that under the present law a verdict declaring an accused to be insane at the time of the commission of the acts constituting the crime does not operate as an acquittal of the charge. As said in People v. Troche, supra, it serves only as a reason why the penalty of the law prescribed as the punishment for the commission of the acts constituting the crime should not be visited upon the accused. In the present situation, therefore, the effect of the verdict of insanity in the robbery case was to declare merely that at the time the robbery was committed appellant was mentally deranged to the extent of being incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong in relation to the acts constituting that particular crime, and consequently should not be punished therefor (People v. Troche, supra; 7 Cal. Jur. 86); but it was in no way decisive of the question of appellant's sanity at the time he committed another and distinct crime, even though it was committed at the same time.

[5] Nor are we able to agree to the further contention made by appellant that the trial court was without power to proceed with the trial of the present case until there was a final determination of the proceeding instituted in the robbery case as to appellant's present sanity. Section 1368 of the Penal Code provides that if "at any time during the pendency of an action up to and including the time when defendant is brought up for judgment of conviction a doubt arises as to the sanity of the defendant," the court may suspend the trial or the pronouncement of judgment until the question of his then sanity is determined by a jury in the manner provided by chapter 6, tit. 10, pt. 2, of the Penal Code. The foregoing provisions were at all times available to appellant, but the record discloses that neither at the commencement of the trial of the present action nor at any time during its progress up to the time of pronouncement of judgment did appellant make any claim that he was then insane. On the contrary, it appears that, when the order was made at the conclusion of the robbery case remanding the appellant to the custody of the sheriff until his present sanity could be determined, appellant claimed that he was then sane, and demanded immediate release without going through the formality of the hearing provided for by said section 1026. Therefore, when the present action came on for trial before another department of said court and appellant made no suggestion that he was then insane, the trial court was justified in proceeding with the trial.

After a review of the entire record, we are unable to find wherein appellant has been deprived of any substantial legal right.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McALLISTER. (Cr. 1784.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 17, 1929.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 13, 1929.

1. Perjury ⚷13—Offense of bribing witness or attempting to fraudulently induce false testimony may be committed, though no action or proceeding is pending (Pen. Code § 137).

To constitute offense of bribing witness or person about to be called as witness or attempting to fraudulently induce any person to testify falsely or withhold true testimony under Pen. Code, § 137, it is not necessary that there be any action or proceeding pending which might be affected by misconduct, since criminal act is committed and criminal intent exists equally whether there is or is not proceeding then pending.

2. Perjury ⚷13—Omission from law prohibiting bribing witness of reference to trial proceeding, inquiry, or investigation held to show intention that offense might be committed without cause pending (Pen. Code, § 137).

Express omission from Pen. Code, § 137, defining offense of bribing witness, of any reference to or mention of trial, proceeding, inquiry, or investigation, held to show intention that offense could be committed without there being any cause pending, notwithstanding proximity of statute to other sections, using words "trial," "proceeding," "inquiry," or "investigation," and referring to same general class of offenses.

★Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

3. Perjury 🔑13—Term "falsifying evidence" held to include any interference with production of true evidence whether litigation has been instituted or not (Pen. Code, § 137).

Chapter entitled falsifying evidence, of which Pen. Code, § 137, defining offense of bribing witnesses or attempting to fraudulently induce false testimony, is a part, held broad enough to include any interference with production of true evidence whether that interference be part of scheme or plan to obstruct justice designed and begun before litigation has been instituted or afterward.

4. Perjury 🔑27—Contention that information charging bribery of witness contained no allegation of agreement that testimony of witnesses would be influenced held without merit (Pen. Code, § 137).

Where counts in information charging offense of bribing witnesses under Pen. Code, § 137, concluded with direct allegation of understanding and agreement that testimony in case would thereby be influenced, contention that information contained no allegation of understanding or agreement that testimony of witnesses would be influenced by bribes given or offered was without merit.

5. Perjury 🔑27—Information charging offense of attempting to bribe witness held not defective for failure to allege agreement to give false testimony (Pen. Code, § 137).

Information under Pen. Code, § 137, charging offense of attempting to bribe witness to induce false testimony or withhold true testimony, held not defective because of failure to allege understanding or agreement, since no meeting of the minds would be involved.

6. Perjury 🔑27—Information for attempt to bribe witness to induce false testimony or withhold true testimony held sufficient (Pen. Code, § 137).

Information, under Pen. Code, § 137, for attempt to bribe witness to induce false testimony or withhold true testimony, held sufficient.

7. Criminal law 🔑1144(3)—Appellate court must presume refusal to set aside information was proper, where record did not contain commitment or evidence at preliminary examination.

Where neither copy of commitment nor evidence adduced at preliminary examination was transmitted to appellate court on appeal by the people from an order dismissing the action in a prosecution for bribery, appellate court must presume that order denying motion to set aside information on ground that information did not conform to evidence at preliminary hearing or commitment was proper.

8. Criminal law 🔑1134(8)—Appellate court, on appeal from order dismissing prosecution for bribery, will not consider order denying motion to set aside information.

Appellate court, on appeal by the people from an order dismissing the action in a prosecution for bribery, will not consider correctness of ruling denying motion to set aside information, since to question such ruling appeal should have been taken from order.

9. Indictment and information 🔑147—Grounds of demurrer to indictment or information are limited to those specified in statute (Pen. Code, § 1004).

Demurrers to indictment or information are limited to grounds specified by Pen. Code, § 1004.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Harold McAllister was charged by information with the offense of bribery. From an order dismissing prosecution after order sustaining demurrer to the amended information, the People appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; SEAWELL and PRESTON, JJ., voting for a transfer.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen. and Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty. and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Dep. Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

William R. Elam, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal by the people from a judgment of the superior court dismissing the action after an order sustaining a demurrer to an amended information. The information contained five counts. The first two counts charged the defendant with offenses of offering and giving bribes to persons who were about to be called as witnesses in the case of McAllister v. Lightburn et al., then and there about to be filed in the superior court of the state of California, in Los Angeles county, upon the understanding and agreement that the testimony of said witnesses in said case should be influenced thereby. Counts 3, 4, and 5 are of the same import, and charge the defendant with an attempt by certain means to fraudulently induce the giving of false and withholding of true testimony by having prepared false evidence in writing for the signature of said witnesses, with intent to produce the same as true and genuine, and to contradict the testimony of another person to be given in an action about to be filed.

A motion to set aside the information, and a demurrer which occupies 38 pages of the transcript, were interposed. The demurrer attempts to present points which could not be raised by demurrer. For example, it recites "that the offense charged against the defendant is not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination." This and many other and similar statements are embraced therein.

The district attorney has proceeded upon the theory that the information is sufficient as charging the offense denounced by section 137 of the Penal Code, which reads: "Every person who gives or offers, or promises to give, to any witness, or person about to be called as a witness, any bribe upon any understanding or agreement that the testimony of such witness shall be thereby influenced, or who attempts by any other means fraudulently to induce any person to give false or withhold true testimony, is guilty of a felony."

[1] It is the contention of the respondent that this section has no application, where, as here, it does not appear that there was any action or proceeding pending which might be affected by any misconduct of the defendant.

At the outset it must be remembered that this is a law primarily to prevent the corrupt interference with the administration of justice. Its purpose is to go back as far as necessary and say, in effect, that any attempt to so influence prospective witnesses that the truth will not be presented in anticipated litigation is felonious. In State v. Holt, 84 Me. 509, 24 A. 951, it was said, in effect, although perhaps the statement is obiter dictum, that, in a prosecution similar to the one before us, the indictment need not aver that the witness had been summoned, or even that a cause was pending requiring the attendance of witnesses. Surely it is not the imminence of the person being called as a witness nor the fact that his being called may be postponed for a time that is determinative of the act coming within the purview of this section. It is the intent of the person interested and his purpose and design that is decisive of that question. True, a person cannot be a witness, unless there is an action pending, but a person may be about to be called as a witness, even though no action is pending. The attempt to wrongfully influence another's testimony might take place a day or an hour before a proceeding was to be instituted, but immediately following the beginning of which a subpœna would be issued for such person to become a witness therein. No reason is suggested, nor is one apparent why it should be unlawful to attempt to bribe or otherwise persuade someone to later defraud the court as a witness, if the attempt be made while an action is pending, but, if the same effort to obstruct justice were used just before the action was begun, it should be exempt from condemnation and entitled to the approval and sanction of the law.

The term "or person about to be called as a witness" in the first part of the section, it seems clear, was used with the legislative intent of including within its denouncement all offers of bribes to any person in contemplation of his becoming a witness. Such anticipation is not affected as to its moral or legal wrongfulness by the fact, if it be one, that the proceeding in which influenced testimony is to be given or withheld has not yet been filed. It seems equally clear that the term "any person" used in the last phrase is intended to include both any witness and any person about to be called as a witness as denominated in the first part of the statute. If A attempts by any means other than bribery to induce B to give false or withhold true testimony, the criminal act is committed, and the criminal intent exists equally whether there is or is not a proceeding then pending, during the progress of which B is to give testimony or withhold it.

These principles are recognized in Re Shepard, 109 Mich. 631, 67 N. W. 971. This proceeding, although not squarely in point, is worthy of consideration here. The corruption and vice of actively blocking the production of evidence, even though no proceeding was pending in which it could be used, but where such a proceeding might be later begun, was denounced. This was a disbarment proceeding. Shepard, an attorney, had taken steps to prevent a woman upon whom an abortion had been performed from making any statement before her death, and the accused was acting on behalf of one who was suspected of being instrumental in causing the abortion. No prosecution or other proceeding had been instituted, but it was held that Shepard was guilty at least of attempting to stifle evidence, and that this was sufficient upon which to predicate the charge of professional misconduct. This conclusion necessarily involves a recognition of the fact that there may be evidence in its legal sense, although no action is pending, in which it could be used. This being so, as an abstract proposition, it is possible to influence testimony, even if it be true that no proceeding has been begun.

Respondent cites People v. Berkowitz, 121 Misc. Rep. 40, 200 N. Y. S. 823; Brown v. State, 13 Tex. App. 358; and State v. Joaquin, 69 Me. 218. In the last-named case the statute upon which the prosecution was based differs materially from the one here involved. The court concluded the true interpretation of the law there involved to be an express provision that a person shall be liable who endeavors to procure another to swear falsely "in a proceeding before the court, tribunal or officer created by law, or in relation to which an oath or affirmation is by law authorized." The opinion in the Texas case above mentioned is of no assistance. It contains no quotation from the statute involved, but it is apparent that the act differs in many respects from section 137 of our Penal Code. From the language used it seems that the existence of a subpœna must be shown, and that such subpœna was issued by legal authority, as well as other items, from which it might easily be concluded that the pendency of a suit would be a prerequisite to prosecution, even though the statute may not have directly so provided. The nisi prius decision in People v. Berkowitz, supra, is not convincing. The case was prosecuted under section 2440 of the Penal Law of New York, the language of which is similar to, though not identical with, that of secton 137 of our Code. The opinion assigns no substantial reason for its conclusion that there must be in fact a trial, proceeding, inquiry, or investigation pending in which the witness or person about to be called is to give testimony.

[2] It is argued that, since certain other sections in the same chapter in which section

137 is found expressly specify that the act denounced has to do with a trial, proceeding, inquiry, or investigation, it must be assumed that section 137 was intended to make the same provision. The conclusion from this situation would seem to be quite to the contrary. The leaving out of all reference to trial or other proceeding in section 137, considering its proximity to the sections mentioned, and the fact that they all have to do with the same general class of offenses, would appear to have been intentional. That fact is emphasized by the definite language employed in section 132 and other sections following, and the express omission in section 137 of any reference to or mention of the "trial, proceeding, inquiry or investigation."

[3-5] It is pointed out that the chapter in which section 137 is contained is entitled "falsifying evidence." This term is board enough to include any interference with the production of true evidence whether that interference be a part of the scheme or plan to obstruct justice designed and begun before litigation has been instituted or afterward. Respondent attempts to uphold the ruling of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer by asserting that the information is defective in all five counts, in that there is no allegation in any of them of an understanding or agreement that the testimony of witnesses would be influenced by the bribes given or offered. The first two counts conclude with the direct allegation of an "understanding and agreement that the testimony of the said * * * in said case should be thereby influenced." The third, fourth, and fifth counts are predicated on the provision contained in the last part of section 137 of the Penal Code, and in each count the pleader has merely charged an attempt to induce some person to give false or withhold true testimony. Obviously, here no allegation as to an understanding or agreement is necessary, since there would be no meeting of the minds of the parties involved, where, so far as the pleading shows, only one attempting party had violated the provision of the law involved.

[6] We think this information is sufficient as a pleading. Each count alleges a violation of section 137 of the Penal Code. As to whether or not the defendant did the acts charged or attempted to do them will be questions for the jury to determine. Also it will be the duty of a jury under proper instructions from the court to say whether the person whose evidence is alleged to have been illegally influenced was in fact "about to be called as a witness." This of necessity involves the further question, also for the jury's decision, as to whether the acts of the defendant averred to be unlawful were done in contemplation of the beginning of an action or other proceeding, where such influenced evidence was intended to be produced or from which it was designed to suppress its use. All of these are questions of fact, and, as such must be determined adversely to the defendant in order that he may be convicted. But the charges contained in the information are in our opinion sufficient in each of the five counts to state a public offense.

[7-9] Extensive argument on behalf of the respondent is devoted to criticism of the ruling denying his motion to set aside the information as amended, and in attempted support of the ruling sustaining the demurrer to each of the five counts. It is insisted that the people's pleading is not based upon, nor does it conform to, the evidence or commitment in the municipal court; that there was no evidence taken at the preliminary examination tending to show the offense charged in the information; and that he was not legally committed. Neither a copy of the commitment, nor any evidence adduced at the preliminary examination, was transmitted to us in this proceeding, and, being confined to the record as presented, we must presume that the ruling of the court in denying the motion was proper. It may be added that no appeal was taken from the order mentioned, and the correctness of that decision is not before us. We are not advised by the transcript as to the offense for which the respondent was apprehended, the offense which the evidence tended to show, nor that with which he was charged in the commitment, yet various authorities are cited, and there is much discussion, from which we assume that it is contended that there was a fatal variance between the commitment and the information. Section 1004 of the Penal Code prescribes five grounds of demurrer: (1) That the court is without jurisdiction; (2) that the information does not substantially conform to the requirements of the Code; (3) that more than one offense is charged, except as provided in section 954; (4) that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense; and (5) that the allegations thereof constitute, if true, a legal justification of the offense charged, or other legal bar to the prosecution. In none of these subdivisons of said section is the sufficiency of the evidence or substances of the commitment, made of consequence for the purposes of demurrer. Demurrers are limited to the grounds specified by section 1004 of the Penal Code. People v. Markham, 64 Cal. 157, 30 P. 620, 49 Am. Rep. 700; People v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 260, 30 P. 814; People v. Tibbitts, 71 Cal. App. 709, 236 P. 217.

For the reasons herein expressed, the judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to overrule the demurrer.

1. Contracts 🔑303(4)—Performance of contract, when prevented by acts of opposite party, is excused.

Party to contract cannot take advantage of his own act or omission to escape liability, and performance of contract is excused when prevented by acts of opposite party.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑18(3)—Vendor preventing service of notice of acceptance of option to purchase within time limited, and thereafter approving assignment and specifying manner of payment on receiving notice of acceptance by assignee, could not object that option was not exercised in time.

Where vendor by her own act prevented service upon her of written notice of acceptance of option to purchase within time limited, and on receipt of notice of acceptance by assignee of option on day after time expired approved assignment and signed addenda thereto, specifying manner of payment of installments, vendor could not, in suit by assignee of option for specific performance, defeat plaintiff's recovery on ground that option to purchase was not exercised within time.

3. Specific performance 🔑97(1)—Vendee need not tender performance before suit for specific performance, where vendor repudiates contract.

Where vendor repudiates term of contract and indicates that he will be no longer bound thereby, further tender of performance by vendee before suit for specific performance is unnecessary.

4. Specific performance 🔑114(4)—Vendee suing for specific performance after vendor's repudiation need only allege that he is ready, willing, and able to perform.

Where vendor has absolutely repudiated agreement to sell, it is sufficient for the vendee to set forth in complaint for specific performance that he is ready, willing, and able to perform.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑187—Vendor repudiating contract solely because her signature was obtained by fraud waived objection that amount of purchaser's tender was insufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 2076; Civ. Code, § 2051).

Where vendor notified escrow holder and purchaser of repudiation of contract for sale on sole ground that her signature had been obtained by fraud, objection to sufficiency of purchaser's tender was waived under Code Civ. Proc. § 2076, and Civ. Code, § 2051, in purchaser's suit for specific performance.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑18(3)—Vendor, by handing deed to escrow holder, sufficiently ratified assignment of option to purchase.

Vendor giving option to purchase sufficiently ratified assignment thereof as notice of acceptance of option by handing deed executed in favor of assignee of option to escrow holder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Suit by Ray Thomas, Inc., against Mary E. Cowan. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stewart & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joseph Musgrove and F. O. McGirr, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment in an action for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The complaint in this action sets forth that the defendant is the owner in fee of the lands and premises described in this action, and was such on the 6th day of July, 1926; that on said date the defendant gave to one George W. Fassel an option to purchase the real estate described in the complaint; that thereafter, and on or about the 19th day of July, 1926, Fassel assigned his interest in said option to one Lem A. Brunson, who on or about the same date assigned his interest in said option to the plaintiff in this action; that on or about the same date the defendant accepted the assignment of the option herein referred to; that on or about the 20th day of July, 1926, the defendant gave certain instructions to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, in relation to consummating the sale of the real estate involved in this action. The complaint further alleges that the plaintiff has complied with all the terms and conditions of the option agreements herein referred to. The answer of the defendant denies the allegations of the complaint, and for further defense sets up that she was induced to sign the instruments referred to herein by reason of fraudulent misrepresentations. As the question of fraud is not presented to us upon this appeal, no further reference will be made thereto.

The court found that the plaintiff was entitled to, and entered a decree for the specific performance of the instruments designated as Exhibits A and B.

Exhibit A is the option agreement entered into between the respondent Mary E. Cowan and George W. Fassel, the persons heretofore referred to, and is substantially as follows: That on the 6th day of July, 1926, the defendant gave to said Fassel the exclusive right and option, at any time before 12 o'clock p. m. on the 18th day of July, to purchase the real property involved in this action for the sum of $36,000, subject to conditions (which are not involved in this action and need not to be set forth). The option ran in favor of the optionee, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns. By its terms it provided that the option could be exercised only by written instrument signed by the optionee, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, and delivered to the optionor personally or deposited in the mail by registered letter, postage prepaid, addressed to the optionor at her address in the city of Los Angeles. The purchase price was fixed at $36,000; $12,000 payable upon demand in escrow, the remaining $24,000 payable on or before five years after date of escrow, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually. The 18th day of July, 1926, falling on Sunday, the life of the option, by reason of the provisions of the Civil Code, ran until 12 o'clock p. m., July 19th. On the 19th day of July, George W. Fassel assigned and transferred all his interest in the option referred to and right to purchase the real estate involved in this action to Lem A. Brunson. This assignment is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Exhibit B.

"July 19, 1926.

"Mr. Lem A. Brunson, 945 Wall Street, Los Angeles, Calif. My dear Mr. Brunson: In accordance with our conversation of this date, please be advised that I hereby agree to and do hereby transfer, assign, set over and convey to you those certain exclusive options executed and delivered to me by Miss Mary E. Cowan, covering certain real property owned by said Mary E. Cowan, situated at 824 West 10th Street, Los Angeles, California, upon the following terms and conditions, to-wit: First: That you agree to pay said Miss Mary E. Cowan, upon acceptance and exercise of said option, the sum of $36,000, $5,000 of which is to be paid into escrow within three (3) days after notification by the Title Company or Mary E. Cowan, of the opening of escrow by said Mary E. Cowan and $7,000 and a note and mortgage on standard form in the sum of $24,000 dated and bearing interest of 7% from the date of close of escrow within three (3) days after notification to you by the Title Company of its readiness to record the Deed of Conveyance. Second: And upon your payment to me of the further sum of $2,000 upon the close of said escrow. It is understood and agreed that your acceptance of this proposition is to supercede a former option dated July 15, 1926, by me to you upon said property.

"Very truly yours, Geo. W. Fassel.

"Approved and Accepted
"Lem A. Brunson."

Thereupon, said Lem A. Brunson signed the following instrument, directed to the respondent, to wit:

"July 19, 1926.

"Miss Mary E. Cowan, 824 West 10th Street, Los Angeles, Calif. Dear Madam: This is to advise you that Mr. George W. Fassel has this date sold, assigned and transferred to me those certain options given by you to him, covering the purchase of your property situated at 824 West 10th Street, Los Angeles, California, at a price of $36,000 net to you, payable upon the following terms and conditions, to wit: $5,000 to be paid to you upon opening of escrow for the sale of said property, which you agreed to do within three (3) days from the date hereof, and a further sum of $7,000 and a note and mortgage in the sum of $24,000 on the standard form, dated as of the close of escrow and bearing 7% (LAB) interest from said date, payable semiannually, which sum is to be paid on or before five (5) years. This is to further notify you that I do hereby accept and exercise said offer and do hereby tender to you on account of the purchase price of said property as hereinbefore set forth, the sum of $500.00.

"Very truly yours, Lem A. Brunson.

"Above assignment, terms, conditions and the receipt of $500.00 on the purchase price is accepted and approved this 19th day of July, 1926. Terms of mortgage to be $8,000.00 in 2 yrs. $8,000.00 in 4 yrs. & $8,000.00 in 5 yrs. at 7% on all deferred payments.

"Mary E. Cowan.

"Witness to signature of Mary E. Cowan.
"Geo. W. Fassel."

The record shows an assignment by Brunson to the plaintiff in this action. While the approval of the assignment by Fassel to Brunson appears to have been approved by the respondent on the 19th day of July, 1926, it was actually approved by her on the 20th of July, 1926.

By an instrument bearing date of July 20, 1926, the appellant gave certain instructions to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company escrow holder relative to the acts to be performed in the consummation of the sale of the property referred to by the plaintiff in this action, and also set forth the terms of sale. These instructions were to the effect that a deed executed by her to the respondent for the property involved was authorized to be delivered to the plaintiff within 20 days on payment to the Title Company of the sum of $11,500, on account of the purchase price of the property mentioned, and a mortgage for $24,000 securing three notes of $8,000 each in two, four, and five years, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually. The instructions also provided that $5,000 of the defendant's demand should be placed in escrow on or before Friday, July 23, 1926. The record shows that on the 21st day of July, 1926, the plaintiff, or, rather, that one Musgrove, an attorney for plaintiff, deposited with the Title Guarantee & Trust Company the sum of $4,500 for the benefit of the plaintiff. The transcript contains the following in relation to the $4,500: "It was also stipulated that $4,500.00 was paid into escrow and is still in said escrow."

On the 23d day of July, 1926, the appellant wrote a letter to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company and the parties involved herein, notifying them that she repudiated her agreements of sale on the ground that her signature thereto had been obtained by fraud. No objection was made to the form of the tender, nor was any objection made as to the amount thereof.

Upon this appeal it is contended that the finding of the court, that the plaintiff had complied with all the terms and conditions to be performed by it specified in the writings to which we have referred, are not supported by the testimony in this, that the evidence shows the option to purchase was not accepted and ratified on the 19th day of July, 1926, but that the ratification thereof took place on the 20th day of July, 1926, and was therefore one day too late. And, further, that the payment of $4,500 in escrow was not in accordance with the terms of the instrument in that the escrow instructions delivered to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company called for the payment of the sum of $5,000, and also that it was uncertain as to whether the $4,500 heretofore mentioned was deposited in such a manner that the appellant could lay claim thereto in the event the plaintiff failed to comply with the terms and conditions of the instruments herein referred to. It may be observed that none of the instructions to which we have referred, made time the essence thereof, save and except that the options, until accepted, gave the optionee only so long a time within which to exercise his option to purchase.

[1, 2] As to the first objection that the option to purchase was not exercised within the time limit, it is sufficient to say that the record shows beyond controversy that the act of the appellant prevented the service upon her of written notice of acceptance of the option within the time limit, and brings this case clearly within the rule set forth in 13 C. J., p. 647, § 721, which is: "A party to a contract cannot take advantage of his own act or omission, to escape liability thereon. * * * Under this rule performance of a contract is excused when it is prevented by the acts of the opposite party, or is rendered impossible by him." Furthermore, the record shows that on the 20th day of July, 1926, the appellant received notice of the acceptance of the option and assignment, and thereupon approved the assignment, and signified the same by signing an addenda to the assignment specifying that the $24,000 mentioned in the acceptance of the option and assignment thereof should be paid in two, four, and five years.

[3-6] The second objection urged by the appellant is as to the amount of the tender. As shown by the writing dated July 19, 1926, which bears the approval of the respondent, it is specified that $5,000 was to be paid to the appellant upon the opening of the escrow of the sale of property involved in this action, and then that the further sum of $7,000 was to be paid, and then notes and mortgages were to be given for $24,000. It thus clearly appears that the cash to be paid was only the sum of $12,000. At the time of the approval of this writing, the appellant was tendered and accepted a check for the sum of $500. This left only the sum of $11,500 to be paid. The instructions contained in the paper signed by the appellant and handed to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company did direct that $5,000 should be paid on or before July 23, 1926. In this particular it differs from the two instruments which we have mentioned herein, or, rather the fact that $500 had already been paid on the $5,000 apparently was lost sight of. As we have stated, on the 23d day of July, 1926, the appellant repudiated her agreements, which repudiation was received by the parties interested on the 24th day of July, 1926. The law is well settled that, where a vendor repudiates the terms of a contract and indicates that he will be no longer bound thereby, a further tender of performance before beginning suit by the vendee is unnecessary. In support of this we may refer to the long list of cases cited in a note appended to the case of Bateman v. Hopkins, as reported in Ann. Cas. 1913C, pp. 642–648, being a case also reported in 157 N. C. 470, 73 S. E. 133. To the same effect is the rule stated in 23 Cal. Jur. p. 499. See, also, Buckmaster v. Bertram, 186 Cal. 673, 200 P. 610. Where the vendor has absolutely repudiated his agreement to sell, it is sufficient, on the part of the vendee, to set forth in his complaint that he is ready, willing, and able to perform his part of the contract. Such appears to be the case at bar. The complaint contains the necessary allegations which was followed by the necessary proof introduced upon the trial. As to the sufficiency of the tender and offer of the payment of the first installment, we think the objections of the appellant are answered by section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 1501 of the Civil Code. These sections provide that the form of tender must be objected to at the time, and likewise as to the amount; otherwise such objections are waived. Without reciting the sections referred to, we think they absolutely answer the objections of the appellant in the negative. While the record shows no acceptance of the assignment by Brunson to the plaintiff, it does show the assignment, and then shows that the respondent acted thereon and in pursuance thereof in handing the deed executed in favor of the plaintiff, to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, for the property involved, at the time of the delivery of instruments which sufficiently show ratification. The record shows that appellant makes no objection in this particular.

We conclude that the trial court was correct in holding that Exhibits A and B constituted a contract of sale and properly directed specific performance.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; THOMPSON, J.

99 Cal. App. 172

QUAGELLI v. QUAGELLI. (Civ. 6663.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. May 28, 1929.

1. Divorce ⚷130—Allegations of complaint, supported by uncontradicted evidence, held sufficient to entitle wife to divorce for cruelty.

Allegations of complaint, supported by direct, positive, and uncontradicted evidence of competent witnesses, that defendant continually abused and cursed plaintiff and their children, hurled dishes and food at them, and locked himself in room for two or three days at time in state of extreme intoxication, screaming late into night, reviling plaintiff and his children and threatening plaintiff with bodily harm, that it was twice necessary to summon police to subdue him, and that his conduct was so boisterous and abusive as to be common knowledge among neighbors, causing plaintiff grievous mental suffering, held sufficient to entitle her to divorce decree on ground of cruelty.

2. Husband and wife ⚷299(1)—Decree for wife in suit for separate maintenance on ground of cruelty held conclusive evidence thereof in divorce suit.

Decree for plaintiff in wife's suit for separate maintenance on ground of extreme cruelty held conclusive evidence thereof in her subsequent suit for divorce, where not appealed from, though appeal was taken from order modifying decree as to property award.

3. Divorce ⚷154—Divorce cannot be arbitrarily or capriciously denied plaintiff, whose evidence establishes truth of allegations in complaint.

When plaintiff's evidence, adequately corroborated, establishes truth of allegations of complaint for divorce, such relief, specified by statutes, cannot be arbitrarily or capriciously denied her.

4. Divorce ⚷252—Wife establishing extreme cruelty, alleged in complaint, is entitled to divorce on such ground, and hence to over half of community property (Civ. Code, §§ 146, 148).

Wife establishing extreme cruelty, alleged in complaint for divorce, by final decree for separate maintenance on such ground, was entitled to divorce decree on such ground and hence to award of more than half of community property under Civ. Code, §§ 146, 148; amount being for trial court to determine in first instance from circumstances of case, subject to revision on appeal.

5. Husband and wife ⚷262(1)—Realty taken by written conveyance in name of wife only is presumed her separate property.

When real property is taken by written conveyance in name of wife alone, it is presumed to be her separate property.

6. Divorce ⚷286—Allegation of answer in separate maintenance suit that there was other community property in wife's name being sufficient to raise issue whether unmentioned parcel was community property, court must presume on appeal from divorce decree that issue was tried and separate maintenance decree sustained by evidence.

Allegation of answer in wife's suit for separate maintenance, record of which was admitted in her subsequent divorce suit, that there was other community property standing in her name than that mentioned in complaint, being sufficient to raise issue whether parcel not mentioned therein was community property, as adjudged in decree, Court of Appeal must presume in support of decree, where parties waived findings, that they tried such issue and that decree was sustained by competent evidence.

7. Divorce ⚷249(6)—Court cannot assign one-half undivided interest in homestead to party at fault in divorce suit (Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 3, and § 148).

Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 3, does not authorize court to assign one-half undivided interest in homestead to party at fault in divorce suit, but requires that court either assign it to innocent party absolutely or for limited period, divide it between parties, or order it sold and proceeds divided in proper proportions under that section and section 148.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Suit by Caterina Quagelli against Enrico Quagelli for a divorce. From a decree granting plaintiff a divorce and ordering an equal division of property, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Kirkbride & Gordon, of San Mateo, for appellant.

Hugh K. McKevitt, and Halloway Jones, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for a divorce upon three grounds—cruelty, desertion, and habitual intemperance. Defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint asking for a divorce upon the ground of plaintiff's cruelty. The trial court found adversely to plaintiff in regard to her allegations of cruelty and intemperance, but granted her a decree of divorce upon the ground of desertion. It also found against defendant in regard to his allegation of cruelty on the part of plaintiff. All the property standing in the names of either party was found to be community and was ordered to be equally divided between the parties. The plaintiff has appealed from the decree on a bill of exceptions.

The attack upon the decree is based on two main grounds—that the undisputed evidence demanded a finding and decree favorable to plaintiff on the grounds of cruelty and habitual intemperance and a consequent division of the community property more favorable to the plaintiff under the express provisions of section 146, Civil Code; and that the undisputed evidence demanded a finding that two of the parcels of real property were the separate property of the plaintiff.

[1] The complaint contains a lengthy specification of acts of cruelty running from the year 1913 down to the year 1925. It is alleged that in 1913 the defendant became addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquor which incapacitated him from transacting any business, and which caused him to assume a hostile attitude towards plaintiff and their children; that he continually abused and cursed the plaintiff and their children, calling his wife and daughters prostitutes and his sons bastards; that he hurled dishes and food at the plaintiff and threw furniture about the home; that he refused to eat his meals with the family, but would lock himself in his room, where he would remain for two and three days at a time in a state of extreme intoxication; that on these occasions he would scream late into the night, reviling the plaintiff and his children and threatening the plaintiff with bodily harm; that on two occasions it became necessary to summon police officers to subdue the defendant; and that his conduct was so boisterous and abusive that it was of common knowledge among the neighbors, all of which caused the plaintiff grievous mental suffering. It is unnecessary to recite the many other allegations of cruelty; what we have stated is more than sufficient to entitle plaintiff to a decree on that ground. All the acts mentioned were proved by direct and positive evidence and were fully corroborated by competent witnesses. No evidence was offered by the defendant to rebut a single charge made, except his bare statement that the denials in his answer were true. The finding that it was not true that defendant at any time treated plaintiff in a cruel and inhuman manner or inflicted upon her mental suffering or any suffering at all is directly contrary to all the competent evidence in the record.

[2] In addition to this the plaintiff alleged that on the 27th day of February, 1925, she commenced an action against the defendant to obtain a decree of separate maintenance, and that on the 3d day of September, 1925, a decree was entered in said action in her favor. She further alleged that said decree had become final. The court made a finding in favor of the plaintiff on all of the aforesaid allegations except the last, and in that behalf it found "that said order of separate maintenance was made subject to change or modification." The record in said action was introduced in evidence, and it is a part of the record in the instant case. Turning to the record in the maintenance case, it will be noted that plaintiff pleaded facts showing that her cause of action for divorce was extreme cruelty. No other cause of action was pleaded or attempted to be pleaded. Findings were waived. The trial court entered a decree in favor of the plaintiff. That decree necessarily rested on an implied finding that the plaintiff had sustained her allegations of extreme cruelty. Hence that decree was conclusive evidence in the instant case to prove the charge of extreme cruelty. 15 Cal. Jur. 136. Unless the defendant disproved the judgment in the maintenance action, the issue on extreme cruelty must necessarily have been found for the plaintiff. He did not attempt to disprove the judgment, therefore the trial court was bound to have found the issue in accordance with the decree in the maintenance action. It is argued that that decree is not res adjudicata of the grounds for divorce because it is not final. The controversy arises no doubt because of misapprehension of the condition of the record. No appeal was taken from the decree in the maintenance action, and the judgment therein had become a final judgment. An order had been made modifying that final judgment as to the property award and an appeal has been taken from that order. However, this subsequent modification of the decree as to property rights was based upon the prior finding of the existence of the grounds for divorce and was a reaffirmance of that finding rather than a modification of it.

[3, 4] If the trial court had made its findings in accord with the evidence, the plaintiff would have been entitled to a judgment on the ground of extreme cruelty. Lewis v. Lewis, 167 Cal. 732, 733, 141 P. 367 [52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 675]; Harman v. Harman, 198 Cal. 695, 698, 247 P. 194. In the Lewis Case it was said: "The court is not authorized to deny a divorce where the evidence of the plaintiff, adequately corroborated, establishes the truth of the allegations of the complaint." When a case is thus made out, the plaintiff is entitled to the relief which the statutes specify, and such relief cannot be arbitrarily or capriciously denied one. The plaintiff here, having made her case of extreme cruelty, was entitled to a decree on that ground, and this would, of course, entitle her to an award of more than one-half of the community property. On this question the cases are all in accord. Eslinger v. Eslinger, 47 Cal. 62, 64; Brown v. Brown, 60 Cal. 579, 580; Thomsen v. Thomsen, 31 Cal. App. 185, 188, 159 P. 1054; Nave v. Nave, 35 Cal. App. 27, 169 P. 253. Some of the cases hold that under the provisions of section 146 of the Civil Code the court should award three-quarters of the community property to the nonoffending spouse, and in some cases the appellate court, acting under the express provisions of section 148 of the Civil Code, has reversed the judgment with specific directions as to how the property should be divided. But in all cases the uniform rule has been that when the decree is on the ground of extreme cruelty the award to the unoffending spouse must be substantially greater than that to the one who is at fault. What the difference should be depends upon the circumstances of each case, and that is a matter to be determined by the trial court in the first instance "subject to revision on appeal in all particulars, including those which are stated to be in the discretion of the court." Section 148, Civ. Code.

[5] It is apparent that both parties are satisfied that a divorce should be had, but they are unable to agree upon a proper division of their property interests. They have been in court on numerous occasions in the endeavor to settle these differences, and it is to be regretted that further proceedings are necessary for that purpose. However, in the determination of property rights there are certain legal principles which must be followed, and, if we do not follow those principles, we fail in our function in the administration of the law. One principle which seems to be well settled, and which is applicable here, is that when real property is taken by written conveyance in the name of the wife alone it is presumed to be her separate property. Here the two parcels designated in the findings as parcels five and six were shown by the only evidence offered on the subject to be the separate property of the appellant. As to parcel No. 5 (lot No. 15 in block No. 2, as per map of DeBoom tract, city and county of San Francisco), the finding that this was the community property of the parties is contrary to the evidence and must be set aside.

[6] In the suit for maintenance heretofore brought by this same plaintiff a decree was entered wherein it was adjudged that parcel No. 6 was community property. The record in that case was admitted here for the purpose of showing that this decree was beyond the issues as to this parcel because it was not included in the pleadings in that case. From that record it appears that the defendant in his answer pleaded that, in addition to the community property mentioned in the complaint, "there is other property in San Francisco * * * which is community property, that the same stands in the name of plaintiff." This would seem sufficient to raise the issue, and, as the parties waived findings in that case, we must presume, in support of the judgment, that the parties tried the issue and that the decree was sustained by competent evidence.

Appellant attacks the finding that the Burlingame property designated in the findings as lot No. 8, block No. 1, in the city of Burlingame was not subject to the declaration of homestead by appellant because she had previously declared a homestead on another parcel in San Francisco, which homestead had not been abandoned. There was no evidence of any character or description relating to the alleged declaration of homestead in San Francisco. The only evidence in the record proves without dispute the declaration of homestead upon the Burlingame property, and the plaintiff was entitled to a finding that this property was covered by a valid and existing homestead under her declaration.

[7] Under the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 146, Civil Code, the trial court is authorized to assign the homestead to the innocent party either absolutely or for a limited period, or it may be divided, or be sold and the proceeds divided. The section does not authorize the court to assign a one-half undivided interest in the homestead to the party at fault, as has been done here. In determining the proper division of the community property the trial court will also determine the course to be pursued as to this homestead property—by either assigning it to the appellant absolutely, or for a limited period, or by dividing it between the parties, or by ordering it sold and the proceeds thereof divided—in either case awarding the appellant such proportion thereof as she is entitled to receive under the views hereinbefore expressed.

Judgment reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action for divorce by Harvey S. Hunsberger against Adeline H. Hunsberger. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Hutchinson and Forrest H. Bailey, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Christopher M. Jenks, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to obtain a divorce from the defendant. He pleaded desertion and willful neglect. The defendant filed an answer denying both charges. A trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings of fact in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The plaintiff contends that the trial court should have awarded him a decree on the ground of desertion, and claims that the evidence was full and complete. We think he is mistaken, for the following reasons: In one place, answering a leading question of his attorney, he stated that his wife deserted him. Of course, that was but his legal conclusion. In another place, he stated that on the 29th day of July, 1924, his wife left the family apartment. In that connection the defendant testified that at the time she left she was in a very nervous condition by reason of overwork, and that she had been doing too much work. What with services rendered as a trained nurse, what with her duties as housekeeper, and what with the effort she was making in repainting some furniture which her mother had loaned to her, the defendant had greatly broken down her health. At the time she left the family home she was under the care of a physician. For several months she returned from time to time and at various times the parties met, either at their own home or at the mother's home, or other places. There is evidence that a year and a half after the defendant left the home that she then stated she did not care to return. That statement was apparently made a month or two months after this action was filed. If the plaintiff is relying on the date of that refusal as the date of desertion, then the desertion had not continued one year prior to the commencement of the action and therefore will not support a decree based on desertion. Pinkard v. Pinkard, 14 Tex. 356, 65 Am. Dec. 129. There is evidence that the parties were living separate and apart for a few months during the year 1923; however, that evidence is entirely without the issues made by the pleadings. On July 29, 1924, as the defendant left the house, she stated to the landlord that thereafter he should look to the husband for the rent, as she was going away. Assuming that the remark was favorable to the plaintiff's case, the most that can be said is that it but created a slight conflict, and that the trial court was warranted in reaching the conclusion that the conflict should be resolved in favor of the defendant. In this connection it should be noted that, except as to the item just adverted to, there is not a particle of evidence of corroboration of the plaintiff on this particular count.

[2] The plaintiff contends also that he was entitled to a decree on the ground of extreme cruelty. He makes this contention on the following facts: In 1923, when the parties were separated, they met on the street, and the wife did not speak to him. He does not claim that he spoke to her. Later they lived together for some months. During their married life the plaintiff was engaged in practicing his profession as a physician and surgeon. His wife during the same period was actively engaged in practicing her profession as a trained nurse. They accumulated a little property. A part of that property consisted of some bonds. The amount is not stated in the evidence. The custody of those bonds was intrusted to the defendant. On a certain occasion the plaintiff asked his wife to deliver those bonds to him that he might borrow some rent money. She declined and he says she told him to go pawn something. If there was any real cruelty in the act, the subject was not sufficiently developed in the trial court to show the fact. While living in a certain apartment, an arrangement was made by which these parties agreed to pay, and did pay, a part of the cost of a telephone which was located in the landlady's apartment, and to which all should have access. At one time, when Mrs. Hunsberger wanted to use the phone, the landlady had locked the door. The plaintiff testified that thereupon Mrs. Hunsberger broke some panes of glass in the door, and that a quarrel ensued between her and the landlady. On another occasion the plaintiff testified that the defendant said to him, "You are no good, you are not a man." He further testified that on a certain occasion the spouses were living in the same house with the plaintiff's mother and were using the same kitchen. On one of the bills for groceries some items were entered which were groceries bought for the mother. However, there is evidence that these parties ate some of the groceries. There is not a particle of corroboration of any of the evidence so given by the plaintiff. Even though there were, it is patent that the trial court was exercising a sound discretion in refusing to base a decree of divorce on any one or all of the acts alleged. There is not a particle of evidence in the record to show that the defendant inflicted any bodily injury on the plaintiff nor that any one or all of her acts produced any grievous mental suffering on the part of the plaintiff. For all of these reasons the trial court did not err in holding that the plaintiff had not proved a cause of action as for extreme cruelty. Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 176, 30 P. 298, 16 L. R. A. 660.

[3] In its judgment the trial court awarded the defendant $50 as counsel fees. As the record does not show to the contrary, in support of the judgment we must assume that in due time the defendant, on proper notice, duly made a motion to be allowed counsel fees; that the motion was duly presented; that a ruling thereon was held in abeyance to abide the result of the trial; and that the item contained in the judgment is the ruling of the court thereon.

In paragraph 4 of his second cause of action the plaintiff alleged "(a) that on the 29th day of July, 1924, in the said city and county of San Francisco, plaintiff and defendant separated, by reason of defendant's extreme cruelty, (b) that the time intervening between the marriage of plaintiff and defendant and the date of their separation on said 29th day of July, 1924, is one year, eleven months and twenty-three days." (Parentheses ours.) He claims the court erred because it made no finding thereon. The first part of the allegation, which we have marked "a," seems to be an attempt to plead the theory stated in Civil Code, § 98. If so, there was no evidence thereon. On the other hand, if it was an attempt to plead matters of inducement under the theory stated in Civil Code, § 94, then it was sufficiently found on. The specific acts of cruelty were pleaded in paragraph 5, and in finding 6 the court found those facts against the plaintiff. The latter part of the paragraph quoted was an allegation to comply with subdivision 4 of section 426a of the Code of Civil Procedure. That allegation was found to be true in finding No. 4.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

99 Cal. App. 153

JOHNSON v. COYNE et al. (Civ. 3780.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 25, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Evidence held not insufficient as matter of law to justify finding that defendant's promise to pay for labor and material was original promise.

In action to recover amount alleged due for labor and material furnished, evidence held not insufficient as matter of law to sustain finding of trial court that defendant's promise to pay for such labor and material was an original one rather than mere promise to answer for default of another.

2. Contracts 🔑54(1)—Defendant promising after partial performance of work to pay therefor under terms of original agreement is liable for entire cost of work.

Where defendant, after plaintiff had partially performed work of decorating interior of house, promised to pay therefor under terms of original agreement for work performed and to be performed, defendant is bound by such promises for entire cost of work performed.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1048(6)—Cross-examination of defendant whether he had guaranteed payment of work performed by others, to which negative answer was given, held not prejudicial.

In action tried by court without jury to recover for labor and material furnished, based on defendant's alleged promise to pay therefor, cross-examination of defendant as to whether he had guaranteed payment of work performed by others upon premises in question, to which he answered either that he had not or did not remember, was not prejudicial to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William Hazlett, Judge.

Action by Pauline Johnson against William R. Coyne and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Julius V. Patrosso and C. C. Mishler, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bailie, Turner & Lake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff, as assignee of Nelson Bros., brought this action to recover an amount alleged to be due for labor performed and materials furnished in the painting and decorating of the interior of a dwelling house and to foreclose a lien for the value of such labor and materials. The court found against the existence of the alleged lien, but entered judgment against the defendants Coyne and Weisman for the amount demanded in the complaint. The defendant Coyne has appealed from the judgment.

The appellant contends that, at most, the evidence merely shows that he made an oral promise "to answer for the debt or default" of Weisman, and that such promise is invalid because not in writing. It is conceded, of course, that the evidence must be viewed in the light most favorable to the respondent, and all contradictory evidence is omitted.

[1] Prior to May 8, 1923, Coyne and his wife were the owners of the property involved in this suit. On that day they conveyed it to S. R. and Elizabeth S. Ow, who in turn gave Coyne and his wife a mortgage on the property to secure a promissory note for $15,000, and on July 5, 1923, Ow and his wife executed a trust deed to secure another promissory note in favor of the Coynes for $7,500, payable November 8, 1923. Thereafter and prior to the employment of the Nelsons, Ow and his wife conveyed the property to Weisman, subject to the mortgage and the trust deed. After the completion of the work and before the commencement of this suit the property was sold under the trust deed, Coyne and his wife becoming the purchasers, their bid being the only one made at the sale. The following evidence appears in the record, the quotations, except as otherwise stated, being taken from the testimony of R. A. Nelson, one of the Nelson Bros.:

"Mr. Coyne told us that he intended selling the house to a man named Mr. Weisman, and the condition of the house at the present time it couldn't be resold; so he was trying to arrange to have us redecorate it, and arrange a contract with Mr. Weisman for the redecorating of it, but yet Mr. Weisman didn't have any money, he was quite sure, and he wasn't quite sure Mr. Weisman would be able to pay for the contract; and if he didn't pay us, not to worry, that he, Mr. Coyne, would pay us. * * * He told us not to worry; that he would see the money got to us all right." On the following day the Nelsons met with Coyne and Weisman at the house in question. They were then informed for the first time that Weisman had purchased the property. "Mr. Coyne called me to one side and asked me about what my figure was. * * * I told him the price was $1,143, and he said: 'Well, I don't hardly think you will be able to get it out of Mr. Weisman, but if not I will pay you. * * * Figure about $200 on that price for me, in case he does pay you,' * * * but if Mr. Coyne was to pay it, he would pay $1,143." The Nelsons and Weisman thereupon agreed upon a price of $1,343 for the work, but no written contract was executed. "We were to receive $500 in 30 days, $643 in 60 days and $200 in 90 days. * * * After we had started to work, Mr. Coyne advised us to take our time on it, because he told us he didn't think Mr. Weisman was financially able to pay it, and to give him plenty of time to get it. And 30 days, when our first payment of $500 came due, we hunted up Mr. Weisman, and Mr. Weisman informed us that he was unable to pay us at that time; and we went to Mr. Coyne and told him that, and Mr. Coyne told us the best thing for us to do would be to knock off the job; and he said he knew Mr. Weisman couldn't get anybody to duplicate our work or finish the job; and Mr. Weisman also knew that; and if we knocked off the job we might bring Mr. Weisman to terms and persuade him to get the money." The Nelsons then quit work for "two weeks or more" and then returned at Coyne's suggestion. "He came to our house one evening and told us * * * he thought he had it arranged for Mr. Weisman to sell the house to a Mr. Eiseman; that Mr. Coyne would take care of the first initial payment due us, and we could enter into a contract for the balance of the work to be done, with Mr. Eiseman." About 40 per cent. of the work had been done at that time. Before commencing work under the original contract, "Mr. Coyne told us * * * not to do anything on the house without consulting him first, in regards to colors and one thing and another." Coyne "told us to go ahead and draw up a contract with Mr. Eiseman to finish the house, and try to get as much from him as possible, but for us not to worry, that the job really went on on the old agreement." The Nelsons then entered into a written agreement with Eiseman to complete the work for $750, and "Mr. Coyne told us before we did any finish decorating in the house * * * to consult him first, because he didn't want the house ruined again like it had been in the first place. * * * Q. Did you have any further conversation after that time with Mr. Coyne, respecting the work? A. He and Mr. Weisman came on the job one day and seemed very excited, and told us that the way things were shaping up he thought Mr. Eiseman would not be able to hold the house. * * * He told us that if Mr. Weisman got the house back from Mr. Eiseman, that we would start right in again, and Mr. Coyne and Mr. Weisman would pay us right up on the old contract. * * * Mr. Coyne * * * came to us one day and told us that we were not to let Mr. Eiseman in the house." The Nelsons then quit work on the house. The work was "pretty well advanced" at that time. About "a week or a week and a half" later they resumed work at Coyne's request. "He told us to come back over and resume work on the job; that he had the house back, and we should come back and finish the job and he and Mr. Weisman would pay us." After the work was completed "Mr. Coyne said the work was entirely satisfactory, and he was sure it would be sold in a short time to somebody with some money, and whoever he sold it to he was going to sell it with the agreement that they were going to help him pay us for our decorating."

During the progress of the work Coyne visited the job "nearly every day," and, according to Nelson's testimony, he gave instructions that no changes be made in the decorations as planned without his approval and, from time to time, he directed the temporary discontinuance and the resumption of work. At the time the Nelsons agreed to do the work, Coyne told them that "Weisman didn't have any money * * * and he wasn't quite sure Mr. Weisman would be able to pay for the contract." It is a reasonable inference from the evidence that Coyne then believed that Weisman was not financially able to pay for the property and that Coyne was anxious to have the house redecorated because in its then condition "it couldn't be resold." He knew that the promissory note for $7,500, secured by the trust deed, was long overdue and that, since Weisman had no money, it would be necessary to effect a sale of the property. He knew that the redecorating would add greatly to the market value of the house and that if he became the purchaser at a sale of the property under the trust deed he would receive the full value of the work to be done. The Nelsons were employed on March 18, 1924. Nelson testified that the work was completed about July 22, 1924. The trustee's deed to the Coynes recites that on July 12, 1924, the Coynes recorded notice of default in payment of the promissory note and their election to cause the property to be sold. From these facts it appears that Coyne was taking steps to cause the sale of the property before the work was finished. It cannot be held, as a matter of law, that the evidence is insufficient to warrant the finding of the trial court to the effect that Coyne's promise was an original one rather than a mere promise to answer for the default of Weisman. Under a similar state of facts, in Davis v. Patrick, 141 U. S. 479, 12 S. Ct. 58, 35 L. Ed. 826, the court said:

"Were it not for the Statute of Frauds there would be no question, for obviously there were both promise and consideration. Defendant relies upon that provision of the Statute of Frauds which forbids the maintenance of an action 'to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing,' etc. The purpose of this provision was not to effectuate, but to prevent, wrong. It does not apply to promises in respect to debts created at the instance and for the benefit of the promisor, but only to those by which the debt of one party is sought to be charged upon and collected from another. * * * Whenever the alleged promisor is an absolute stranger to the transaction, and without interest in it, courts strictly uphold the obligations of this statute. But cases sometimes arise in which, though a third party is the original obligor, the primary debtor, the promisor has a personal, immediate and pecuniary interest in the transaction, and is therefore himself a party to be benefited by the performance of the promisee. In such cases the reason which underlies and which prompted this statutory provision fails, and the courts will give effect to the promise. * * * There is a marked difference between a promise which, without any interest in the subject-matter of the promise in the promisor, is purely collateral to the obligation of a third party, and that which, though operating upon the debt of a third party, is also and mainly for the benefit of the promisor. The case before us is in the latter category."

When the work was nearing completion the defendant Coyne told the Nelsons that "if Mr. Weisman got the house back from Mr. Eiseman, that we would start right in again, and Mr. Coyne and Mr. Weisman would pay us right up on the old contract." At a later time Coyne requested the Nelsons to resume work, saying that "he had the house back * * * and he and Mr. Weisman would pay us." In Ogden v. United Bank & Trust Co. (Cal. Sup.) 275 P. 430, the defendant bank was held bound by a promise made under similar circumstances, after the work involved in that action had been partially performed.

[2] Appellant contends that "the judgment is excessive, as it appears without conflict from the testimony on behalf of the respondent that the appellant was to be liable only for the sum of $500 in the event Nelson Brothers made a contract with J. J. Eiseman." The evidence referred to in the last paragraph shows that at and subsequent to the time that Eiseman gave up the property, Coyne promised to pay the Nelsons under the terms of the original agreement for the work performed and to be performed. Under the Ogden Case, he is bound by such promises.

[3] Appellant complains that "the trial court, over the objections of the appellant, permitted the introduction of evidence to the effect that the appellant had guaranteed the payment of work performed by others upon the premises in question." The part of the record to which appellant calls attention, however, does not support his statement. He was asked on cross-examination if he had "guaranteed the payment of some of the bills on this job by a written guarantee." Without objection he replied that he had not. Later his objections to similar questions were overruled, and in each instance his answer was either that he had not guaranteed payment or that he did not remember. Finally he gave an answer which was not responsive to the question asked him, to the effect that he had paid some Japanese for washing windows and some "working men." Bearing in mind that the case was tried before the court without a jury, the appellant could not have been prejudiced by the cross-examination.

The judgment is affirmed.

RINKENBERGER v. RINKENBERGER.★
(Civ. 3778.)

Rehearing Denied June 14, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 15, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⚿1071(6)—Judgment will not be reversed for want of finding upon an issue concerning which no evidence was introduced.

Judgment will not be reversed for want of finding upon an issue where no evidence has been introduced in relation to such issue.

2. Divorce ⚿331—Decree for future alimony is as to installments past-due and unpaid entitled to full faith and credit, provided decree was not modified prior to maturity of installments (Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1).

A decree for future payment of alimony is as to installments past-due and unpaid within protection of full faith and credit clause of federal Constitution (Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1), provided that no modification of the decree was made prior to the maturity of such installments.

3. Divorce ⚿331—Washington interlocutory decree held entitled to full faith and credit as to past-due installments of alimony (Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1; Rem. & Bal. Code Wash., § 988, as amended by Laws Wash. 1921, p. 332, § 2).

Interlocutory decree of divorce providing for payment of alimony in installments, as authorized by Rem. & Bal. Code Wash., § 988, as amended by Laws Wash. 1921, p. 332, § 2, followed by final divorce decree, held entitled, under Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1, to full faith and credit as to overdue installments; the Washington statute giving the court no power to modify decree as to past-due installments.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by Lily Rinkenberger against Fred W. Rinkenberger. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rupert B. Turnbull, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

PLUMMER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles finding that there is due the plaintiff the sum of $7,277, based upon a judgment of divorce entered in the superior court of King county, in the state of Washington, adjudging the plaintiff in this action entitled to a divorce from the defendant herein, and awarding the plaintiff alimony, payable in monthly installments, the overdue monthly installments amounting to the sum just herein stated. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

Upon this appeal the defendant sets forth two grounds alleged as sufficient cause for reversal: First, that the trial court failed to find upon certain affirmative defenses set up as counterclaims or offsets by the defendant; and, second, that the judgment of the superior court of King county, of the state of Washington, is not a final judgment to which full faith and credit can or should be given in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States.

[1] The counterclaims set up by the defendant are respectively in amounts of $500, $600, and $1,200, alleged as the value of certain personal property awarded to the defendant by the superior court of King county, and alleged to have been, at the time of the entry of judgment in said court, in the possession of the appellant in this action, and not delivered to the defendant in pursuance of the division of property between the plaintiff and defendant made by the superior court of King county. This cause is before us upon the judgment roll alone, and a careful reading of the record fails to disclose that there was a particle of evidence introduced by the defendant to sustain any one of his alleged counterclaims. The only semblance of support to defendant's claim is that the court reduced the amount of $8,650, found as the total amount of the accrued installments, to the sum of $7,277. This, however, is shown to have no foundation when the finding of the court in relation to these items is considered. Finding 4 of the trial court reads: "That since the 4th day of April, 1922, there has become due and owing from the above named defendant to the above named plaintiff, upon said interlocutory decree of divorce, the sum of $8,650.00; that no part of said sum has been paid, except the sum of $1,373.00," which, by following the ordinary rules of subtraction leaves the amount found due by the court the sum of $7,277. There being no testimony in the record, the conclusion is absolute, so far as an appellate court is concerned, that there was testimony introduced showing payment as found by the court, in the sum of $1,373. We do not need to review the authorities cited by the appellant that the failure of the court to find upon an essential issue or a material issue entitles an appellant to a reversal, for the law is equally clear and well settled in this state that a judgment will not be reversed for want of finding upon an issue where no evidence has been introduced in relation to such issue, and as was said in the case of Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 P. 1098, quoting from 3 Cal. Unrep. 92, 21 P. 731: "In the case at bar, which is brought here upon the judgment roll alone, we will not presume, against the correctness of the judgment, that there was evidence upon a point with respect to which there is no finding." To the same effect are the following cases: Leviston v. Ryan, 75 Cal. 293, 17 P. 239; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 P. 504, where the subject is considered at length. Other cases might be cited, but the rule we have stated has never been departed from.

Appellant cites Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 437, 26 P. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 214. The opinion, however, in that case, as shown on page 439, of said volume (26 P. 204) sets forth certain facts and circumstances which distinguishes that case from the case at bar and the others which we have cited as controlling here. In the Spect Case it appears that the record showed that the trial court gave as a reason for not making findings upon certain issues that such findings were immaterial, and therefore the Supreme Court presumed that evidence had been introduced in support of the issues set up in the pleadings.

There being absolutely nothing in the record to show that the defendant introduced any evidence whatever, or that the trial court had any facts or circumstances before it upon which it could base any finding as to the defendant's alleged counterclaims, it must be held that the appellant's first contention that the court did not find upon material issues is not well taken.

[2] The second alleged error of the trial court involves the question as to whether the provision for the payment of alimony in installments contained in an interlocutory decree of divorce, followed by a final decree of divorce, is a final judgment as to installments overdue, to which full faith and credit shall be given, etc., under the provisions of section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States.

The record shows that in this case an interlocutory decree of divorce was entered in the superior court of King county, state of Washington, followed by an absolute decree of divorce, and that the interlocutory decree of divorce, providing for the payment of alimony in installments, was never appealed from and has not been modified or changed in any particular. This action involves only overdue installments and the judgment does not purport to in any way bind the defendant for the payment of accruing installments. The action is really in the form of one to collect or obtain judgment for the amount hereinbefore set forth, based upon the accrued and overdue installments ordered paid by the defendant to the plaintiff in an interlocutory decree of divorce.

Section 988 of Remington & Ballinger's Annotated Codes and Statutes of Washington as amended by Laws Wash. 1921, p. 332, § 2, reads as follows: "Pending the action for the divorce, the court, or judge thereof, may make, and by attachment enforce, such orders for the disposition of the persons, property and children of the parties as may be deemed right and proper, and such orders relative to the expenses of such action as will insure to the wife an efficient preparation of her case, and a fair and impartial trial thereof; at the conclusion of the trial the court must make and file findings of fact and conclusions of law. If it determines that no divorce shall be granted final judgment must thereupon be entered accordingly. If, however, the court determines that either party, or both, is entitled to a divorce an interlocutory order must be entered accordingly, declaring that the party in whose favor the court decides is entitled to a decree of divorce as hereinafter provided; which order shall also make all necessary provisions as to alimony, costs, care, custody, support and education of children and custody, management and division of property, which order as to the custody, management and division of property shall be final and conclusive upon the parties subject only to the right of appeal; but in no case shall such interlocutory order be considered or construed to have the effect of dissolving the marriage of the parties to the action, or of granting a divorce, until final judgment is entered: Provided, that the court shall, at all times, have the power to grant any and all restraining orders that may be necessary to protect the parties and secure justice. Appeals may be taken from such interlocutory order within 90 days after its entry."

The appellant's contention has to do with that portion of the section which we have just set out, with making necessary provisions as to alimony, costs, care, custody, support, and education of children, and the argument made that, as the section provides that the order of the court is final only as to the custody, management, and division of property, subject only to the right of appeal, that the payment of accrued or overdue installments of alimony are payable only subject to the discretion of the trial court, and therefore cannot in any sense constitute a final judgment. In other words, that, as the section expresses the idea of the Legislature that judgment as to the disposition of property shall be final, it follows as a necessary consequence that the decree of the court as to the payment of alimony was not intended to become final as to any installments whether accrued or to accrue. In support of this contention appellant cites the cases of Hodge v. Hodge, 125 Wash. 347, 215 P. 1044; Ruge v. Ruge, 97 Wash. 51, 165 P. 1063, L. R. A. 1917F, 721, and other cases in line therewith where the Supreme Court of Washington has held, prior to the amendment of section 988 of Remington & Ballinger's Annotated Codes, the allowance of alimony could not be subsequently modified, and argues therefrom that, as the Legislature, by the section as amended, intended, by making only that part of the decree of the court relating to a division of the property final, it intended that the allowance of alimony, payable in installments, whether accrued or to accrue, should never become final and constitute a basis for an action in another state under section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States. None of these cases, so far as we have been able to discover, have dealt with the question of overdue installments. This is illustrated by the syllabus in the case of Hodge v. Hodge, supra, which is similar to all the other cases cited, to wit: "Where a decree of divorce is absolute and there are minor children and permanent alimony is awarded, the court may, even in the absence of a reservation to subsequently make further orders, modify the decree as respects alimony to meet altered conditions." This is only in line with section 139 of the Civil Code of this state, which provides that, where alimony or support has been provided for in an interlocutory decree of divorce, that the court may "from time to time, modify its orders in these respects."

Appellant further cites and relies upon the case of Sistare v. Sistare, 218 U. S. 1, 30 S. Ct. 682, 54 L. Ed. 905, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1068, 20 Ann. Cas. 1061, and quotes from that case the following: "Where, by the law of the State in which a judgment for future alimony is rendered, the right to demand and receive such future alimony is discretionary with the court which rendered the decree, to such an extent that no absolute or vested right attaches to receive the installments ordered by the decree to be paid, even although no application to annul or modify the decree in respect to alimony had been made prior to the installments becoming due;" the rule of full faith and credit to the judgment of sister states does not apply. However, the section of the Washington code with which we are dealing contains no such provision, nor is there any implication contained within the language of the section which would warrant the conclusion drawn by the appellant. The power conferred upon the court by the section as to alimony is no different in substance from the power conferred by the code sections in our own and other states which has been held to apply only to future installments. Thus, the very case which the appellant cites is an authority against his contention. The rule is there laid down as follows: "A decree for the future payment of alimony is, as to installments past due and unpaid, within the protection of the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution, provided that no modification of the decree was made prior to the maturity of such instalments." The Sistare Case had to do with the code provisions of the state of New York, similar in form and substance with our own and the Washington code, and the Supreme Court of the United States further said, in relation thereto, that "decrees of the New York courts for the future payment of alimony are not subject to annullment or modification by those courts as to overdue and unsatisfied instalments, so as to deprive such decrees of the protection, as to past-due and unpaid installments, of the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution." The Sistare Case is also reported in 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1068, where a long line of other cases are cited supporting the same rule.

In the case of Holton v. Holton, 153 Minn. 346, 190 N. W. 542, 41 A. L. R. 1415, we find the following: "So long as a judgment for alimony payable in instalments is absolute in its terms and remains unmodified, or at least until an application for modification has been made, it is final as to instalments which have accrued and is entitled to full faith and credit in the courts of a sister state in an action founded upon it." Beginning on page 1419 of 41 A. L. R., a list of authorities supporting this same rule is set forth, which is too long to be more than mentioned herein.

In Myers v. Myers, 62 Utah, 90, 218 P. 123, 30 A. L. R. 74, the Supreme Court of Utah reviews a large number of cases having to do with the questions here under consideration, including the case of Sistare v. Sistare, supra, and other cases cited by the United States Supreme Court, and then holds that "the court has no power to affect instalments of alimony which have actually accrued, under a statute providing that subsequent changes or new orders may be made in respect to the disposition of property as shall be [deemed] reasonable and proper." The same holding is had in the case of Bolton v. Bolton, 86 N. J. Law, 622, 92 A. 389, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 938. This case holds that alimony payable in installments confers a vested right as to the installments that had become actually due and payable. To the same effect is the case of Guess v. Smith, 100 Miss. 457, 56 So. 166, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 300. This case, as reported in Ann. Cas. supra, is followed by a note citing a long list of authorities supporting the rule heretofore stated. The same rule is supported by the few cases in California where the subject has been considered, to wit: In Soule v. Soule, 4 Cal. App. 97, 87 P. 205, the subject is considered on pages 105–107 of that volume (87 P. 208, 209); also, Cummings v. Cummings (Cal. App.) 275 P. 245, where it is said: "A judgment for alimony is not subject to modification as to sums already accrued and past-due."

[3] The respondent makes the point that the appellant has failed to prove the law of Washington, other than the mere introduction of the section of the code referred to. The objection of the respondent appears to be well taken, as this action was tried prior to the amendment to section 1875, Code of Civil Procedure, in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 110), but we are nevertheless satisfied that the section of the Washington code having to do with the allowance of alimony and future changes in the amount of the allowance bears only the construction which has been given to like statutes and code provisions in other states, and that, as to overdue installments of alimony contained in a decree granting a divorce in the state of Washington, the full faith and credit clause of the Constitution applies, and constituted a basis for the action instituted by the plaintiff against the defendant in this cause.

The judgment of the trial court is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Robert H. Scott, Judge.

Action by Dave C. Anderson against the Van Camp Sea Food Company, Inc., and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Loucks & Phister, of San Pedro, for appellants.

Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in a suit in assumpsit to recover purchase money wrongfully retained by the vendor after a breach of contract to sell and convey a fishing boat.

The appellants operated a fish canning and packing establishment at San Pedro, Cal. March 4, 1918, the respondent executed and delivered his note and entered into a written contract, termed a "purchase lease," with the appellants, by the terms of which they agreed to sell and convey to the respondent a motorboat called "Freedom" for the sum of $8,500. This contract contained the following provision:

"The above note is given * * * for the consideration that the said lessor has agreed * * * that upon the payment of said note, * * * at maturity * * * they will sell and transfer to the undersigned * * * the boat 'Freedom.' * * * The legal title thereof is (to remain) in said lessor * * * until they shall make the aforesaid sale and transfer. * * * This note is payable in installments of one thousand dollars on or before June 15, 1918—Balance to be (paid from) the boat's share of all earning."

This contract contained no forfeiture clause. Contemporaneously with the execution of this contract and note another agreement was entered into between the same parties, by the terms of which the plaintiff was employed for the seasons of 1918, 1919, and 1920, to use said boat and actively engage in fishing exclusively for the appellants, promptly cleaning and delivering to the cannery at San Pedro, all fish caught, on consideration of which the appellants promised to pay the market price for all albacore, tuna, skipjack, and other fish. The boat was to be registered in the name of the vendor and remain its property until fully paid for. The contract of employment, however, provided in part that:

"Whereas second party (the respondent) is the owner or the operator of a boat * * * named 'Freedom,' and * * * second party is indebted to first party at this date in the sum of $8,500.00, it is agreed that from time to time at the option of the first party, this contract may be extended until any and all such indebtedness * * * is paid in full. * * * It is herewith agreed by both parties that this contract (for fishing) shall cover the seasons of 1918, 1919 and 1920. * * * Second party herewith agrees to haul fish at any time for the first party at the rate of $50 per day. Second party to pay all expenses."

[1, 2] Subsequently a similar written contract for fishing in the Mexican waters of Lower California for the season of 1919 was executed. These fishing expeditions were not profitable. Later oral agreements were made, by the terms of which the respondent consented to use the boat "Freedom" and render personal services in hauling fish and supplies for appellants in consideration of agreed cash wages and an additional credit to be allowed on his note for the purchase of the boat. Pursuant to these oral agreements, respondent testified that in the season of 1920, he worked ninety days, for which he was paid $10 per day as wages, with a promise to credit him with $15 per day additional on the purchase price of the boat, for which latter sum appellants failed to give him credit. He testified:

"In the latter part of June he (Gilbert Van Camp) told me I could get a contract to haul fish (for appellants). He said I would be paid $25.00 a day for the boat and that they would pay all expenses. The company would pay me $10.00 per day in cash for my time and $15.00 a day, as then agreed on, was to be applied as the boat's share. I worked ninety days and was paid $10.00 a day which was deducted from the $25.00 a day, leaving $15.00 per day as the boat's share to be applied against the indebtedness owed by me on the boat."

In 1921 the respondent had no specific employment with the appellants. But in 1922 he was again hired for a term of ninety days, agreeing to use the boat and haul fish and supplies under a similar contract for $25 per day, except that from this sum he was to receive only $150 per month, the balance, to wit, $1,800 was to be credited on the boat account. Mr. Gilbert Van Camp substantially corroborated this oral contract of employment. He said:

"My recollection is that when he (the respondent) tendered, we were to credit his account $15.00 or $20.00 a day for the boat, and in addition we were to pay for gas, oil, and food actually used while tendering. During the season of 1920 Mr. Anderson tendered for the Van Camp Sea Food Company, that is, hauled fish and supplies. * * * During that time we paid him a salary for himself and agreed to credit his account * * * (on) the boat with so much per day for the use of the boat."

There may be some conflict in the evidence regarding the time the respondent was employed under the last-mentioned contract. But the attention of the court is not called to any evidence indicating that these two items of $15 per day for ninety days' service each season for two years, aggregating the sum of $3,150, were ever credited to his boat account or otherwise paid. There are other items for which the respondent claimed he had not been paid. These other items, however, need not be considered. The appellants may not complain if the trial court allowed the respondent less than the aggregate amount which might find support by the record. He was given judgment for the sum of $2,813.53, together with interest. At least this sum does find support in the evidence, although the testimony is conflicting.

The chief discrepancy between the accounts of the appellants and the respondent in the various transactions involved in this suit is the omission to credit the boat account with the agreed sums above mentioned for hauling supplies and the fact that numerous items were charged to the respondent on account of nets and equipment for the boat, which under the terms of the note and contract were to be supplied by the vendor in consideration for the original purchase price of $8,500. The note and contract clearly imposed upon the appellants the obligation of equipping the boat with machinery, nets, and apparatus. The agreement read:

"The * * * lessor has agreed and * * * they will sell and transfer to the undersigned, at the price of said principal and interest the boat 'Freedom' * * * together with all nets and equipment."

[3] The appellants assert that the respondent is barred from maintaining this action for the reason that he was in default for failure to pay the first installment of $1,000 as provided by the note within the time prescribed.

The record, however, contains evidence in support of the implied finding that the respondent was not guilty of a breach in this regard. The respondent testified that he turned over his automobile, which was sold for $600, and the proceeds, less the sum of $135 expended as costs of sale, were paid to appellants and credited on the boat account in 1918. He also testified that he paid in behalf of appellants the further sum of $800 or $900 for fishing nets and equipment for the boat, at the time it was first launched, which sum should also have been credited to the boat account. These two payments exceeded the amount of the first cash installment required. If these payments were not promptly made within the time prescribed, the delay was waived by subsequently crediting the proceeds of the sale of the automobile without objection and by conduct indicating that strict compliance with respect to the time of making this payment was not insisted upon.

[4] In spite of these substantial payments made by the respondent, the appellants, without notice and without compensating the respondent, sold and conveyed the boat to another purchaser in 1924. This conduct amounted to a rescission and abandonment of the contract on the part of the appellants, and authorized the instituting of this suit in assumpsit against the vendor for the money paid by respondent and retained on account of of purchase price of the boat. 17 Cal. Jur. 614, §§ 10, 11, 13. In Bankston v. Hill, 37 A. L. R., note, p. 102, it is said: "Where the contract of conditional sale contains no forfeiture clause, express or implied, the only provision in this regard being a reservation of the title until payment of the purchase price, if the seller, upon default of the buyer, enforces this latter clause by retaking the property and disposing of it to his own use, he renders himself liable to account to the buyer for the money paid by the latter on the purchase price."

The principle announced in San Diego Const. Co. v. Mannix, 175 Cal. 548, 553, 166 P. 325, 327, is applicable to the present case, as follows: "Where performance of a contract to convey is due and the vendor refuses to perform it or fails to perform on being duly requested to do so, * * * the vendee may, if he chooses, treat such breach as an abandonment and termination of the contract and may then abandon it himself, and, 'the contract having thus come to an end, he may sue at law to recover what he has paid, in an action for money had and received; for, the contract being at an end, the vendor holds money of the vendee to which he has no right, and to repay which, therefore, the law implies his promise.' (Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 10 [55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17]; Alderson v. Houston, 154 Cal. 12 [96 P. 884]; 3 Elliott on Contracts, sec. 2095; 1 Sugden on Vendors, p. 357.)"

[5, 6] Where the vendor has resold and conveyed the property to another person, and is therefore unable to transfer title to the original vendee, demand for performance is unnecessary as a prerequisite to the maintenance of an action to recover the purchase money which has been paid. The resale of the boat by the vendor and consequent inability to deliver it to respondent pursuant to the contract, created a failure of consideration. Russ L. & M. Co. v. Muscupiabe Land & Water Co., 120 Cal. 521, 52 P. 995, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186. Where the consideration has wholly failed, formal rescission on the part of the vendee is unnecessary. Richter v. Union L. & S. Co., 129 Cal. 367, 373, 62 P. 39.

[7, 8] Except for the payment of the first installment of $1,000, there was no limitation of time designated for the fulfillment of the contract. When the time for the completion of a contract is omitted, the law implies that a reasonable time is intended to be allowed for the performance. 6 R. C. L. 896, § 283; 6 Cal. Jur. 218, § 143. In determining what period constitutes a reasonable time, when the contract is silent in that regard, the situation of the parties and the nature of the transaction which is involved must be considered. 6 R. C. L. 896, § 283. In the present case the contract of employment provided that: "At the option of the first party, this contract may be extended until any and all such indebtedness * * * is paid in full." From the fact that the appellants orally renewed their contract employing the respondent to haul fish for its benefit as late as 1922, specifically agreeing to credit the boat account with a portion of the compensation therefor, it is evident that the agreement to purchase the boat was still considered to have been in force and that it had not been abandoned or breached. Since the contract was silent as to the term for the employment of the respondent, either to fish or haul supplies for the appellants, it could be terminated only upon notice. Section 1999 of the Civil Code provides: "An employment, having no specified term, may be terminated at the will of either party, on notice to the other."

No notice terminating this employment was ever given to the respondent. The validity of the contract was recognized by appellants as late as the season of 1922, by orally employing the respondent to haul supplies and by agreeing to credit a portion of his earnings to the boat account.

[9] The appellants contend that the court erroneously rendered judgment against the Van Camp Sea Food Company, Inc., for the reason that there was no privity of contract between it and the respondent. It is true that the contract which forms the basis of the obligation resulting in the judgment was in fact executed by the predecessor of the "Inc." Company only, and that no credit was given respondent on this contract after the incorporation was accomplished, in July, 1923. When this change in the organization occurred, however, the new corporation purchased and took over all the business and properties of the original company, including the boat which is involved in this suit; the president, if not the entire organization, remained the same. The record indicates that the transformation of the original company into the corporation was a mere change of form for the convenience of business and that the blood, bone and sinew of the organization remained the same. As the court says in Blanc v. Paymaster Mining Co., 95 Cal. 524, 30 P. 765, 29 Am. St. Rep. 149.

"'Equity cannot permit the owners of one corporation to organize another, and transfer from the former to the latter all the corporate property, without paying all the corporate debts.' * * * 'A mere change of name cannot avoid obligations. The new corporation took all the property of the old, went forward with its business, * * * was, in short, the old corporation, and now seeks to escape the obligations of the old. * * * The old corporation and its property were liable to the demands of the plaintiff. The new corporation must respond to the extent of the property acquired.'"

Having taken over the business and the property of the original company, including the boat in question, which it subsequently sold, we are of the opinion that the corporation also assumed liability for the breach of this contract. In 4 Cook on Corporations (6th Ed.) 3295, § 897, it is said: "This new consolidated corporation usually succeeds to all the obligations of the old companies."

Likewise, in 7 Ruling Case Law, 184, § 157, it is said: "The consolidated corporation is answerable for the performance of executory contracts entered into by the consolidated corporations, and by which they were bound at the time of the consolidation, such as a contract to convey land."

The same principle applies when one company is merged into a corporation which takes title and possession of all the property and the business of the former organization. Stanford Hotel Co. v. M. Schwind Co., 180 Cal. 348, 181 P. 780.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HARBAND. (Cr. 1795.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. May 17, 1929.

1. Criminal law 🔑1166½(1)—Error of trial court, on motion for new trial, in reading order appointing guardian for complaining witness which was not in evidence held not prejudicial.

Where testimony was admitted without objection in prosecution for grand theft to effect that complaining witness was mentally and physically weak and guardian had been appointed, action of trial court on motion for new trial in reading order appointing guardian which had not been introduced in evidence was not prejudicial error; such evidence being merely cumulative.

2. Criminal law 🔑1144(18)—Appellate court will presume trial court granted new trial on ground specified and correctly applied law in testing sufficiency of evidence.

On appeal by the state from an order granting a new trial after conviction, appellate court will presume that trial court granted new trial on ground set forth in order and correctly applied law in testing sufficiency of evidence.

3. Criminal law 🔑935(1)—On motion for new trial for insufficiency of evidence, court must consider witness' manner of testifying contradictory statements and uncontradicted testimony to determine credibility.

Where there was testimony showing that complaining witness was physically and mentally weak, court, in considering such testimony on motion for new trial for insufficiency of evidence to sustain conviction, must take into consideration manner in which witness testified contradictory statements and facts testified to without contradiction or objection regarding condition of witness for purpose of determining degree of credibility to be attached to his testimony.

4. Criminal law 🔑935(1)—Court, on motion for new trial, may consider circumstances surrounding testimony of witness, though no objection was made to competency.

Where there was testimony to the effect that complaining witness in prosecution for grand theft was mentally and physically weak, fact that no objection was made to the competency of witness, or that defendant did not request privilege of examining witness upon his voir dire, did not preclude jury in first instance and trial judge on motion for new trial from considering testimony in the light of surrounding circumstances.

5. Criminal law 🔑935(1)—On motion for new trial, court need not give full faith and credit to verdict of jury supported by direct evidence.

Trial court in passing upon motion for new trial is not bound to give full faith and credit to verdict of jury which is supported by direct evidence.

6. Criminal law 🔑911—Trial court has wide discretion in passing on motion for new trial.

Trial court having heard the testimony and observed jurors and had opportunity of testing truth of defendant's testimony, by noticing his demeanor, has wide discretion in passing on motion for new trial after conviction.

7. Criminal law 🔑1144(18)—Appellate court will presume that trial court, in granting motion for new trial, acted with full appreciation of duties and obligations (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Appellate court will presume that conclusion reached by trial court in granting a new trial was not governed by any idle or mere technical reasons, but that trial court acted with full appreciation of duties and obligations, having in mind Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that new trial shall not be granted in criminal case for erroneous admission of evidence unless miscarriage of justice resulted.

8. Criminal law 🔑1158(1)—Discretion of trial court in granting new trial, where court entertained reasonable doubt concerning defendant's guilt, was not reviewed.

Where it was apparent that trial judge entertained doubt concerning whether defendant was merely buying securities for himself and reselling when opportunity afforded, or whether he was actually engaged in the business of broker, discretion of trial court in granting a new trial after conviction for conducting brokerage business without a license was not reviewed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Harry I. Harband was convicted of grand theft and acting as a broker and conducting a brokerage business without a license. From an order granting a new trial, the people appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., Warner I. Praul, of Los Angeles, and Stephen Connell, Dist. Atty., and E. N. Clark, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for the People.

Elwin L. Eckert of San Diego, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J. The grand jury of San Diego county returned an indictment against the defendant charging him in count 1 with grand theft, in count 2 with a violation of the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) for having sold securities without a license, and in count 3 with violation of the same statute in acting as a broker and conducting a brokerage business without a license. At the close of the testimony offered by the prosecution the second count of the indictment was dismissed. Verdicts of guilty were returned by the jury upon the other two counts. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was granted "on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence." The people prosecute this appeal from the order granting the new trial.

The complaining witness as to count 1 was Carl Fuhrken. It is to be noted that the district attorney, as well as counsel for the defense, elicited the larger share of the testimony of this witness by asking leading questions. It is also observed that this witness, who gave the most damaging testimony against the respondent, contradicted himself on several occasions. During the examination of his divorced wife, a graduate nurse, it developed that she had been appointed guardian of his estate and person. She also testified that Mr. Fuhrken was mentally and physically sick; that this sickness had been coming on for two or three years; that she signed the petition to have herself appointed guardian. Without giving full credence to the testimony of the complaining witness it must be conceded that the testimony respecting count 1 makes it doubtful whether the respondent is guilty. This assertion is made after a review of the record and having in mind that the testimony as it appears on the printed page may be sufficient to support the verdict.

[1] Under these circumstances, when the motion for a new trial came before the trial judge, he said that he wanted to see, and he secured and read, the order adjudging Carl Fuhrken to be incompetent. This order had not theretofore been introduced, and appellant complains of this action of the court, saying that it abused its discretion in receiving evidence outside the record. There might be merit in this contention of the appellant had not Mrs. Fuhrken testified without objection and without contradiction to her appointment as guardian, and to the fact that the witness was mentally and physically sick. She having testified, however, to those facts, the order was merely cumulative evidence thereof, and, while it may have been erroneous for the trial judge to have inspected the order, the error certainly cannot be said to have been prejudicial or harmful.

[2-7] Appellant also urges that the trial court erred in granting a new trial on the ground that the witness Carl Fuhrken was incompetent to testify. It is true that the court indicated during a discussion with counsel that the testimony of an incompetent was not the character of evidence upon which to send a man to the penitentiary, but he afterwards said: "The court is in a position that it cannot sit here and ignore the question at issue as to the insufficiency of the evidence and so overlook the fact that it is the court's duty to see what the evidence is and that it cannot send a man to the penitentiary on evidence that is not sufficient." But even though this statement were not a part of the record, we should be compelled to assume that the court granted the new trial upon the ground set forth in the order, to wit: "The insufficiency of the evidence," and that he correctly applied the law in testing its sufficiency. Undoubtedly he had the authority, and it was his duty upon this motion to take into consideration the manner in which the witness testified, the contradictory statements and the facts testified to by Mrs. Fuhrken without contradiction or objection that the witness was mentally sick and that she had been appointed his guardian, for the purpose of determining the degree of credibility to be attached to his statements. Counsel for appellant say that no objection was made by the defendant during the trial to the competency of the witness, and that respondent did not request the privilege of examining him upon his voir dire. No objection was in fact made, but this does not militate against the right of the jury in the first instance, and the trial judge upon the motion, to weigh his testimony in the light of all the surrounding circumstances. The record is barren of showing that the trial judge finally excluded the testimony of Fuhrken from consideration in weighing the evidence on the motion.

In so far as it is urged that respondent did not request the right to examine the witness to test the degree of his competency and credibility, it must be borne in mind that the entire examinaton constituted such a mental inspection. What we have already said disposes of the contention of appellant that the court erred while ruling upon the motion by holding as a matter of law that grand theft may not be committed where a promissory note is given in exchange for the article alleged to be stolen. We cannot say that the court so ruled. Furthermore, we do not interpret his remarks as so holding, but merely that where the note is given in good faith it is an ordinary business proposition. In view of the reliance by appellant upon the authority of People v. Hennessey, 201 Cal. 568, 258 P. 49, which, in effect, declares, if the verdict of the jury is supported by direct evidence, it must be given full faith and credit, we must direct attention to the fact that, while this rule of law applies to the consideration of the evidence by appellate tribunals, the trial judge in considering the testimony for the purpose of passing upon the motion for a new trial is not restricted to any such narrow limits.

The broad discretion with which the trial judge is clothed, and which we have already indicated, is well expressed in the case of People v. Canfield, 173 Cal. 309, 159 P. 1046, as follows: "The judge who presided at the trial of the cause who heard the testimony, who observed the jurors and had an opportunity also of testing the truth of the defendant's statements by noticing his demeanor was in a peculiarly favorable position for determining justly the question whether or not the defendant had been accorded a fair trial. We cannot follow the mental processes of the judge. He may have been profoundly impressed with the influence upon the jury, to Canfield's injury, of the introduction of the evidence tending to prove another offense. Or he may have doubted the identification by the witnesses for the prosecution of Canfield as the man who passed as Rabild in the transactions leading to the sale of the note and mortgage. We can hardly manufacture in fancy a hypothetical situation in which a reviewing court would be justified in questioning the discretion of a trial court who should grant a new trial in a case involving a criminal charge. Surely there is no basis in the case before us for the substitution of the discretion of this court for that of the superior court. We must assume that the learned judge of the trial court acted with a full appreciation of his duties and obligations, with the cited section of the Constitution in mind, and that the conclusion which he reached was not governed by any idle nor any mere technical reasons."

[8] As respects the third count of the indictment, it is apparent that the trial judge entertained a doubt concerning whether the defendant was merely buying stock for himself and reselling when opportunity afforded, or whether he was actually engaged in the business of a stockbroker. We cannot say from the evidence that the trial judge could not properly entertain such a doubt, and it would serve no useful purpose for us to discuss further the only point urged by appellant to warrant a reversal of the order as to this count, to wit, that the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict of the jury.

Order affirmed.

A contract must be construed as a whole, and intention of parties collected from entire instrument, not from detached portions.

3. Master and servant 🔑50—Business and duties of employee may be considered in construing contract, where writing relates only to compensation (Civ. Code, § 1647).

Where writing relates only to compensation of employee, his business and duties, so far as necessary to determination, may be considered in arriving at true construction of contract of employment, in view of Civ. Code, § 1647.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by H. R. Monroe against the Grolier Society of London, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Brown & Bissell and Leet W. Bissell, all of Los Angeles, Wm. R. Crawford, Jr., of New York City (J. Fearon Brown, of New York City, of counsel), for appellant.

Erwin P. Werner, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment against the defendant in this action for the sum of $2,180.68 alleged to be due as commissions earned on a certain contract of employment hereinafter set forth. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The plaintiff in his complaint asks for the sum of $3,099.78, against which the court allowed a counterclaim or offset in favor of the defendant in the sum of $919.10. The defendant, in its answer, set up a counterclaim against the plaintiff in the sum of $795. This counterclaim was allowed in the amount just stated, as an offset to plaintiff's demand.

The record shows that the defendant is a corporation engaged in the business of selling books; that during the time hereinafter mentioned the plaintiff was employed by the defendant as the general agent of the defendant, having the management and control of the sale of books and the collection of the purchase price thereof from the persons to whom books were sold. The method of conducting the business is not disclosed by the record, but there is sufficient to lead to the conclusion that books were sold upon the installment plan, and it was the duty of the plaintiff to supervise the sale and distribution of books and to look after the collection of the installments to be paid by purchasers to whom books were sold. In other words, the record shows that the plaintiff had at least two important duties to perform—first, to make sale of books; second, to attend to collection of the purchase price of the same. The extent of the agency is not disclosed by the record, further than that the evidence would indicate that the territory over which the plaintiff had supervision included the state of California and part of the state of Oregon, as the documents in the record refer to Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Portland. The record shows that considerable correspondence was had prior to reducing the terms of the employment to writing, and that finally the parties came to an agreement which was and is embodied in the following instrument:

"Accepted by H. R. Monroe."

The record shows a stipulation to the effect that the plaintiff's employment was continued under the foregoing contract to and including the 30th day of September, 1923. The plaintiff, under this agreement, was employed as a resident manager of the San Francisco office which controls the western territory or what is known as the western territory.

[1-3] The subject of dispute in this action is the compensation to which the plaintiff is entitled on business booked subsequent to October 1, 1921. The trial court accepted the theory that the plaintiff was entitled to 2 per cent. on all net collections on business booked subsequent to October 1, 1921, irrespective of whether collections were or were not made during the period for which the plaintiff was employed; in other words, that the plaintiff was entitled to 2 per cent. of net collections, irrespective of whether collections were made by him or by some one else after his employment had terminated. The appellant contends that, as the plaintiff had the duty of making collections as well as the duty of making sales, his sales and collections during the period of his employment were concurrent duties, and that the plaintiff was and is entitled only to 2 per cent. on all net collections made by him on business booked subsequent to October 1, 1921, and prior to the 30th day of September, 1923, and in furtherance of this contention appellant calls attention to the fact that the first clause of the employment, to wit, that clause which specifies that the plaintiff should receive 4 per cent. on all net collections, less certain discounts, on all business which was booked prior to October 1, 1921, indicates and shows the intent of the parties in entering into the agreement that collections and commissions went together (that is, that the right to commissions was dependent upon collections); otherwise, the defendant, on old business, would be paying double commissions, to wit, 4 per cent. to the plaintiff and whatever per cent. had been agreed upon to the predecessor of the plaintiff. To understand the meaning of the terms used in the writing which we have set forth, it is necessary to bear in mind that the collections were just as important a branch of the business to be managed by the plaintiff as that of making sales. If the collections were not properly attended to, the sales would prove profitless. If sales were made to hazardous risks, or, in other words, to persons from whom collections could never be made, there would be no profit either to the defendant or to the plaintiff, and thus, the intention is enforced, by the very terms of the contract, that collections and commissions should go together, and that the contract, taken as a whole, means this, that "on all business booked subsequent to October 1, 1921, we will pay you a commission of 2 per cent. on all net collections made by you after the discounts have been deducted," etc., this, to insure efficient management on the part of the plaintiff. Any other construction would lead to this: That the plaintiff might devote his entire time and attention to the sales department of the undertaking, leaving the collections not attended to, and then, at the expiration of the term of his employment, retire and quietly await the collections made on the sales during his administration, and demand his 2 per cent. If it had been the duty of the plaintiff only to make sales, then this construction might be held permissible, but, in view of the fact that the plaintiff had a double duty to perform as manager of the company, we conclude that sales and collections were joint duties and obligations, and began and ended with the beginning and termination of the contract of employment. As said in 13 C. J. 625, § 486: "A contract must be construed as a whole, and the intention of the parties is to be collected from the entire instrument, and not from detached portions, it being necessary to consider all of its parts in order to determine the meaning of any particular part, as well as the whole. Individual clauses and particular words must be considered in connection with the rest of the agreement, and all parts of the writing, and every word in it, will, if possible, be given effect." In construing the writing involved in this action, as we have said, it is necessary to look into the business to conduct which the plaintiff was being employed. The writing itself only relates to compensation. The business and the duties of the plaintiff, so far as necessary to a determination of this cause, are set forth in the record, and the plaintiff was required to attend to all the business as manager, and not to a part, and the intent of the instrument, as we have said, was to secure efficient management and encourage the plaintiff, not only in making sales, but in making collections. This is apparent from the correspondence set forth in the record.

A somewhat similar contract was involved in the case of Ortega v. Collins New Medical Institute, 127 App. Div. 293, 111 N. Y. S. 427, and it was there held that "one employed to carry on business correspondence in a foreign language under a contract giving him a certain sum per year and a special commission on all receipts in his department, settlements of his compensation to be made monthly, is not, after his discharge, entitled to commissions on moneys received on business procured by him during the employment." Likewise, in the case of Crum v. Murray (C. C. A.)

102 F. 92, where it was held that a contract for commissions for services read, "80 per cent. of the first month's dues collected, 5 per cent. of the succeeding months' dues collected, $7.50 per share flat for fully-paid stock," and "1 per cent. of all dues collected after the first" of the month, did not apply to, and did not give to the person employed any right to dues collected after the termination of the contract. While the contracts involved in those cases, as we have said, differ somewhat from their terms from the one under consideration, they are in substance the same in relation to the compensation to be paid for the services to be performed. Again, as provided by section 1647 of the Civil Code: "A contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates." Thus, the matter to which the contract we have to consider relates to the performance of the duties which we have herein specified, and when read in the light of the duties to be performed, we conclude that there is no ambiguity in the instrument relating to the plaintiff's compensation, and that he was to be compensated for the duties performed by him, and not for the duties left unperformed; that is, his failure to make collections during the term of his employment. This is further evidenced, as we have hereinbefore said, by the fact that the plaintiff was employed to perform duties left unperformed by his predecessor, and paid a separate compensation therefor.

The record shows that the defendant's counterclaim for $769.10 was for overpayments made by the defendant to the plaintiff, on account of drafts drawn by the plaintiff in excess of the amount to which the plaintiff was entitled under the contract set forth herein, and that the court found said amount justly due the defendant, and that there were some other items considered by the court which increased the counterclaim allowed to the sum of $919.10. As to these items the record gives us no information, and, for the purposes of terminating this litigation without further trial, we will act upon the appellant's request and accept the figures set forth in the defendant's answer as a counterclaim, and direct judgment in its favor therefor.

It follows from what has been said that, the error of the trial court consisting only of a misconstruction of the contract, no further proceedings need be had.

It is hereby ordered that the judgment entered in this cause be, and the same is hereby, reversed and set aside, and the trial court is hereby directed to enter judgment in favor of the defendant for the amount of its counterclaim set forth in its answer, to wit, in the sum of $769.10, and costs.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; THOMPSON, J.

In suit for specific performance of alleged oral agreement by persons rearing plaintiff to leave all their property to plaintiff on their death, striking from deposition baby picture of plaintiff and letter written by plaintiff's mother to show affection which plaintiff's parents bore her, if error because grounds of motion to strike were not stated, was harmless, since it in no wise tended to prove terms of agreement.

8. Stipulations ⇨17(2)—Stipulation and consent of some defendants that judgment be entered as prayed is not binding on other defendants.

Stipulation and consent of some of defendants that judgment be entered for plaintiff as prayed was in no wise binding on the other defendants, but, at most, entitled plaintiff to stipulated judgment against such consenting defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by Ethel M. Staples against Laura Hawthorne and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Merriam, Rinehart & Merriam, of Pasadena, for appellant.

C. W. Byrer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LUCAS, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment herein decreeing that she take nothing by reason of her action, wherein she sought specific performance of an oral agreement and the enforcement of a trust. The complaint as amended to conform with the proof alleges that in 1887 James Bower, the father of plaintiff, for and on behalf of plaintiff, who was then a little girl of about four years of age, made and entered into an agreement with one N. H. Hosmer and Clymena W. Hosmer, his wife, whereby, in consideration of the said James Bower agreeing to deliver plaintiff into the companionship, care, custody, and control of the said Hosmers, and to relinquish to them his parental rights over plaintiff, the said Hosmers agreed to take plaintiff into their home and family as a daughter, to love, cherish, support, maintain, and educate her, to treat her in all respects as their own child, and, upon their deaths, to leave, bequeath, and devise all of their property to plaintiff as their sole heir, legatee, and devisee.

The record shows that the said Hosmers did take plaintiff into their home, where she remained until she married, and that she was treated at all times by them as a natural child would be treated, but that, when the said N. H. Hosmer died in June, 1912, he left all of his property and estate to the said Clymena W. Hosmer. She in turn died in February, 1923, leaving an holographic will bearing date November 21, 1920, by the terms of which she gave plaintiff but $500 out of a $27,000 estate. To plaintiff's husband she bequeathed $500; to Alfred S. Copps $500; to Arthur M. Copps $200; and to defendants and respondents Laura E. Hawthorne, Lelia B. Morse, Angie Williamson, and Frank S. Morse the residue, share and share alike. Plaintiff was appointed administratrix of said estate with the will annexed, but sued herein in her individual capacity. She prayed judgment decreeing that she is the equitable owner of all of said decedent's property and estate, that the defendants named in the will as beneficiaries thereunder hold their respective interests as trustees, and that they be required to convey unto her their several interests in said property and estate.

The defendants Alfred S. Copps and Arthur M. Copps filed an answer and disclaimer, admitting the allegations of plaintiff's complaint to be true, and relinquishing their rights as legatees under the will of the said Clymena W. Hosmer.

The defendants Laura E. Hawthorne, Angie Williamson, Lelia B. Morse, and Frank S. Morse filed an answer placing in issue the material allegations of the complaint, setting up certain special defenses, and asking that plaintiff take nothing by her action.

The case was tried by the court without a jury, and in its decision the court found substantially that all of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint were true, except the allegation that the Hosmers agreed upon their deaths to leave, bequeath, and devise all of their property to plaintiff as their sole heir, legatee, and devisee. Judgment was therefore given for the defendants Hawthorne, Williamson, Lelia B. Morse, and Frank S. Morse.

As grounds of appeal from this judgment, plaintiff and appellant contends, (1) that there is no evidence to support the negative finding of the trial court that the Hosmers did not agree to leave plaintiff all of their property when they died; (2) that the said negative finding is in conflict with uncontradicted evidence to the contrary, and that, as a matter of law, the finding should be set aside as not supported by the evidence; (3) that certain rulings of the court on the admissibility of evidence are erroneous; and (4) that the findings and judgment should be set aside as being in violation of the disclaimers and consents of the defendants Alfred S. Copps and Arthur M. Copps.

[1-3] The agreement in question, if made at all, was made prior to the enactment of subdivision 7 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, and was therefore not required to be in writing. It is not disputed that courts of equity will enforce such an agreement by treating the heirs as trustees for those claiming the benefit thereof and compelling the conveyance of the property according to its terms. Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444, at page 448, 45 P. 710, 33 L. R. A. 369; McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 81, 70 P. 1008. Such contracts, however, are to be sustained only upon presentation of clear and convincing proof. Hayden's Estate, 1 Cal. App. 75, 81 P. 668, citing Owens v. McNally, supra; McCabe v. Healy, supra.

The justness of this rule is apparent in this case, in view of the fact that oral proof of words spoken many years before is relied upon to establish and enforce a solemn and binding contract for the transfer of real and personal property against the beneficiaries of one whose lips are forever sealed and who is charged with having deliberately violated such contract in the closing moments of her life. Careful scrutiny should be given by the trial court to the evidence adduced and by the court appealed to for a reversal of the trial court's judgment.

Plaintiff and appellant Ethel M. Staples and four other witnesses testified to statements made by either Mr. or Mrs. Hosmer tending to show their intent to leave all their property to appellant. This testimony, however, is just as consistent with the theory that such expressed intent was occasioned by a generous impulse on their part as it is with the theory that they had entered into an agreement so to dispose of their property. Giving it full weight, this testimony is at best but slightly corroborative of appellant's contention. The strength of appellant's case depends almost entirely upon the weight given the testimony of Edith L. Twycross and S. Lillie Twycross, sisters of appellant's mother, and upon that of Bradford W. Thurston, a grandnephew of appellant's father. The said Twycross sisters, aged, respectively, 58 and 80 years, were present when the conversation was had between the Hosmers and appellant's father at Cedar Grove, Me., in 1887, which conversation, it is claimed, constituted or resulted in the oral agreement here sought to be enforced. They testified, in substance, that appellant's father was willing for the Hosmers to take her, and that the Hosmers promised to give her a good home and a good education, and that they would leave all their property to her. The witness Thurston testified to a statement said to have been made by Mrs. Hosmer in 1915 that such conversation had taken place.

[4] The testimony of these three witnesses was presented to the trial court in the form of depositions. Had the three witnesses testified in person before the court, and thereby afforded the court an opportunity of observing their appearance and bearing, this court clearly would not be justified in disturbing the finding of the trial court.

"While it is the general rule that the uncontradicted testimony of a witness to a particular fact may not be disregarded, but should be accepted by the court as proof of the fact, this rule has its exceptions. The most positive testimony of a witness may be contradicted by inherent improbabilities as to its accuracy contained in the witness's own statement of the transaction; or there may be circumstances in evidence in connection with the matter which satisfy the court of its falsity; the manner of the witness in testifying may impress the court with a doubt as to the accuracy of his statement and influence it to disregard his positive testimony as to a particular fact; and as it is within the province of the trial court to determine what credit and weight shall be given to the testimony of any witness, this court cannot control its finding or conclusion denying the testimony credence, unless it appears that there are no matters or circumstances which at all impair its accuracy." Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. at page 128, 113 P. 150.

Appellant urges strenuously, however, that such is not the rule where depositions are presented, and cites the case of Wilson v. Cross & Co., 33 Cal. 60, 69, as supporting authority. Mr. Justice McFarland, however, in the case of Reay v. Butler, 95 Cal. 206, 214, 30 P. 208, 209, in commenting upon the case of Wilson v. Cross & Co., supra, states what we believe to be the correct rule applicable hereto and the fundamental underlying reason for the rule:

"It has been held here in more than a hundred cases, commencing with Payne v. Jacobs, 1 Cal. 39, in the first published books of reports of this court, and ending with Dobinson v. McDonald, 92 Cal. 33 [27 P. 1098], in the last volume of such reports, that the finding of a jury or a court as to a fact decided upon the weight of evidence will not be reviewed by this court; and so the general rule is clearly established. It was said, however, in the opinion of the court in two or three cases, notably in Wilson v. Cross & Co., 33 Cal. 60, that the reason of the rule is, that the court below has the advantage of observing the appearance and bearing of the witnesses, and that such reason does not obtain when the witnesses do not appear personally in court. But is may be well argued that such is not the only reason of the rule; that it is founded in the essential distinction between the trial and the appellate court under our system, and grows out of considerations of jurisdiction; that it is the province of the trial court to decide questions of fact, and of the appellate court to decide questions of law; that this court can rightfully set aside a finding for want of evidence only where there is no evidence to support it, or where the supporting evidence is so slight as to show abuse of discretion. * * * In Bauder v. Tyrrel, 59 Cal. 99, the court says: 'The trial court decides as to the facts, the court of review (in this state) as to questions of law only.' The appellate court will, no doubt, look a little more closely into the evidence when it consists entirely of depositions or affidavits, or notes of former testimony; but it cannot be taken as settled that in such a case the rule as to conflicting evidence does not apply."

Denied the opportunity of personally observing certain of the witnesses, it was not only the right, but the duty of the trial court, in determining whether appellant had established her case by that clear and convincing proof required in cases of this kind, to carefully consider the inherent improbabilities as to the accuracy of the witnesses' own statements. This alone may so contradict the most positive testimony as to make applicable to the court's findings the conflicting evidence rule.

To make any binding contract, the promise of one party must be the moving consideration for the promise of the other. One agrees to do something for and in consideration of the agreement of the other to do something else. In point of time the promises are concurrent.

[5] Here it is claimed that one party, in consideration of the privilege of rearing a child as her own, and receiving its love, affection, and companionship, agreed at death to transfer by will all of her property to such child. For proof of the terms of the contract the greatest reliance is placed upon the memories of two women, aged respectively 58 and 80 years, as to what was said, by whom it was said, and the order in which it was said some 38 or 40 years ago. The memories of these women were shown by contradictory evidence to be defective in some details. This is not surprising. It is hardly conceivable that any one of the age of either could clearly remember with any degree of exactitude what was actually said so many years before. Yet, to make the alleged agreement to transfer effective and within the law, it must be established by clear and convincing testimony that a promise to transfer was made at or before the time appellant's father promised to relinquish appellant's care, custody, and control, and in consideration thereof. It may well be that during the conversation the Hosmers said something about leaving their property to appellant under some circumstances. This might reasonably be expected of a man and wife who professed love for a child of tender years and who had no direct heirs of their own.

But, considering the inherent probabilities of the case, the circumstances under which the contract was entered into, the age of the appellant at the time, her immediate needs of care, support, and education, the uncertainties of life, the inability to forecast what character appellant would develop or her needs at the time of the death of the Hosmers or the objects of the Hosmers' bounty at that time, and the various other conditions under which the contract was entered into, it is more inherently probable that the Hosmers simply agreed to treat the appellant in all respects as their own child than that they bound themselves irrevocably to leave her all their property, in any event.

To say that the testimony under consideration so distinctly and convincingly established an irrevocable agreement to transfer property that it was an error of law for the trial court to hold otherwise is a conclusion to which this court cannot subscribe.

So apt is the language of the opinion in the case of Turman v. Ellison, 37 Cal. App. at pages 209, 210, 174 P. 398, and so strongly in support of the position of this court, that we feel justified in quoting liberally from it:

"Actions to enforce oral agreements claimed to have been made with persons who are dead involve a dangerous assault upon property rights, and they are often supported by false testimony and they naturally and reasonably excite suspicion. And while they may be genuine and worthy of confirmation, they require the closest and most careful scrutiny to prevent injustice being done. (Wall's Appeal, 111 Pa. St. 460, 56 Am. Rep. 288, 5 A. 220.) They afford and carry opportunity for fraud against the estates of deceased persons and a great temptation to perjury on the part of disappointed or avaricious relatives. (Hinkle v. Sage, 67 Ohio St. 256, 65 N. E. 999.) Such considerations could not be laid out of view by the trial judge.

"He could not fail to observe, also, that the testimony of the plaintiffs was given nearly nine years after the transaction is said to have occurred. It is quite probable—even more than probable—that after the lapse of such a period the memory would be inaccurate as to the facts and conditions of the affair. It requires a good deal of courage and assurance for a witness to undertake under such circumstances to state definitely just what was said and done. If he does confidently make such attempt without ever having reduced the details to writing or having kept them vivid in his memory by frequent expression or recital of what took place, it is difficult to give full credit to his story. The distrust is naturally augmented by the circumstance that the testimony is not presented in any court until all the parties who could have any interest in contradicting it are dead. While we cannot say that under such circumstances it must necessarily be rejected as unworthy of belief, yet it must inevitably occur that the trial judge will regard it with serious misgivings. (Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 P. 200 [45 Am. St. Rep. 87].)

"In fact, it is proper to say that evidence given under such circumstances should not only be received with the greatest caution, but it has been declared to be evidence of the weakest and most unsatisfactory nature. (Austin v. Wilcoxson, 149 Cal. 24, 84 P. 417.)"

[6] As to the trial court's rulings on evidence to which exception is taken, we find no error sufficient to warrant us in disturbing its judgment. Parts of the deposition of Edith L. Twycross were properly stricken as amounting to conclusions of the witness—such, for example, as "I was present and heard the agreement," and "it was then and there definitely agreed." There was permitted to remain in evidence, however, a sufficiently full statement of what was said and done by the parties to enable the court to pass upon the question as to whether or not an agreement such as relied upon by appellant was in fact made. Furthermore, an objection was properly sustained to a compound question containing the language "Do you know whether or not there was any agreement between Clymena W. Hosmer and any one else regarding the terms, or conditions, under which plaintiff became an inmate in her home?" This clearly called for the opinion of the witness. The fact that the question also contained a request of the witness to state when and where and with whom such agreement was made, and who were present, and all that was said or done on that occasion, does not impair the correctness of the court's ruling.

[7] The striking from the deposition of a baby picture of appellant and a letter written by appellant's mother, offered for the purpose of showing the affection which appellant's parents bore her, if erroneous because the grounds of the motion to strike were not stated, was at most a harmless error, for proof of protestations of love and affection by appellant's parents in no wise tends to prove the terms of the agreement. Unless appellant's parents were unnatural parents, it is to be presumed they loved her.

[8, 9] Regarding the final contention of appellant, namely, that the findings and judgment should be set aside as being in violation of the disclaimer and consent of the defendants Alfred S. and Arthur M. Copps, we find each so-called disclaimer to be in the following language: "I freely relinquish my rights and interests as a legatee under the will of said Clymena W. Hosmer, and I do hereby freely consent and stipulate that judgment may be entered in said action as prayed for in said complaint."

That portion of the prayer of said complaint applicable to the legatees asks that plaintiff be adjudged the equitable owner of the property described in the complaint, and that the beneficiaries under the will hold as trustees for plaintiff the interests bequeathed to them and that they be required to convey such interests to plaintiff.

In its decision the court found that, by written assignments dated in May, 1925, and filed herein on August 6, 1925, the two Copps transferred their several legacies to plaintiff (appellant herein). Appellant complains that the question of the making of these assignments was not within the issues, and that there is no evidence to support such findings. Be that as it may, it is clear that the stipulation and consent of the Copps that judgment be entered as prayed for is in no wise binding upon the other defendants (respondents herein).

"Statements in the pleadings of one defendant are not admissible against his codefendants." 22 C. J. 336.

The most that can be said of the answers and stipulations of the Copps is that they are sufficient to entitle appellant to a stipulated judgment against them. Since no findings are necessary to the entry of such a judgment (14 Cal. Jur. 877), the findings in reference to the assignment by the Copps are immaterial.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed as between appellant and respondents herein. As against the defendants Alfred S. Copps and Arthur M. Copps, it is so modified that plaintiff and appellant Ethel M. Staples have judgment against them as prayed for.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, J.
